GUIDE TO THE NE6 BELLACOOLA FILE

[The Bellacoola (a corruption of the word "bilxula" by which name they are known to the Kwakiutl) are a small tribe living along the coasts of Dean Inlet and Bentinck Arm at about 52° north latitude in British Columbia, and along the Bella Coola River which empties into North Bentinck Arm. Subdivisions of this tribe are the Talio, Kimsquit and Dean River peoples.

The eight sources, all in English, which comprise this file, deal with this tribe in the period prior to 1924 before socio-cultural acculturative effects and influences brought about a complete breakdown of the aboriginal Bellacoola culture complex.

The two primary sources for this file which give the most complete introduction to Bellacoola society are 1 and 2: McIlwraith. While these two sources concentrate on religion, social organization, the potlatch, rank, the Kusiut society and its ceremonials, and mythology, there is also a great deal of information to be found in these works on warfare, games and stories, the life cycle, medicine, magic and taboo and sorcery. 2: McIlwraith also contains four appendices, with some limited data on material culture (olachen processing, canoe construction, preparation of cedar bark, and manufacture of paint), string figure construction, lists of native fauna and flora, and a Bellacoola-English vocabulary list. Source number 6: Boas in this file also presents a brief general survey of Bellacoola culture and might possibly be read by the researcher for a general background prior to his perusal of sources 1 and 2: McIlwraith with their more detailed data. 3: Smith deals with the importance of magic and sorcery in the society (also covered in 1: McIlwraith and to some extent in 6: Boas). 4: Smith is a brief comparative study of the Bellacoola and Carrier Indians (NE 7) regarding beliefs concerning insects found in the common environment. 5: Smith deals with another important aspect of Bellacoola ethnography, that of the use of native medicine concocted from various plants, animals and other materials in the environment (see also sources 1, 2, 3 and 6). This source also gives comparative data for the Carrier (NE7), Gitksan (Tsimshian NE 15), Sekani (NE14) and Chilcotin (NE8). 6: Boas presents a general survey of the Bellacoola as they existed in the latter part of the nineteenth century, with emphases on names and locations of settlements, "gentes," secret societies (see also sources 1, 2, 7 and 8), the potlatch, customs related to the life cycle, religion and shamanism (see also sources 1, 2, 3, and 7), warfare and medicine. 7: Boas while dealing primarily with a resumé of some of the basic Bellacoola myths and native cosmology, also presents data on spirits and gods, the shaman, beliefs about animals (see also 4: Smith), village names and locations (see also sources 1, and 6), and the secret societies. 8: Boas deals basically with the secret societies and the potlatch, and is primarily a repetition of the information given in 6: Boas on these aspects.

The topics best covered in this file are social organization, religion, the secret societies and their ceremonials, the potlatch, rank, mythology and Bellacoola stories. Data on material culture are seriously lacking, with only some minor accounts being given in 1: McIlwraith (Appendix A), and 6 and 7: Boas, the last two sources of which briefly illustrate and describe some of the special dance masks used in the ceremonies of the secret societies. Information on kinship is also lacking in this file, with most of the data available being found in 1: McIlwraith, and 6: Boas.

PREFACE

THE term Bella Coola can be applied to the Indians who formerly occupied more than twenty villages on the lower Bella Coola River in central British Columbia, to their near kinsfolk on the Kimsquit River, and to those living at the head of South Bentinck Arm. Disease and changed conditions consequent upon the coming of the white man have so reduced their numbers that the last two groups of settlements have been virtually abandoned, while only one village remains in the Bella Coola valley. This is located on a reserve near the mouth of the river, and its four hundred inhabitants comprise practically all the survivors of what was once a tribe of several thousand people, with a distinctive language and culture of their own.

The material contained in this monograph was collected in this one village many years ago for the National Museum of Canada.[1] I was in the field during two periods that extended from March to August, 1922, and from September, 1923, to February, 1924. My field notes were worked up and the completed manuscript submitted to the Museum in 1926. Since that time it has suffered various vicissitudes. Recommended for publication by the Chief of the Anthropological Division, it passed through the hands of various editors; questions were raised about its size and the suitability of detailed studies of social anthropology in a government publication, and by the time these matters were adjusted, funds for extensive publications were unavailable and the manuscript was put aside. Since the aim of the investigation was to record, as far as possible, the sum-total of the complex and interwoven social life of the Bella Coola, I did not think it desirable to prepare short articles[2] summarizing different aspects, preferring to await an

LOCATION AND ENVIRONMENT

Location—Bella Coola Villages—Tribal Organization—Neighbouring Tribes

Location

"BELLA COOLA" is the common designation of those Indians who, until a few years ago, inhabited the valley of the Bella Coola River in central British Columbia. Boas has recorded[1] that the name is a mis-pronunciation of Bilxula,[2] a Kwakiutl word of doubtful origin which white pioneers assumed to be the appellation of the people in question. There is no term in their own language to include the groups treated in this monograph. Linguistically, the Bella Coola form an isolated island of Salish-speaking people, separated from others of the same stock by tribes of Athapascan and Kwakiutl lineage.[3] Culturally, they belong to the central section of the North Pacific coast area.[4]

The Bella Coola River rises among the mountainous uplands of central British Columbia. Its two main branches fall rapidly, about forty-five miles from the sea, into two deep gorges which unite, some five miles farther on, to form the valley of the Bella Coola. Down this the river rushes in serpentine curves (see Plate 5). Too shallow and too rapid for the use of large boats, even if such had been known to the Bella Coola, it serves to bear their dug-out canoes, each hewn from some mighty cedar. The valley is never wider than two or three miles and is hemmed in by lofty snow-capped moun-

The following village may be included with the above: [173]

(27) Nuxeq: on the shore of North Bentinck Arm, to the east of the creek that flows into it at Green Bay. This long-deserted village was built so close to the ocean that high tides reached almost to the houses. According to one informant, the name was derived from that of the first chief sent down from above to that spot; while another connected it, etymologically, with Nuxx, the name of the barren district some four and a half miles up the valley of the creek. In recent years this village site has been used only as a summer camp. [173]

The name given to the Bella Coola valley is Nuxálk; that given to the inhabitants of the valley, excluding those of village no. 27, is Nuxálkmx.[11] 101 103

Two points must be considered with regard to the above list of towns: In the first place, can it be regarded as an accurate list, or do the towns belong to the realm of mythology? In the second place, are the customs and beliefs of the inhabitants of the different towns sufficiently similar to be described without reference to local differences? 128 173 361

The first question is difficult to answer. The Bella Coola undoubtedly consider the existence of these towns to be an historical fact, but so do they regard the peopling of the earth by men created in the land above. Nevertheless, the above list appears to be substantially correct. The Bella Coola, although now collected into a single village, still remember their ancient homes. One man, for example, stated as a matter of course that he was a man of Snuloli. Further inquiry elicited the information that he had been born at Sinxl, where his father had moved at the time of the smallpox epidemic. It later appeared that my informant's father was born at Tcmxtl, had married there, and that it was his father who had moved [164] [166]

[10] This explanation may be only legendary.

[11] Boas, p. 69, states that Nuxálk is only applied to the lower villages of the valley. All the writer's information was contrary to this view. [114]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

128 from Snaöli. My informant's grandchildren regard them-173 selves as Snaöli boys, and their names are embodied in myths
361 of that village, although their forbears have not lived there
166 for five generations. There is no reason to suppose this case exceptional. Other instances were obtained of movements of people from one village to another at earlier times, and there seems no cause to doubt the general accuracy of these. Names [554] embodied in the origin myths of different towns are used as prerogatives and have been potent factors in keeping their memory alive. Uncertainties and inaccuracies there must be in the foregoing list, but on the whole it appears to be fairly reliable, since few contradictions were received from different informants.

128 Accounts obtained of the same ceremonies from the descen-184 dants of people of different villages were found in most cases to be identical. There were a few differences in custom between [790] the people of Staur and those of the other upper valley towns on the one hand, and the inhabitants of the lower valley on [101] the other. These will be mentioned when necessary, but on the whole the inhabitants of the Bella Coola valley can be considered as a tribal entity.

114 Boas (p. 48) gives a list of Bella Coola towns which agrees 361 fairly well with the above. Among his villages are included Pe·ɛsb (no. 4), Nalqstkwan·e (no. 7), and Nuxálxm (no. 16).[11] All the older people agreed that these are the names of streams, though settlements located on them may have been known by the same designations. Names of the five villages recorded by Boas, nos. 6, 8, 9, 19, and 24, were not known by several old men questioned on the subject.

101 The villages of the Bella Coola valley did not form a political 619 unit; each was independent. A common language was spoken throughout and the inhabitants of the different towns recog-[631] nized that their origins and customs were similar. This was [197] also recognized to be the case with regard to the people living on South Bentinck Arm, and at the head of Dean Channel.

[11] Using in each case the spelling of this monograph.

Indians from both of these areas were interviewed and it was found that, except for minor details in certain beliefs, their customs were identical with those of the Bella Coola proper. Accordingly, in this monograph, the term "Bella Coola" will be taken to include the inhabitants, not only of that valley, but of South Bentinck Arm and the head of Dean Channel. Those living on South Bentinck Arm will be referred to as Tăl'o people, the Bella Coola term for them; those of Dean Channel as Kimsquit, the name by which they are generally known. It is an anglicized form of the word Kimpĕnut, meaning "Canyon," by which the Bella Bella designate the people of Dean River.

VILLAGES ON SOUTH BENTINCK ARM

(18) Sănlia: on the east side of South Bentinck Arm, about a quarter of a mile from the point that marks its junction with North Bentinck Arm. Food was obtained from an ocean fish-trap.* Long deserted except as a summer camp.

(19) Qawĕlst, "Island": east side of South Bentinck Arm, slightly north of the island opposite the Hot Springs on the west side of the fiord. The town took its name from this island. In summer the numerous inhabitants lived immediately opposite it, at a place where they had an ocean salmon-trap; in winter they moved to a fortified spot at the base of a mountain slightly farther to the north. This village was blotted out by a landslide one spring long ago, and the few survivors were unable to re-establish it.

(20) Tsaulmem: on the east side of the fiord about four miles above the last-named. A small town, whose inhabitants lived on the catch from their ocean fish-trap; it was recently deserted.

*Ocean fish-traps work as follows:—A pen is made by a series of stakes, into which the salmon enter at high tide. It is then closed and, as the falling tide leaves the mud, the impounded fish can be scooped out by hand or in hand-nets.

*Mackenzie did not visit either South Bentinck Arm, or Kimsquit, but it will be convenient to continue the use of asterisks to mark those towns which are said to have been inhabited at that time.

174 reliable traditions of Carrier settlements there. The probable explanation is that the Bella Coola formerly extended over the area, either in actual fact or according to mythology, but were supplanted by the Carriers.

175 The Dean River is called Nalsl, and the generic name for the people of the Dean valley is Satolmp. About eighty years [101] ago a smallpox epidemic so reduced the villages on the Kimsquit that the survivors abandoned them and moved to the [164] Dean. At that time a certain Kimsquit man is believed to [731] have said: "We will take their places and kill even their dogs."

Since that time, the joint settlement has suffered one [164] epidemic after another, until a mere handful of the people [98] survive, and they are almost entirely descended from the Kimsquit River immigrants. Within the last few years, these have requested permission from the Bella Coola to abandon Kimsquit entirely and live among them. The two groups have [628] always been on the best of terms, but the Bella Coola have not forgotten the fate of the Dean River people and have been unwilling to admit the Kimsquit survivors.

Villages on the Kimsquit River, Sá·tsl

361 *(aa) Sá·tsl: this large and important town, at the mouth of the river, was deserted at the time of the smallpox epidemic.

*(ab) Nawulc: this settlement can be grouped with the last-mentioned, although situated on the shore of Dean Channel, at the site of the present Manitou Cannery, six miles away. No meaning of the name is known.

Tribal Organization

619 The subject of this monograph is the people of the above forty-five villages. They will be referred to as a tribe, and as this term is customarily limited to a political unit, a brief justification for its use is necessary.

342 Each Bella Coola village consisted of a single row of houses, 361 built along the shore of a river or the ocean. The front doors

Before the smallpox epidemic, about 1865, there were towns on the fiords and villages of Dean Channel between Kimsquit and Bella Bella. The inhabitants were called ułämx by the Bella Coola, and ułaitx by the Bella Bella. Their settlements were at Elcho Harbour, Green River, Cascade Inlet, and at several unidentified places. Their language is said to have differed slightly from that of the Bella Bella, but the people themselves married freely with both Kimsquit and Bella Bella, thus forming a connecting link between these tribes.

A list of ułämx towns was obtained from one old man, who claimed to be a descendant of the people. It was impossible to verify this information, and since he himself was not an ideal informant, the following can be regarded only as approximately correct.

(1) Ālko: at Elcho Harbour.

(2) Kulde·t: on a fiord one mile above the last-named.

(3) Ālłhk or Yuqwa·t: on a river three miles above the preceding.

(4) Nuwaisä·x: on a river two miles above the preceding.

(5) Nuxqatl: on a fiord three miles above the preceding.

(6) 'Omłłom: on a fiord three miles above the preceding.

(7) Ṣuxwlk: on a river two miles above the last-named and thirty miles below Kimsquit.

According to the old man from whom the above list was obtained, Nuxwlst, at Kimsquit, recorded earlier as village no. 45, was also populated by ułämx people. There was so much intermarriage between the two groups that it is now impossible to ascertain whether the inhabitants not only of Nuxwlst, but of Ṣuxwlk as well, were predominantly Kimsquit or ułämx.

the neighbouring Carriers, but Chilkotin as well sometimes descended to the valley. On the coast, though the dense underbrush prevented travel along the shore, the long fiords, sheltered from the open Pacific, were ideal for the use of canoes.[10] Comparatively lengthy journeys were neither difficult nor uncommon. The Tāl-ie people were usually on amicable terms with the inhabitants of Rivers Inlet, and the Kimsquit with the Kitlobe. The Bella Coola were accustomed to attend potlatches at Alert Bay and Fort Rupert,[11] Knight's Inlet, and Bute Inlet, receiving their hosts, in turn, at Bella Coola. On the other hand, there was little friendly intercourse with the northern tribes, of which the Kitkatla especially were dreaded by the residents of the central coast. Until recent years the Bella Coola had no direct knowledge of other Salish-speaking peoples, although some of the Chilkotin told them of a tribe living far to the south, in the interior, whom they encountered in some of their wanderings and used to term Nuxālkmx, recognizing the similarity between their language and that of the Bella Coola. A few years ago several Bella Coola attended a boarding-school and were amazed to find that many of their words were understood by fellow-students from Chilliwack.

To sum up: The Bella Coola were in close contact with the neighbouring coastal tribes, with the members of which they felt themselves to have cultural affinities. They recognize that they have received many ceremonial rites from their neighbours, and must have adopted other elements of culture which they now consider indigenous. It is probable that certain Bella Coola customs must likewise have been transmitted to other tribes, but such lie without the scope of this monograph. The outlying villages were in close contact with foreign neighbours, and tended to assimilate elements of their culture, but, on the whole, the Bella Coola present a tribal unity with distinctive local customs, falling within the general pattern of coastal culture.

SYMPATHETIC MAGIC AND WITCHCRAFT AMONG THE BELLACOOLA

By HARLAN I. SMITH

MANY OF the Bellacoola Indians today believe in sympathetic magic and witchcraft, after over a hundred years of contact with white men. Most of them live within hearing of the bells of the mission church, and the government school. Not a few of the men take logging contracts; some of them build and operate motor boats; many of them join the fishing fleets of the salmon canneries; most of the women work in the canneries; and all deal at the white men's stores.

The Bellacoola lived at the heads of the long inlets half way up the Pacific Coast of Canada and in the tributary Bella Coola valley. Now, numbering perhaps two hundred and fifty, they, with the exception of a few families, are concentrated on one reservation at the mouth of the Bella Coola river. The Bella Coola valley has been called the Norway of Canada. This was where Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the first white man to cross Canada overland, reached the sea.

Aboriginally, the Bellacoola were of the North Pacific Coast culture of America, which is characterized by the extensive use of red cedar and sea products, particularly salmon, the making of graceful, sea-going canoes, each hewn from a single cedar, the erection of large rectangular houses made of cedar planks, with carved house posts and totem poles, lack of pottery, and expertness in carpenter work, carving, and painting. This culture belongs to the barbaric area, but the Bellacoolas were nomadic to a certain extent. The art of the area was that best known from the paintings and carvings of the totem poles, largely of conventionalized animal forms. The life centred around a very highly developed social organization, an extensive and powerful financial system, and property rights to names, rituals and honors. The Bellacoola language is one of the Salish linguistic stock. They

MATERIA MEDICA OF THE BELLA COOLA AND NEIGHBOURING TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

By Harlan I. Smith

INTRODUCTION

This paper describes the materia medica of four tribes of British Columbia, the Bella Coola of Bella Coola valley, the Gitksan of Skeena river, the Carrier who live in the territory behind both of these tribes, and the Sikani of the headwaters of Peace river. Among the Bella Coola the medicines are largely family possessions known to a few individuals only, so that two families may have different remedies for the same specific complaint; but this is not the case among the other tribes. Everywhere magical practices enter largely into the treatment of disease, but are not touched upon in this report. It was impossible for the Indians to diagnose many of their maladies, so that the identifications given here are in many cases conjectural.

Most of the information relating to the Bella Coola was given the writer in 1920-22, by Joshua Moody, apparently a full-blood Bella Coola Indian, born about 1868. As he did not speak English he gave the data in Chinook jargon, which has been interpreted and arranged in logical order. Joshua is an Indian scientist with great knowledge of the local plants and animals. He remembers when Mr. John Clayton was the only white man living in Bella Coola valley, and when the inhabitants saw only one other white man every year or two. Consequently he can recall the old Bella Coola material culture before it was much affected by European ideas.

Some of the information relating to the Bella Coola was given the writer in 1922-23 by the late Captain Schooner, also, apparently, a full-blood, born about 1848, who used the Chinook jargon. Alec Davis, Alexander Clickman, Louie Hall, and other Bella Coola Indians likewise gave information and corroboration.

Most of the information relating to the Southern Carrier Indians of Tikatlos was secured during 1920-1922 from Charlie West, alias Pretty Charlie or Handsome Charlie, a native of that place, born about 1871. Charlie used the peculiar form of broken or pidgeon English commonly employed for communication between the whites and the Carrier and Chinook Indians of this region.

The information about the Sikani and the Northern Carriers of Hagwilget is from stray field notes kindly supplied by Mr. D. Jenness.

The information relating to the Gitksan was secured in 1925-26 from the late John Fowler and Abraham Fowler of Kitwanga, Luke Fowler and Job Robinson of Hazelton, with additions and corroboration from a few others, all old Gitksan Indians, apparently full-blood. The information was secured mainly in English, although Abraham Fowler used also the Chinook jargon.

The method the writer employed was to submit specimens of the plants to his informants and question them concerning all their uses. Of the information thus obtained only the medicinal portion has been presented here. The plants were later identified by Mr. M. O. Malte, of the National Museum, Ottawa.

Since the end of the last century they have dwindled down in numbers, and a few only of their once populous villages are still inhabited, namely, Sâteq, at the head of Dean Inlet; Nûtl'x'l, at the mouth of Salmon River; Nuqa'lkн (which embraces five villages, at the mouth of Bella Coola River; Stû'in, twenty-eight miles up Bella Coola River; and Tâ'lio, at the head of South Bentinck Arm. The dialect of Nûtl'x'l and Sâteq differs slightly from that of the other villages. The following is a list of their ancient villages, most of which are still inhabited at certain seasons, although not regularly :— 161 361 [197] 103 361

1. Sâteq.
2. Nûtl'x'l. The tribe of this place is called Sôtalxмн.
3. Nuqa'lkн, embracing the villages K·ômkô'tza and Stakê'etl on the north side, Pê'isxla and Nutnô'intakônê on the south side of the river.
4. Sxaqtl.
5. Tsômô'otl.
6. Snû't'xlê.
7. Nû'knita.
8. Axx'nanê.
9. Nuk·â'aqmats.
10. Taqoaqk·â'nê.
11. Nû'ak·'xlst.
12. Nûtltlê'iq.
13. Stû'in, twenty-eight miles from the sea.
14. Snû'tl'xlatl. Nos. 4 to 14 are situated along Bella Coola River, and are given as they are met with in ascending the river.
15. Slâ'aqtl, at the confluence of Bella Coola and Driver (?) Rivers.
16. Tâ'lio, at the head of South Bentinck Arm, embracing K·'oa'pq, Tâ'lio, Nû'ik', A'stq.
17. K·oâ'tlna, at the bay of that name in the southern entrance of Bentinck Arm. On the north entrance of Bentinck Arm were the Kiltê'itl, but it is doubtful whether they belonged to the Bilquła or to the Hê'iltsuk. The latter call the people of Dean Inlet Ki'mkuitq. [101]

Each of these tribes is subdivided into gentes, which appear to be arranged in exogamic groups. I learnt the names of the following gentes, which bear the names of their ancestors :— 614

Gentes of the Nuqa'lkмн:

1. Tok·oâ'is (=looking down on his family).
2. Spuqpuqô'lxmq; Qê'mtsloa name: Mâ'lakyilatl (see p. 413).
3. Sistlqêlâ'aq.
4. Kx'hâqk·aua.
5. Pô'tlna.

Gentes of the Nuak·'x'lstxмн:

1. Tl'ak·anmô'ot.
2. K·ôoqôtlâ'nê.

Gentes of the Tâlio'мн:

1. Ialo'stimôt (=making good fire); Qê'mtsloa name; T'â't'xntâit (=a cave protecting from rain).
2. Spatsâ'ilt.
3. Tsaqoâ'akyas.
4. Ha'mtsîl.

kenzie, making his memorable overland trip to the Pacific, records coming upon Indian villages at every few miles of his course. Boas describes the way in which the inhabitants of each of these claim to be descended from one group of ancestors. 173 361 175

Though it is impossible to estimate the former population of the Bella Coola valley with any degree of accuracy, it must have been in the thousands. In 1922 there were surviving rather more than three hundred individuals, who live in one village on an Indian reserve near the north bank of the Bella Coola River, about a quarter of a mile from the sea. In the last century the tribe was stricken with smallpox, and since then consumption, venereal disease, measles, and other diseases of the white man have taken their deadly toll. Changed conditions of life and decay of the rich ceremonial around which centred their interests in the old days are also contributory factors in their decline. Within the last few years, however, the population has begun to increase. 161 [164] [177] [182]

Bella Coola Villages

The following list of Bella Coola villages was obtained. In an effort to learn which had been deserted in recent years, the writer always asked whether or not a town was occupied at the time of Mackenzie's visit, an event of such great interest to the grandparents of the older people that the memory of it is still preserved. Villages said to have been occupied at that time are marked with an asterisk. 361 [124] [175]

Three rivers empty into the head of South Bentinck Arm, which is about one mile in width (see Plate 7). The Bella Coola, flowing from the east, enters at the southern edge, and the Nulqatskwa-e winds in from the north to the opposite angle of the head of the fiord. This stream, "The Nearest River" of the Bella Coola, so-called because of its proximity to the sea, is shown on maps as the Necleetsconnay. Between the mouths of these two is the Pe-ssb, a small stream rising 133 [103]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE4 Bellacoola NE4

stream, on which the salmon-weir rested, was carried away.[10] 361

The following village may be included with the above: [173]

(27) Nusxeq: on the shore of North Bentinck Arm, to the east of the creek that flows into it at Green Bay. This long-deserted village was built so close to the ocean that high tides reached almost to the houses. According to one informant, the name was derived from that of the first chief sent down from above to that spot; while another connected it, etymologically, with Nusx, the name of the barren district some four and a half miles up the valley of the creek. In recent years this village site has been used only as a summer camp. [173]

The name given to the Bella Coola valley is Nuxálk; that given to the inhabitants of the valley, excluding those of village no. 27, is Nuxálkmq.[11] 101 103

Two points must be considered with regard to the above list of towns: In the first place, can it be regarded as an accurate list, or do the towns belong to the realm of mythology? In the second place, are the customs and beliefs of the inhabitants of the different towns sufficiently similar to be described without reference to local differences? 128 173 361

The first question is difficult to answer. The Bella Coola undoubtedly consider the existence of these towns to be an historical fact, but so do they regard the peopling of the earth by men created in the land above. Nevertheless, the above list appears to be substantially correct. The Bella Coola, although now collected into a single village, still remember their ancient homes. One man, for example, stated as a matter of course that he was a man of Swabil. Further inquiry elicited the information that he had been born at Sxaxl, where his father had moved at the time of the smallpox epidemic. It later appeared that my informant's father was born at Tsmoal, had married there, and that it was his father who had moved [164] [166]

[10] This explanation may be only legendary.

[11] Boas, p. 69, states that Nuxalk is only applied to the lower villages of the valley. All the writer's information was contrary to this view. [114]

Mullowaith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEB Bellacoola NE6

773 823 ago the tide came further up the rivers than at present and did not recede so far. This statement was made by an intelligent old man who said that the change had taken place during his own life-time.

773 833 One of Raven's most important alterations to Ālquntām's intentions was with regard to the sexual act.

In the beginning of time, the organs of women were on the forehead, those of men on the palm of the hand, and intercourse was effected by a man rubbing his hand across a woman's brow. Raven feared that children would not result from this practice and accordingly altered the organs of both sexes to their present positions. In order to teach mankind the sexual act he then chose a woman and held intercourse with her, telling her that if the practice were carried out secretly and vigorously a child would be born. And nine months later the woman gave birth to an infant. Raven told the first inhabitants of the world that he wished them to have issue; they consequently held intercourse frequently and begat many children until their descendants filled the Bella Coola valley.

The attitude of the Bella Coola towards this story is identical with their beliefs concerning Raven as the cause of death. "Yes," they say, as they repeat the above story in answer to a question, "Raven taught our ancestors how to have children."

773 [183] One side of their nature implicitly believes any story handed down from the distant past, but few today are sufficiently naïve actually to credit it. The more sophisticated frankly disbelieve, or pretend to do so. Doubt also exists with regard to [129] Raven as originator of linguistic differences. The Bella Coola state that Ālquntām intended only one language for the whole world, but Raven thought that this would lead to trouble and used his power to teach the ancestors of every tribe their special speech.

Many inventions and beliefs are attributed to Raven without any accompanying myth. It is said that almost all geo- [103] graphical names are those bestowed by him on places reached in his travels. It was Raven who taught men how to bait [226] hooks on long lines to catch black cod; it was Raven who first

575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Ăłkwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Ăłkwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Anokokwăłs was a good place for a ceremony because Ăłkwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.[11] When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Ăłkwi danced [535] a nuṣqual dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular nuṣqual dance.

In later years, Ăłkwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest [551] brother the name, Nuṣhkwaltmi, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Ăłkwi, too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tcepinăł, "Leg-Bones." On [103] one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tcepinăł, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

EARLY HISTORY OF THE SOCIETY

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alk society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the ṣṣaak, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the kusiut society.[12] The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural

[11] These paintings are said to be still in existence, and the sister of one informant claimed to have seen them.

*539 Many people landed on this mountain from on high, among others the chief Nazmût-a or Ẽpômai. He had brought with him from above a house, called *Kémdzoxq which, when set up on this earth, grew so large that all the owner's family and descendants could live within. Outside the door, Nazmût-a had caused the erection of a totem-pole, Nutlaqêl. Within dwelt Echo, an incessant talker, who was very clever at learning languages; his rolling voice reverberated through the house and the whole countryside. This being acted as herald and summoned people to a dance by using the word Nazmalika; whenever a descendant of Nazmût-a [539A] gives a potlatch he makes a mask with an ever-changing mouth to represent Echo.

Not long after the completion of the house and totem-pole Nazmût-a set out one evening to fish for salmon with the aid of torches, taking with him his infant son and several followers. During their absence a snow-slide wiped out the town, killing all the inhabitants except one slave who concealed himself within the hollow totem-pole. The slide was due to the mountain being angry at the totem-pole, carved to represent him as he was before he changed to mountain form. When the survivors returned to their buried village they at once set about rebuilding it. In time, as the people increased in numbers, it again became prosperous. They built a fish-weir to supply their wants, using tools of stone obtained from Mount Nazqalst. Ãlkwi, the son of a Stsaq chief, married Nazmût-a's daughter, Shmoulte-a, and Nazmût-a moved to Ẽpqo-ts.

Other narrators provided a little further information about Nazqalst. While still in human form, he wore a flat-topped hat with broad brim around which ran two snakes. After he had been changed to stone as a mountain, several individuals looked down on him from above and chose his slopes as a landing-place, thus making him their crest. The first to do so is said to have been a man named Ojômai.

FRAGMENT OF AN ORIGIN MYTH OF Nuliax[13]

In the very beginning of time, before the sky was made, Ãlqantin sent down to Nuliax three brothers and their two sisters. The names by which the men have been remembered are *Mîtsoq, *Kémdzoxq, Sawmuthe, and the women, Sawmuse-a and ushumse-i. They came to earth as golden eagles, bearing the beaver as food. The youngest sister refused to change her form, and wandered around in a semi-human condition, becoming frenzied at the slightest excuse. At length her die- [103] gusted brothers and sister united to get rid of her; she became petrified in the valley which still bears her name, and which still has an evil reputation as the coldest place in the vicinity of Bella Coola. Thence come the cold winds.

Ałqastow instructed his carpenters to construct Sowq'. They set about their task, but failed to use any supporting posts so that when all was completed, except a small section in the east, it fell. When the carpenters recommenced their work, they took care to erect uprights to bear the weight, and thus were able to construct the sky as it is today. When it was finished, the supports were removed. Only those living at Nałhas witnessed this disaster, and from it they took their names. Kemłsowq' was the name of this first Sowq' that fell.

According to another informant the first settler at Nałhas was Dudzowq', who had also the name Xowowłaix. He came to earth in the form of a beaver, bringing a salmon-weir as means of obtaining sustenance.

FRAGMENT OF AN ORIGIN MYTH OF Nałhas[26]

Among the first people who came down to earth at Tsawat was a stone man, who brought with him a sword as a present from the supreme deity. As a result of this gift the Tsawat were constantly practising the art of war, and always ready to start hostilities; their settlement was a hotbed of trouble. One of these people, Łłtsaxłła by name, wearied of constant strife, determined to set out and find a new home for himself. After considerable travelling he reached Nałhas where he settled down among the inhabitants of that village. He had brought with him a young boy who in time married a woman from Łłałła, and became the father of many children.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Ełsaq[27]

In the beginning Wisqaił came to earth as a man on Mount Naya, near Ełsaq. He seated himself on the mountain top and slid down to the valley, clearing a smooth track as he went, which is still here like the path of a landslide. He was all alone and built for himself a house of evergreen boughs, łwaił, to which he gave the name Kwałałał. After sojourning there for some time he decided to marry; so he set off up the valley to find out if there were any people living above him. He travelled Retainer after retainer was sent after someone, until finally the wondering human heard a steady thump, thump, approaching. It was the Mesatche Nose swaxy, travelling on his single arm, like a looper caterpillar, his head balanced precariously on top while the thump came every time that he brought his fist to the floor. On his entry, the paintings of fish and marine animals, with which the walls and boxes were covered, came to life and cavorted around as if mad, but when the chief took his seat behind the fire they returned to their pictorial form. From this experience the Bella Bella man obtained a xaxa name and myth.

He, Nlaukiwit, (which means "Too Heavy" in the sense of "so important") came to earth from above at Cape Mudge and decided to visit Bella Coola. He walked through the land to the site of the present Mount Nuqulit, wearing a high hat around which crawled two snakes whose heads often crossed. From where he stood, he saw the lofty mountain Łqoi in the Carrier country, and resolved to visit it. At that distant period this peak was a human being and from him Nlaukiwit obtained two wives, the name of one being Thiola. He returned to Bella Coola with them. [778]

Nänalkwitl knew that presently he was fated to become immobile, a seat of petrified power. Since he was able to select where this was to be, he chose the site of Mount Nuxpalst, midway in the Bella Coola valley, as a convenient place to overlook the doings of men. Before he transformed himself into this mountain, he determined that he would have people visit him; accordingly he changed his axe, Nuxkmidjuxta, which he carried concealed beneath his blanket, into xpalst, a stone much used for axes and adzes. Until the introduction of white man's tools his wish was gratified; people came from far and near to obtain the necessary material. [530] [823] [103] [316]

The human origin of the mountain is still remembered, since it is often spoken of by its chiefly names, Nänalkwitl and Thiola, relics of its existence as a man. This story is regarded as an origin myth, and as such might have been included in vol. I, chap. vi.

This mountain is regarded with awe by the Bella Coola on account of its great height, but it seems to lack most of the characteristics ascribed to other places where power has been petrified.

(10) On one of the mountains above Cascade Inlet there used to be a stone eagle with outstretched wings which came to this earth with the first people, but was petrified one day when drying its wings after fishing. About 1860 part of its beak fell away. A change in the condition of any of these places had long been regarded as an omen of misfortune, so the epidemic of smallpox that soon after ravaged the coast was not unexpected. [778] [164] [787] *

(11) Ällsmos: An unidentified spot where a sminq of the mountain was petrified. At this place there is a small pool which is the repository (II, p. 8) of a certain kusiut dancer.

(12) uxpekam, "The Walker," the name both of a supernatural being and the spot where it is localized. This is not far from the glacier that lies near the junction of the trails from Swaäli and Tälco; it is the largest one in the vicinity of Bella Coola and is said to move its position. The being is in some way connected with it, hence the name. [776]

WHY WINTER COMES

*539 In the beginning, five people came to earth as golden eagles at a point 756 above the present site of Firvale. Their names were *Ałkuny*ʷ, *787 *Kəmałuny*ʷ, Sexwnałx, Sexwnu-a, and their sister, utlumu-i. This woman had enormous power which she used malignly, attracting storms, and doing other evil things. So her four brothers threw her two miles down the valley into the narrow ravine where the old foot-trail used by the Carriers leaves the Bella Coola valley and goes up the mountains to [103] reach the rolling interior country. This barren gorge is known to this day as utlumu-i, and it is subject to the most severe winds in the whole district. Here the woman lived and bore a son, whose name has been forgotten.

At this time four brothers living in Xemqa-ts, depressed by a serious dispute with their father, decided to leave home, never to return. They set off up the valley, following the only trail. It so happened that utlumu-i had sent her son down to collect ocean food, and the four brothers met the youth on the way. After he had answered their questions as to where he was going and why, one of the brothers suggested that they bury him in a large, dry hole. They did so, covered him with branches and earth, and then continued their journey eastward. Presently they saw the house of utlumu-i, into which they peered through a crack in the wall. The woman did not see them, but at once became aware of their presence, and bade them enter through the door. In reply to her questions, they told her whence they had come, and then she asked them if they had seen her son.

"No," answered the four.

"That is strange," said utlumu-i. "There is only one trail up and down the valley."

The brothers still denied having met the boy, but she became suspicious and accused them of having killed him. She felt under her clothing for a small pump which she always carried concealed near her groin, and worked it until the house began to grow cold. As she continued, it grew colder and colder, until an icy wind swept the brothers into a corner, where they fell to the floor, numb and helpless. One retained sufficient consciousness to gasp out a confession, when she asked again what they had done with her son, adding that he was still alive, though they had hidden him in the ground. utlumu-i then stopped the cold and built up her fire, so that the brothers gradually recovered their strength. As soon as they were able she sent them back to exhume her son and bring him back to her.

In her delight at his safe return she said:

*About thirty-five miles up the Bella Coola valley, a short distance below Snaw-.

[The Dance of Thunder]

the uninitiated are expelled. If several tsakoiar in the same village are peoplgis of Thunder, each makes a circuit independently, but they agree to meet afterwards in the house of one of their number. Here all members of the society assemble for a meal provided hurriedly by X, or to a number of meals if several have Thunder as patron; in this case there is no pooling of food. The marshals take the opportunity of giving their customary admonitions, as if it were midwinter. Next the singers combine their ideas and hent out a new song of which the theme is Thunder who never rests; it is worded as if X were speaking and describing what his patron is doing. This song is sung and resung until all present have learnt both tune and words. If there are several tsakoiar with Thunder as patron, a song is made for each and practised in the same manner.

When all is ready, one of the heralds calls in the uninitiated. Each song is sung to the accompaniment of beating sticks while a dancer performs. Instead of X, this is an old man or woman who has not had a call for many years. Often the tsakoiar selected is so old that he or she can dance only with the support of a stick; no reason could be learnt for this surprising deviation from the usual practice. If several songs have been composed, a new dancer performs to each. After the last dance the uninitiated are expelled and the tsakoiar soon follow. Since no call has come, it follows that it is of a ceremonial, though not of a sacred nature, and does not take the regular course of winter dances. It is said to "make good the path of Thunder," the term employed being identical with that used for the dance on subsequent after the burning of the masks.

Nothing more need be said about the Thunder dance, except to give the following origin myth:

Long ago, long before the white man came to this land, but still longer after the first settlement, four brothers left Kimsquit to hunt mountain goats on Mount Pingalski, near the Kimsquit River.* It was September

(b) The word uqam, which is translated as crest, is used only for the dances of ancestral prerogatives which can never be attained except by those who are members of the ancestral family concerned. [424] [614]
(c) It was impossible to obtain literal translations of the subdivisions.
(d) A name which Swanton (I, p. 152) took for himself on earth. It is claimed that the composers of this song erred in using this designation.
(e) Swanton came down to the Kimsquit River, but the grandfather phoning represents the sentiment that men and stream come together.
(f) The Kimsquit River is sometimes named Ḵ'ulāwu on its name on chief. This designation was obtained by Swanton from Bella Bella, with his marriage to a woman of that tribe, and borrowed by him on the river. [103] [424]
(g) This song was used during the winter of 1923-4 and nearly led to friction. It is claimed that the right to the name Ḵmoqsnaxw was lost to a Kimsquit man who failed to return it. The borrower has been dead many years, but when his son presented to dance, one of the singers who was related to the original holder refused to take part in the singing. [578] [424] [424]

(a) Xemsh came down from above with siyuyuyut in the beginning of time; he had the prerogative of dancing at weddings. 533*

(b) Sulaqa likewise came down with siyuyuyut, bringing the same prerogative as Xemsh. 585

(c) The rest of this song has been forgotten. [773]

Fragmentary and short as are these songs, they are more elaborate than many used at weddings. These frequently contain no words, merely an ancient tune accompanied by humming and meaningless choral interjections.[4] [424]

SHAMING SONGS

Songs of this type are sung by the singers while the principal performer dances; in this respect, they resemble sisaok compositions and differ entirely from the abbreviated and individualistic wedding songs. Though used primarily to shame a runaway husband or wife, one is sometimes employed on other occasions. 533* 586 578 [585]

(c) It was impossible to obtain translations of each subdivision.

(d) Any weakness is picked upon in a shaming song. Nulkitl must have failed to perform rites of any kind, and the feminine mockers chose to deride him for this instead of his faithlessness.

(e) It was impossible to obtain translations of each subdivision.

(f) Silias was one of the regular Kimsquit singers who had shown especial aptitude in the insertion of obscene expressions to songs used by men to deride faithless women. The women apparently considered this a good opportunity to voice their general disapproval by coupling his name with that of Nulkitl. Silias had suffered a broken arm when fighting and it had been badly set.

714 and one was held up by the bow paddler as the craft neared the 726 shore to protect him and those behind from arrows and stones cast by slings. When not in use, shields were laid away in boxes with some white substance resembling flour.[9] On the [103] shore of the fiord below Bella Coola, opposite Winter Bay, there are some boulders of the same white tint; even now these are often spoken of as "The Shields of the Bella Coola." It is said that hostile raiders, seeing them, used to remark that they had reached the outposts of Bella Coola.

726 The same lack of leadership shown during preparations for a war was evident during hostilities. The so-called leader had 701 little authority over his men, who could desert and return home 703 at any time. Lack of martial ability among their own chiefs [648] sometimes led the Bella Coola to place themselves under the [642] authority of a Bella Bella in a way which would be impossible for a war-like people. Frequently such divided leadership led to disaster, and is the surest proof that the Bella Coola were not as aggressive or bellicose as other coastal tribes.

726 Except when attacking the Carriers, all raiding parties
[533] embarked in canoes and followed a definite order of procedure [703] handed down from the past. In the stern of each craft sat the captain, a chief, who, as the craft was leaving, began to sing his xe-tla song, keeping time to it with the beats of his paddle; the recounting of the glories of their ancestors was supposed to encourage the warriors. Instead of leaving simultaneously, a rendezvous was often chosen down the fiord, and the expedition finally moved off from there when all the canoes had arrived. While still in friendly territory, a flotilla proceeded 726 openly. A small amount of dried salmon and water was car-
789 ried by a war party and morsels of the former were eaten at intervals. The bow-man took as much food and drink as he thought could be consumed at one sitting, put a fragment of dried salmon in his mouth, chewed it four times on the same side of his mouth as he was paddling, and swallowed it. The place called Numammish was so named because the people thought they saw flies and they said mammish, but when the supposed flies fell they were seen to be toads.

Among the Ulkatcho, this fly was called Asthuz, and was said to lay its eggs on salmon. To keep off flies of all kinds and mosquitoes the blossoms of the cow parsnip, Heracleum lanatum Michx, called Goosss in Ulkatcho, were put in oil of the eulachon fish or any kind of oil and the mixture was put on the body. Every food that was smoked was smoked so that flies would keep away from it. Flies were not used as fish bait.

Among the Bellacoola it is called Silt lay estl. It is said to lay its eggs in the backs of the caribou in July, and these hatch into "worms." The face and eyes, being pretty, were used long ago as a pattern for a picture which was painted on fine boxes. There was no story of this fly.

Since the end of the last century they have dwindled down in numbers, and a few only of their once populous villages are still inhabited, namely, Sâtaq, at the head of Dean Inlet; Nûtl'a'l, at the mouth of Salmon River; Naqa'lkn (which embraces five villages, at the mouth of Bella Coola River; Stû'in, twenty-eight miles up Bella Coola River; and Tâ'lio, at the head of South Bentinck Arm. The dialect of Nûtl'a'l and Sâtaq differs slightly from that of the other villages. The following is a list of their ancient villages, most of which are still inhabited at certain seasons, although not regularly:—

1. Sâtaq.
2. Nûtl'a'l. The tribe of this place is called Sûtalxmx.
3. Naqa'lkn, embracing the villages K'ûmkû'ûts and Stskû'ûtl on the north side, Pû'ûsla and Natai'ûstakûnt on the south side of the river.

14. Sûû'l'ûlatl. Nos. 4 to 14 are situated along Bella Coola River, and are given as they are met with in ascending the river.
15. Stû'aqtl, at the confluence of Bella Coola and Driver (?) Rivers.
16. Tâ'lû, at the head of South Bentinck Arm, embracing K'ûs'pû, Tâ'lio, Nû'lû', A'ûtû.
17. K'ûû'lûs, at the bay of that name in the southern entrance of Bentinck Arm. On the north entrance of Bentinck Arm were the Kûû'ûl, but it is doubtful whether they belonged to the Bîqûla or to the Hû'ûmk. The latter call the people of Dean Inlet Ki'ûkûnûq.

Each of these tribes is subdivided into gentes, which appear to be arranged in exogamic groups. I learnt the names of the following gentes, which bear the names of their ancestors:—

Gentes of the Naqa'lkmx:

1. Tsk'ûû'ûs (=looking down on his family).
2. Sqûqûû'ûmq; Qû'ûtsûs name: Mâ'ûkyûlatl (see p. 415).
3. Sûûlqûlû'ûq.

Gentes of the Nûk'ûû'ûstûmx:

2. K'ûûqûûlû'ûû.

Gentes of the Tâlû'ûmx:

This implement is filled with cedar-bark and eagle-down, and is shaken by the dancer. The eagle-down is thus made to fly about in the house, symbolizing the wealth and power of the Thunder-bird.

IV.

184 In the preceding pages, I have summarized the principal features of 773 Bella Coola mythology, which are characteristic of the traditions of the whole tribe. Besides these, there are other groups of traditions which are very conflicting. One reason for the existence of numerous contradictory traditions must be looked for in the peculiar social organization of the Bella Coola. In former times, when the tribe was populous, the Bella Coola inhabited a great many villages. The inhabitants of each village are considered the descendants of a number of mythical ancestors who were sent down by Sun. Each of these village communities has traditions of its own, which are its property, and which are not well known to the rest of the tribe. Many of these traditions refer to the origin of our world, and for this reason a number of the most important myths differ in various villages. Indications of such conflicting ideas may be found in the traditions recorded in the preceding pages. To make this subject clear, it is necessary to describe somewhat fully the traditions belonging to a number of village communities. Before recording these traditions I shall enumerate the villages of the tribe.
103 The following list is the result of repeated inquiries. In it the names and 361 locations of the villages are given in consecutive order from the mouth of 773 Bentinck Arm upward along Bella Coola River, and the names of the mythical ancestors of the village communities have been ascertained.

361 773 It is very remarkable, that, besides the ancestors of the villages enumerated here, the Bella Coola state that the Sun created a number of men whom he sent down to a mountain on Skeena River, and that they become the ancestors of a part of the Tsimshian. Another group of men was sent down to Bute Inlet, and later on migrated to Bella Coola River. The names of these villages and men are as follows:—

Village.	Ancestors.
Nuup'pes (Skeena River)	Tsqa'mnem, A'nnet, Nnel'ya, and three under K'imlqa'n.
Nx'es (Bute Inlet)	Nnanokem, Annetma'nem, Spd'a-pestnem, Tlmonk'a.

The full traditions relevant to them will be found at the end of this chapter. Each of these ancestors, when sent down to our world, received a salmon-weir, which was placed across the river at the locality where they built their village. I shall now relate a number of traditions of the various villages.

Tradition of Nx'ela.

680 In the beginning our world was dark. At that time Totem'ex descended from heaven, and reached our world on a mountain near the river Wa'k'i-tsmpi (Fraser River). Here he built a house, in which he lived in the company of the Raven. The latter had a black canoe which was called "Raven." The two resolved to travel in order to find people. They descended the river until they came to the sea. After some time they reached a house which was covered inside and outside with abalone shells. The totem-post of the house was also covered with shells. It shone like the sun. They saw a canoe on the beach, and this too was completely covered with abalone shells. A chief, whose name was Pulsant'mx ("abalone man"), invited them to enter his house. As soon as Totem'ex reached this place, the sun rose. If he had not found the place of the abalone chief, there would be no sun. Totem'ex did not wish to stay. He looked at the house, and saw something turning about on top of it. When they came nearer, he saw that it was a Mink, which was running about on the roof. Many people were inside the house. When Totem'ex approached and saw the beautiful canoe, he wished to have it. He offered the chief their canoe in exchange. This offer was accepted, and Totem'ex travelled on with the abalone canoe. The Raven stayed with the abalone chief. Totem'ex continued his travels, following the course of the sun. First he travelled southward, and came to the post which stands in the west of our world. From here he travelled on, and reached the copper country, which is situated

membering, and rendering of songs; in 1923 it was found that Jim Pollard (see Plate 4) alone had a sufficiently accurate memory to act as announcer. As more and more men wished to perform, he found himself unable to keep the texts in order, and asked me to join the choir as prompter. I held this position for the rest of the winter, taking a full part in every ceremony. Although the old customs had broken down enormously, this actual participation enabled me to understand the winter dances in a manner impossible from mere description. Later on, phonographic records were made of many of the songs used, thus preserving specimens of the fast disappearing music. 125 796 887 [126]

My intimate association with the Bella Coola enabled me to collect the material here presented which, having been verified and reverified, I have every reason to believe is correct. Nevertheless, it has one serious defect owing to the lack of acuteness of my ear. I found it almost impossible to differentiate certain sounds; in fact, I sometimes recorded the same word with different spellings. Consequently, I cannot guarantee the accuracy of the native terms used in this monograph. Moreover, I was entirely unable to analyze proper names, which would have been of great value in understanding the attributes of supernatural beings. 128 109

When writing up field notes, the realization of my own inefficiency in the recording of sounds tempted me to rely upon the spelling of Boas whenever possible. After considerable hesitation, I rejected this course for the following reason. Ethnological work falls into two categories, descriptive and comparative. This monograph is of the former type, based on actual work in the field and the inclusion of any material from another source would destroy its originality. I believe that a descriptive work should consist exclusively of the author's own research, and I have adhered to this principle in spite of the advantages which would have followed the use of Boas' linguistic terms. For the same reason no attempt has been made to compare the customs and beliefs of the Bella Coola with those of other tribes, although this would undoubtedly have shed 128

produced here. I can only place on record my deep obligation and gratitude to each of these four. Dr. D. Jenness, who succeeded Dr. Sapir, was most co-operative. In Bella Coola, I was treated with uniform kindness by the white inhabitants, particularly Mrs. Clayton, Mr. and Mrs. Bert Robson, and Mr. and Mrs. Andy Christensen. 000 [127]

Finally, and most important of all, I wish to express my appreciation to the Bella Coola themselves. Without their generous, kindly and helpful co-operation, this book could never have been written. I came as an uninvited stranger; they treated me as a friend and a guest; and I left with intense regret. My chief friends were Joshua Moody, Captain Schooner, and Jim Pollard, but I was also greatly assisted by Mr. Willie Mack, Mr. and Mrs. Tallio Charlie, and Mr. and Mrs. Lame Charlie. To a host of others I am indebted in only a slightly less extent. The aid and friendship of these men and women is one of my pleasantest memories, and one which I wish to record in all gratitude and appreciation. [115]

In the actual publication of this complicated manuscript, I have likewise been fortunate in receiving co-operation and help. The University of Toronto Press accepted it for publication during the war, facing—and overcoming—the inevitable shortage of materials and of skilled craftsmen. Great difficulty was experienced in obtaining the type for phonetic symbols; to avoid undue duplication all native words, whether proper or common names, have been printed in italics. It is a tribute to the Press that it has completed the work. I am especially indebted to several former members of the editorial staff: Mrs. Hewitt, who supervised the initial editing, and her assistants, Mrs. Hackett and Mrs. Bunk. Mr. Weir, foreman of the composing room of the Press, has surmounted endless difficulties with enthusiasm and ingenuity. I am also grateful to Miss Harmer, Associate Editor, who took the responsibility for final production details. Mr. Burns, General Manager of the Press, and Professor Brown, Editor, have both been helpful and co-operative throughout. 128 [104] 000 and other relatives of their mothers as to their fathers. It was taken as a matter of course that a child had full rights in the village of his mother, and from her, as from her relatives, he likewise received various prerogatives. Thus each child was a member of a bilateral social group. From actual residence in his father's village he tended to be more intimately associated with him and his brothers than with his mother's relatives, but this did not prevent him from visiting at the home of the latter, where he was received as a member of that village. Through the bestowal of prerogatives by his mother and the members of her family, his relationship with them was further emphasized. Such a child was, in fact, a full member of two groups. 775

When the members of the second generation married and beget children, each of these could have been a member of four groups; that of his father's father, father's mother, mother's father, and mother's mother. The Bella Coola believe that there were approximately forty-five groups of first settlers, corresponding to the forty-five towns, and it is obvious that if the system of intermarriage had continued for a few generations, a man would have been a member of each of these first groups. They assume that their first ancestors came to this earth far more than a few generations ago, and yet at the present time no one claims to be a descendant of more than eight of these first groups, and most claim descent from only two or three. In part this can be explained by forgetfulness, though a Bella Coola would regard this statement as heresy. The residence of a man in the village of his father has tended to emphasize relationship with the ancestral group that first populated that village, and there is no doubt that actual relationship, through the mother, with the members of other groups must in many cases have been forgotten in the course of generations. The term ancestral family, mamaxts, is used in this monograph to designate those individuals who believe themselves to be descended from one of the first groups that populated this earth. [614] [611] [614] [104]

1777 from the Bella Bella, a fact emphasized by all. It is not dif-424 ficult to understand, therefore, why elaborate myths are lacking, 551 even if such were possessed by the Bella Bella. The Bella
575 Coola possessed certain similar rites to which the Bella Bella [779] prerogatives were in the process of being grafted at the time of the coming of the white man. There has since been general decay of ceremonial life, with the result that the whole situation is in a state of flux presenting great difficulties to the investigator.

428 Sacred names are willed and inherited in the manner already 551 described for other prerogatives. The type of dance, and the 575 time of use, will be described in the following section of this chapter.

The Potlatch

* 556 It is unfortunate that an adequate treatment of Rank
128 among the Bella Coola requires a description of the potlatch since this ceremony, or rather group of ceremonies, includes a number of features which, logically, should have been postponed until a later stage of this monograph. An effort has been made to lessen reference to non-ritualistic features by the description, just given, of the basic concepts of chieftainship and the sacred society. Other ideas will require rather lengthy digressions, a method of presentation which seems preferable to the use of many foot-notes, its only alternative.

General Observations

● 184 In scientific and popular writings alike, the term "pot-
* 556 latch" has been applied both to the public giving of presents, [431] and to the rites at which this occurs. But among the Bella Coola, such distribution of gifts is necessary at every ceremonial; accordingly, each is essentially a potlatch. There is one, however, which the inhabitants regard as the most important of all, the goal which every ambitious man aims to reach, the rite in which his ancestral myth can be displayed. In this monograph the term "potlatch" will be limited to this, the hem.

1:36:Dewalth E-5 (1922-1924)948

Every Bella Coola is, or should be, able to recount how, in the beginning of time, the supreme god, Alquntám, caused his ancestors to be created in his house in the land above, whence they were sent down to populate the earth. A creation legend of this type is a man's most treasured possession.[1] Most myths describe the adventures of these first people, how they prospered in the Bella Coola country until they were able to invite to their homes guests from far and near, to whom they showed what they had achieved, through the assistance of Alquntám, or of some other supernatural being. In so doing they were carrying out Alquntám's wishes. He told some of these first people that if they accumulated much wealth, in those days chiefly food, there was danger that the provisions first stored would rot, hence they should cut away the bottom of the pile and present it to other men and women. The Bella Coola term for "to cut out that which is rotten" is hêl, hence the origin, according to their belief, of the word hem, which thus has the significance of "a giving away of long accumulated goods which otherwise might rot."

By the splendour of his gifts each of the first people able to give a potlatch (hem), spread the knowledge of his name and fame to the towns whence his guests had assembled. Further, those who had received dances from Alquntám were able to demonstrate them. In course of time those who had first given potlatches died, but on taking their fathers' names, the sons, or other descendants, endeavoured to uphold the parental tradition by inviting guests from afar and giving them valuable presents. At such a ceremony the family history, or family myth, was recounted, so that the donor of a potlatch not only increased his own prestige, he incorporated therewith the traditions of his parent. This is the essence of the potlatch as carried out today.[2]

[2] We have found conditions to be the present time throughout, although the potlatch is not now carried out in its entirety.

556 wards and forwards sway the contestants with shouting and merriment, and those who have failed to carry away their boxes of food hasten to remove them out of the danger zone. It is a time of licence, and even one of the most influential chiefs may be struck by the ram or his food scattered without consideration. The ram is driven back, but those who bear it steer the log so that instead of passing out through the door it strikes the front wall, shattering some of the boards with their old paintings. With a shout they drive forwards again until part of the wall at the back of the house is likewise destroyed. Then those within the house gain the mastery and the log is carried outside, dragging its struggling bearers with it. They drop the log and return inside as if nothing untoward had occurred. This destruction of the house walls is a necessary preparation for their replacement with new paintings on new boards. When quiet has been restored a herald stands up.

"Listen!" he cries. "Ye chiefs, ye wives of chiefs, and ye commoners, soon we shall hear the supernatural beings."

533 Then the singers* beat out the tune of any kusiut. He whose 535 song it is begins to dance, using the type of which he has the 575 prerogative, but as the supernatural being with whom he has 556 a ceremonial affinity is not present, the dance is not considered sacred. As soon as one kusiut has finished, the tune of another is beaten, and he too dances. The singers change from kusiut to kusiut, and please themselves about the order in which they shall dance, also about how many shall perform. This continues until late in the night. Then they beat out a nasek tune and the member of that society to whom it belongs performs his dance, a non-sacred affair, like those of the kusiut. One after another dances as his or her tune is beaten out, until dawn approaches. Meanwhile several nasek have been sent outside

*Throughout in this monograph the term "singer" will be used as a translation of the Bella Coola word, nuxiut. The singers sit together behind the fire. It is their duty to remember the tune and text of every song; to beat out this tune for every dancer and to accompany him by singing the words of his song.

ever object was desired, and then set in a window of his house so that the sun could fall on one uncovered end. The owner firmly believes that this stone has brought him money on various occasions, and will do so again, though whether he expects the coins to be found inside of the wrapping, or merely to come to him in the course of trade is questionable. According to Bella Coola belief, they ought to appear beside the stone, but as this man attributes any good fortune to it, he never has any difficulty in proving its powers. 777 823

This stone is also used as a means of increasing the efficacy of prayer. When its owner washes ceremonially in the river before eating in the morning, he rubs it over his body as if it were soap and requests it to make him strong, make him well, grant him his desires, and so forth. [515] [789]

Shamanism

More important to the Bella Coola than any other manifestation of the supernatural is that power which makes an individual either an ätakwala or an äskankats. The former is a person who, owing to ability granted him by a supernatural being, is able to perform miraculous feats, especially in curing the sick; the latter is one with similar powers obtained from a ghost.[1] It is impossible to translate either of these terms accurately; the designation "shaman" is accordingly used in this monograph to describe both types of supernaturally endowed individuals. The most common and most important method of obtaining such power is from a living supernatural being; a person receiving the boon in this manner will be termed "shaman," and one empowered by a ghost will be known as "shaman from the dead." 104 ● 756 * [787] * [788]

The Bella Coola believe that long ago men were so much more powerful than at present, and so close to the supernatural, that all were virtually shamans. The prowess and adventures 956 * 773 558

[1] Ghosts are, of course, supernatural, but as the Bella Coola distinguish between shamans whose powers are derived from these two sources, it is convenient to follow their example.

575 more difficult dramatic rites in which failure would lead to the 796 unwilling learning the mysteries of the society, the matter is 824 debated at length. The writer was present at one meeting held for this purpose, with regard to a performance which had not been carried out for over thirty years. An air of solemnity was evident throughout, as if each present realized the gravity of the topic. The prospective dancer explained what he wished to do, then anyone was at liberty to comment, and most of those present took advantage of it, the marshals speaking last of all. The influence of each speaker depended in part on the [854] type of hactsa dance which he himself had given, and in part on his general status in the community as chief or otherwise, an intangible position dependent on public estimation rather than upon functional rights. In this case, after considerable discussion, it was decided that the dancer could proceed with his arrangements. But if there should be any doubt as to the would-be performer's ability, the marshals have no hesitation in prohibiting his intended rite, and they often do so later if rehearsals show that it is unlikely to be successful.

Refusal of permission to perform occurs only in case of the more difficult dances, which include the Cannibal, Scratch, Breaker, Fungus and Eucinnu. Members of the society whose prerogatives are for one of these types are considered as having greater importance than those who can merely sing of some minor deity-person; yet all are equally members of the hactsa society, which is not graded according to the performances of its members.

575 Many of the more difficult dances require weeks of pre-796 paration, when it is sometimes said that the dancer has disappeared to the land above. When he returns they usually conclude in four nights, the time taken by those of a simpler type. Each of these nights is known by an unremarkable name, and, as it will be necessary to use these throughout, it may assist the reader to summarize the ritual which takes place on each. It can be assumed that it is a simple dance, that is, one without elaborate preliminaries.

The first night is kumhlaic or kumimem.[1] This is when the call comes to a prospective dancer. This may be heralded by whistling from above, made by a hactar sent with a whistle to a neighbouring mountain for the purpose, by a thud on the roof, likewise produced by an accomplice, or by no intimation whatever. The dancer utters a low call, sometimes begins to walk in circles with bent head, or to act in some other peculiar manner, while a whistle sounds repeatedly. The uninitiated are at once expelled from his house and a herald informs the village that something strange has come upon the dancer. The hakactar gather in his house, and four times help him by the frenzied, but regular, beating of sticks. Then the singers sing a song previously prepared, the words describing either his person or the land above. After listening closely, the hakactar join in and rehearse it until it is familiar. The dancer may or may not perform; if he is inclined to the steps, he does so for practice. If the hour is not too late, the singers may choose, purely for practice, to beat out a number of the songs of those hakactar who have already performed during the ceremonial season. A meal, provided by the dancer and his family, is then served. The singers now beat out the dancer's song once more and he dances, concluding the evening's performance. Novices and those who have already performed during the season take up their abode in the dancer's house, where they remain for the ensuing four days and nights.

The second day is nactactlaqa.[2] Quite early in the morning a herald calls the hakactar to the dancer's house, an invitation accepted by as many as wish to do so. A second song is usually composed and practised in the same manner as on the previous evening. Several hakactar are sent to the forest to cut wood for masks, the number of sections required depending upon the number to be used. In the evening all members of the society assemble to practise the songs.[3] The making of the masks is allotted to different hahaiat, usually in accordance with the dancer's wishes, although a marshal normally gives out the actual tasks. The dancer, or one of his relatives, bestows presents on each person to whom work is allotted. The evening of maximilian is called mellimakun.

The third day is qutca. Those to whom mask making has been entrusted assemble early in the dancer's house to start their work. About noon they are provided with a meal, to which other hahaiat may be invited. By late afternoon, when most of the work has been accomplished, the chips are carefully swept up and burnt, and the house tidied, ready for the uninitiated who will be invited during the evening. On either this day or the one preceding, a platform, with raised sides, is built behind the fire on which the dancer can conceal himself and where he is supposed to remain during the remainder of the four days. About dusk the hahaiat are called in; the singers take their places behind the fire, Cannibals, Breakers, and Scratchers are in one of the back corners, where a screening enclosure may have been constructed for them, and the remainder group themselves without distinction around the walls. In Kimsquit, though not in Bella Coola, one or more of the masks may be displayed, suspended from a sloping pole behind the fire. If the singers think it necessary, they may practise the dancer's two songs once more. Then the uninitiated are called in, taking their places near the doorway. The singers beat out one of the dancer's songs and he dances in time to it, and the same is repeated for his second song. After some delay, which appears to be one of the requisites of every hahaiat performance, the singers strike up the songs of either a novice or a hahaiat, especially one who has already had a call during the ceremonial season, and the one thus summoned dances to his two songs. Late in the season, when many hahaiat have performed, only one song may be used, to prevent the ceremony dragging out to an interminable length, and songs of previous years are omitted. In any case, the ritual lasts for most of the night. When all have danced, the uninitiated are expelled, with the exception of the sisaá to whom, as guests, a meal is served. Then they too leave and the kukusiut eat together. Finally, the singers strike up one of the dancer's songs, and he dances to it to end the evening's rites. 575* 796

The fourth day is nakusam, "That Which Is Opened." During the day the carpenters work to complete the masks, and towards dusk the house is again put in order. The kukusiut are summoned again to practise the songs, if necessary, and always to arrange who shall wear the masks, a matter left to the marshals and the carpenters. Then the uninitiated are called in to see the masked figures and watch any dramatic representation. After their exclusion, the masks are burnt. Then the kukusiut gather outside the dancer's house where his song is sung once more to send his call back above. Frequently another kusiut now receives a call, so that the nakusam of one dancer is likewise the kustāmem for another. The kukusiut assemble in the latter's house, but the uninitiated are not allowed to return to that from which they have been ejected until the platform-enclosure has been destroyed at the end of the season. [104] [532] [533] [532]

A word might be said about kusiut paraphernalia, although much of this will have to be described in detail for special dances. Boas gives illustrations of a large number of kusiut masks and gives such an admirable description of them that little need be added. They are carved from the solid wood, the larger of beech, the smaller of alder, and each carpenter endeavours to make a striking effigy of the being portrayed. Kwātkwātsair is present at every dance and has become so well standardized that she can always be recognized. This is true, also, for Thunder, Echo, the kaokas, the Laugher, the Hermaphrodite, and a few other supernatural beings, but so much variation occurs in others that even a kusiut of much experience cannot always tell what being is represented. The masks are painted, and sometimes the designs indicate the being, even though the carving fails to do so; verisimilitude is 575* 796 532 [114] [824] [776]

787 pursuers can secure him. No effort is spared to make the man-hunt realistic. Then they carry the captive, struggling and biting, to the canoes and set out for the village. The preliminaries are lengthened or cuttailed until the tide is favourable for the navigation of the craft; about two hours is the usual time consumed. When in mid-stream, the cry, ye ··, is again raised; the supposed Cannibal has once more escaped! All this time X himself has been hiding in or near the village, and he now appears. Instantly the kukusiut left in the neighbourhood set off in pursuit, those returning on the canoes hurry their passage and join the chase. After a struggle they succeed in capturing X and bringing him to the village.

The Cannibal acts like a demoniac animal, struggling, kicking, and biting as if his adventures had entirely destroyed his reason. He drags his captors, a number of strong kukusiut, to the various houses, and they are barely able to restrain him within the doorways and to force him out, biting and raving at them. A skilful actor is able to impress the uninitiated to a considerable extent, and of course he is supported by his associates. When every house has been visited, X is carried back to his own and a herald summons all the kukusiut to cure him. The uninitiated are allowed to crowd near the door to watch.

The assumption is that X has had the nature and instincts of an animal enter into him; if this cannibalistic incubus[11] can be driven out by beating time, he will be restored to sanity. Two long, thin sounding-boards have been prepared previously, [534] as well as a number of birch sticks with which the kukusiut beat time. One man stands up to lead the drummers, and the sticks rise and fall in unison with his movements, in the manner previously described. At first X prowls around the house,

ENTOMOLOGY AMONG THE BELLACOOLA AND CARRIER INDIANS

By HARLAN I. SMITH

B 131

THE Bellacoola Indians live in the Norway of Canada, about midway of the Pacific Coast, where Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the first white man to cross Canada, reached the sea; that is, about half way between Vancouver and Prince Rupert. Their country is around the head of the inlets about sixty miles in from or east of Ocean Falls and the usual route of the steamers up and down the coast. This inland passage is with few exceptions protected by the outer fringe of islands. The Bellacoola language is one of the Salish linguistic stock. The people are of the typical North Pacific Coast culture, characterized by the extensive use of red cedar and sea products, especially salmon, huge houses of split cedar planks with carved house posts, and totem poles, and immense seagoing canoes dug out of cedar. They were expert carpenters and had a peculiar art, especially in painting and carving, largely of conventionalized animal forms—a valuable contribution to the art of the world. This art may become of great financial value to the manufacturers of this country as well as a magnet capable of exploitation to bring in tourists with money from foreign lands. These Indians had a very highly developed social organization, many dramas and rituals, and a complex financial system popularly known as the potlatch.

The Carrier Indians of Ulkatcho, on the other head, live in the high plateau of the semi-arid region, perhaps 75 miles northeast of the Bellacoola. They differ from the Bellacoola in language, appearance, and culture perhaps as much as do the Turks from the English. They had a less realistic art, which was largely geometric and pictographic, highly conventionalized and symbolic. Their social organization and financial system also were less highly developed.

of these data refer to insects, and may be of interest to entomologists, although my spelling of Indian words is very problematical, because some of the sounds I can neither hear nor make, and I am unable to record adequately many of those that I can hear. The data here given are preliminary to a complete working over of my notes, but are believed to be nearly complete.

Insects apparently were not so well observed by the Bellacoola as were useful mammals and plants, the stinger of the bumble-bee, for instance, being supposed to be in its mouth. Few insects had names, that is, mainly those which were used or which troubled the Indians. Insects were not used for food, and honey was unknown until after the coming of the white man. The head of the gad-fly was used as a pattern in painting designs, the nest of the yellow-jacket in sympathetic magic or witchcraft, and "fly spit" was said to be good for sores. They had a story about the bumble-bee.

Among the Ulkatcho also observation of insects was weaker than that of mammals and plants, and they apparently had names for only a few insects, those which troubled them. Ant lyon pits and its method of taking prey were known. Insects were of no use to the Ulkatcho whatever. An instance was observed of an Indian smoking himself with a buzzing fly held in his mouth. They employed smudges, fish oil, gum of the cottonwood, and blossoms of cow parsnip with oil to protect themselves from mosquitoes, black flies and no-see-ums, and smoke to protect foods from flies.

The Ant lyon, among the Ulkatcho, is called Kinoolkats. It is said to be numerous at Ulkatcho, but that it was useless and that there was no story about it. My informant voluntarily showed me the pits made by the larvae of this insect and, catching ants for the purpose, demonstrated its well-known method of taking its prey.

The grasshopper (Dvikepiwi), that makes a noise by rubbing its wings together when it flies, was called Tolcus, among the Ulkatcho.

"Fly spit," that is the material surrounding a nymph of a spittle insect, also known as a frog hopper (Cercopidae), is said the shore of the Pacific in 1791. As a result of this intercommunication between the Bilqula and Tinneh it is found that houses essentially similar to those of the Coast Indians in mode of construction and ornamentation, though smaller and less skilfully built, occur far inland on the upper waters of the Salmon and Blackwater Rivers; while, on the other hand, the practical identity of some points in the mythology of the Bilqula with that of the Tinneh of the interior is a clear instance of reciprocal influence.

The second part of the report will be found to contain the most complete series thus far obtained of anthropological measurements relating to the tribes of the North-West Coast, with a discussion by the author of the data which these afford, in which several points of value are brought out and important suggestions are made for further inquiry. In this connection it must be mentioned that the committee are much indebted to the courteous and enlightened liberality of Major J. W. Powell, Director of the U.S. Bureau of Ethnology, who has permitted Dr. Boas to incorporate with the measurements obtained in British Columbia those made by him in Washington and Oregon under Major Powell's directions. It has thus been possible for Dr. Boas to give to his treatment of this subject a comprehensive character, which could not otherwise have been obtained, by enlarging the scope of his discussion so as to include the more or less intimately related tribes of the Pacific States with those of the Province of British Columbia itself.

Third Report on the Indians of British Columbia.
By Dr. FRANZ BOAS.

104 The following alphabet has been used in the report:—

The vowels have their continental sounds, namely: a, as in father; e, like a in mate; i, as in machine; o, as in note; u, as in rule.

In addition the following are used: ä, ö, as in German; d=ow in how; gwa in Roger (Leguine's q).

Among the consonants the following additional letters have been used: g', a very guttural g, similar to gr; k', a very guttural k, similar to kr; q, the German ch in bach; x, the German ch in ich; c, between q and x; rwah in shore; s, as th in this; tl, an explosive l; dl, a palatal l, pronounced with the back of the tongue (dorso-apical).

THE BILQULA.

105 The Bilqula, who are generally called Bella Coola, are the most northern tribe belonging to the Salish family. They are separated from the tribes speaking allied languages by the Chilcotin (of the Tinneh stock) in the interior, and on the coast by the Kwakiutl. Their language is—considered grammatically—more closely related to the dialects of the Coast Salish than to those of the tribes of the interior. A number of terms referring to the sea and sea-animals are the same in Bilqula and in the dialects of the Gulf of Georgia; so that we may safely assume that the two groups of tribes were at one time closely related, and that the Bilqula were differentiated from this group. They inhabit the coasts of Bentinck Arm and Dean Inlet, as shown on the map accompanying the sixth report of the committee, and extend far up Bella Coola River. Since the end of last century they

177 he revealed himself as a tribal patriarch, proud of his family's [153] history and eager to assist his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, but feeling himself lost and helpless in the struggle before them. With sadness, but without bitterness, he used to speak of the approaching end of Bella Coola culture, and his words brought home the tragedy which the spread of civilization brings to so many, and the responsibility resting upon the white people as a whole.

153 Until an intelligence test is devised to correlate the mental 115 ability of the white man with that of the native, it is impossible to compare the two scientifically. None the less, the writer deliberately expresses the opinion that Joshua Moody and Jim Pollard are two of the most brilliant men he has met in any walk of life. They are undoubtedly the most able of the Bella Coola; others have only slightly less ability, while the mass of the population compares favourably with an 178 average white community. Their ability, however, is definitely conditioned by their conservatism. Absolute trust in the traditions of their ancestors has checked speculation, as the established explanation is never questioned; new inventions, unauthorized by custom, have been regarded as almost sacri-
[624] legious; the force of public opinion, while valuable as a deterrent to anti-social practices, has effectively restrained innovations. The Bella Coola are a good example of a community where development has been atrophied by extreme conservatism fostered by religious beliefs.

•105 Taking into account the material obstacles, the achievements of these people have not been insignificant. In former [322] times, provided only with tools of stone and untempered copper, they built graceful canoes, made watertight boxes, hewed planks from mighty cedars, and erected large houses which called for considerable engineering skill. Judged by [532] white standards, their carving and painting lacked artistic deli-
[535] cacy, but it required no mean ability to portray crest designs to meet their own standards. Passing from the purely mechanical to the aesthetic, their skill in dancing and dramatics is noteworthy: no one who has witnessed a native dance can fail to have been impressed by the performance of the participants and the stage-craft of the carpenters. The fact that no system of writing had ever been devised has prevented the establishment of a native literature, but the practice of passing down an extensive folklore by word of mouth shows their narrative powers as well as their faculty for remembering details. At present it is difficult to appreciate what must have been their energy in earlier times when they faced the struggle for existence, armed with stone tools. Abundant salmon gave them adequate food, but only when weirs had been built with great labour. Though game was plentiful, the hunter was equipped with nothing more formidable than a bow and arrow. The simplest task required patience and skill undreamed of by the average white man. If the reader will allow his imagination to carry him backwards two hundred years, he will realize that the mere provision of food and clothing necessitated constant effort and ceaseless exertion.

Hand in hand with many admirable characteristics, the Bella Coola display others which strike the white man as unprepossessing. A first impression is the untidiness of their houses. Exteriorly, they are often fairly neat, but confusion reigns within. Clothing, instead of being hung up, is left lying on the floor; bed-coverings are piled carelessly; dirty dishes cover the tables; dogs and children swarm over the floor; flies abound; all is dirty and slovenly. The house itself may be uncompleted; a window lacks glass and has been boarded up; the roof leaks, or the steps are falling down. Nor are the surroundings more attractive. There is one struggling flower-bed in the village, but elsewhere the houses are surrounded by wastes of mud where horses and cattle wander, dogs prowl, and children play. In the distance the mountain peaks rise in splendour, but near at hand all is squalid and unkempt.

They are only slightly more particular about their personal appearance. Dirt does not distress them. They wash octagroup. The moral code is not concerned with animals. The life of the Bella Coola would be unbearable to most white people, yet they find it far from unpleasant. They sigh at present conditions, but there is much to amuse them notwithstanding. If several people are talking together, one is sure to hear bursts of laughter every few minutes. It takes little to interest them; a story they have heard a hundred times, the troubles of a neighbour with his wife, the eccentricity of a white man, the stupidity of the investigator, any of these is enough to cause a hearty laugh. When collecting information, it was constantly necessary to joke with them; the most feeble witticism was enough, but they lost interest in the work unless kept smiling. Their sense of humour is not refined; jests about sexual matters are common and are enjoyed alike by men, women, and children. It is not that their tastes are perverted, but rather that they have no reticence in discussing this topic, so they find it easy to see the ludicrous aspects of a subject which is ever near the surface in their minds. They have no hesitation in poking fun at their friends; a successful practical joke, such as hiding the writer's tobacco, is enough to fill them with amusement. If the victim shows temporary resentment, the glee of his friends is complete, and shrieks of laughter usually terminate the trick.

Unless the white man who comes to live among the Bella Coola is unusually broad-minded, he is at first repelled by the dirt and unsightliness prevailing everywhere; even the people themselves seem unnatural. He finds it difficult to realize the sincerity of their religious beliefs, and the manner in which these influence their daily lives is hard to grasp. The potlatch system appears so grotesque that it seems to reflect a psychology diametrically opposed to his own. The force of public opinion on personal conduct is almost incomprehensible. Gradually, however, he begins to understand the reasons underlying Bella Coola life. The potlatch becomes intelligible when regarded as a means of achieving fame; constant attention to supernatural beings is natural considering the firm conviction of their environment; the guiding force of public opinion is seen as a check on individual license, fostered or inculcated by the ties which hold together extended families and make it impossible for a man to lead an isolated life where others will not be affected by his actions. If the white man is willing to receive new ideas, he will learn much from the comments of the Bella Coola on his own customs. Many have been to Victoria or Vancouver, and they feel that the contrasts of wealth observable in such big cities are atrocious; they ask how this is compatible with Christianity. They feel that it is unnatural for a man not to receive support from his cousins of all degrees; that the hoarding of wealth for the mere gratification of personal desires is selfish; that the selling of land is extraordinary; and that failure to ascribe every incident to supernatural causes is sacrilegious. These differences of viewpoint on so many matters explain the first impression of strangeness. A careful investigator comes to realize that he is among a people who fundamentally differ but slightly from his companions, though outwardly they have little in common. With respect to love, ambition, parental affection, sense of honour, pride, intelligence, even humour and vanity, the Bella Coola are essentially similar to ourselves. Unfortunately, these characteristics are expressed in ways unintelligible and often repellent to the casual traveller. If he will only look beneath the surface, he will find a people who are neither saints nor sinners, but essentially human, with the faults and follies as well as the elements of strength and wisdom which comprise, as Kipling puts it, "Man in a world of men."

The coming of the white civilization has been cataclysmic to the Bella Coola. Within two generations they have been reduced to a mere handful; instead of living in scattered villages, roaming the mountains for game and fishing at will, they now dwell in a single settlement and the taking of animals and fish is subject to law; the introduction of metal tools and mechanical appliances has revolutionized their mode of life; new foods, new clothing, new furniture has altered their living conditions; fermented drink has presented a factor unknown

By HARLAN I. SMITH

MANY OF the Bellacoola Indians today believe in sympathetic magic and witchcraft, after over a hundred years of contact with white men. Most of them live within hearing of the bells of the mission church, and the government school. Not a few of the men take logging contracts; some of them hunt and operate motor boats; many of them join the fishing fleets of the salmon canneries; most of the women work in the canneries, and all deal at the white men's stores.

The Bellacoola lived at the heads of the long inlets half way up the Pacific Coast of Canada and in the tributary Bella Coola valley. Now, numbering perhaps two hundred and fifty, they, with the exception of a few families, are concentrated on one reservation at the mouth of the Bella Coola river. The Bella Coola valley has been called the Norway of Canada. This was where Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the first white man to cross Canada overland, reached the sea.

Aboriginally, the Bellacoola were of the North Pacific Coast culture of America, which is characterized by the extensive use of red cedar and sea products, particularly salmon, the making of graceful, sea-going canoes, each hewn from a single cedar, the erection of large rectangular houses made of cedar planks, with carved house posts and totem poles, lack of pottery, and expertness in carpenter work, carving, and painting. This culture belongs to the hardest area, but the Bellacoolas were nomadic to a certain extent. The art of the area was that best known from the paintings and carvings of the totem poles, largely of conventionalized animal forms. The life centred around a very highly developed social organization, an extensive and powerful financial system, and property rights to names, rituals and houses. The Bellacoola language is one of the Salish linguistic stock. They are apparently more recent comers to the coast than their neighbors and have not fully adopted the coast culture.

The following examples of sympathetic magic and witchcraft, collected during 1920 to 1921 among the Bellacoola, illustrate the extent of their belief in this direction. 114 121

Most of this information was given me by the late Captain Schooner, born about 1848, and Joshua Moody, born about 1848, both apparently full-blood Bellacoola Indians. Neither of them spoke English and both gave me the data in Chinook jargon, which I have endeavored to interpret and arrange in logical order, but have tried to render in as nearly as possible the Indian mode of thought, feeling and expression. Schooner was a pagan gentleman. Joshua has great knowledge of plants and animals, and is a Bellacoola scientist, but his great ambition and jealousy, combined with his disparity in giving up his own people's customs and adopting a very thin veneer of Christianity, color his statements relating to beliefs, although his plant and animal data have always withstood cross examination and comparison with the data supplied by other Indians. Alec Davis and Mrs. Willie Mack told of the toad. They do not talk English and spoke to me in Chinook jargon. Only the accounts about the grizzly bear skin and the bracelet of beaver skin, which were given me by Mrs. Stonsiger, were told in English. 115 [191] [191]

The material was not given as accounts of magic or witchcraft, but rather as part of the data regarding the properties of plants and animals of which I was endeavoring to collect as complete information as possible. 114 121

Joshua, who is even younger than Captain Schooner, remembers the time when Mr. John Clayton was the only white man living in the Bella Coola valley, and when they saw only one other white man every year or two. Consequently these men remember the old Bellacoola beliefs before they were much, if at all, affected by European ideas. 114 115

It will be noticed that magic among the Bellacoola is considered of use both for beneficial and injurious purposes, and that the materials giving effect to it are of both plant and animal origin. 787 794

I.

105 The Bella Coola are a small tribe inhabiting the coasts of Dean Inlet and Bentinck Arm, two long and narrow fords situated in about latitude 52° north, in British Columbia. Their habitat extends along Bella Coola River, which empties into North Bentinck Arm. The name "Bella Coola" is a corruption of the word "Bilxula," by which name the tribe is known to the Kwakiutl. There is no term in their own language embracing all the tribes speaking the Bella Coola language. It seems that at a former time the tribe was quite populous; but, owing to various epidemics and the introduction of other diseases, its numbers have dwindled down, so that at the present time it has been reduced to only a few hundred souls. The 105 149 language spoken by the tribe belongs to the Salishan family, more particularly to the group of dialects spoken along the coasts of Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia. The great similarity between the Bella Coola and the other Coast-Salishan dialects leads me to assume that at one time the tribes speaking these dialects inhabited contiguous areas. At the present time the Bella Coola are separated from other tribes speaking Salishan languages by a considerable stretch of country, which is inhabited by tribes of Athapascan and Kwakiutl lineage. Vocabulary and grammar have been highly modified, particularly by an extensive elision of vowels. The relation of their language to the other dialects of the Coast Salish is similar to that of the Tillamook, another language belonging to the Salishan family, which is spoken on the coast of Oregon, in an area separated from the rest of the Salishan territory by the district inhabited by the Chinook.

144 the northern Coast tribes, and also with the Athapascan tribes of the interior. Evidently intermarriages have been quite frequent, so much so that their present physical appearance differs considerably from that of the southern Salishan tribes, of whom they form a branch. The same is true in regard to their customs and beliefs, which differ fundamentally from those of the southern Salishan tribes.

121 In the present paper I shall describe the mythology of the Bella Coola, and discuss its development.

The source attempts to record as far as possible the sum total of the Bellacoola culture complex and interwoven social life before the complete breakdown of the society had taken place, a definite factor to be considered in any data collected after 1924. After a short section on the location of the Bellacoola and their natural environment, the author strikes off on rather lengthy discussions of religion, social organization, rank (including much detailed information on the potlatch system), an additional chapter on other aspects and features of the potlatch, Bellacoola mythology as revealed in their origin myths, the life cycle from birth to marriage,

Additional chapters provide information on warfare, games, stories, and the Bella Coola people themselves -- their physical appearance, modal personality, and adaptability to culture change. Four appendices conclude the work, the first of which (A) presents what little data are given in the entire source on material culture, dealing with the taking and processing of olachen, Bellacoola canoes, preparation of cedar bark, and the manufacture of paint; the second (B) with the construction of string figures; the third (C) presents a useful list of native flora and fauna along with their scientific binomials; and finally the fourth (D)

SOCIETIES AND SOCIOLOGY

Location

"BELLA COOLA" is the common designation of those Indians who, until a few years ago, inhabited the valley of the Bella Coola River in central British Columbia. Boas has recorded[1] that the name is a mis-pronunciation of Bilxula,[2] a Kwakiutl word of doubtful origin which white pioneers assumed to be the appellation of the people in question. There is no term in their own language to include the groups treated in this monograph. Linguistically, the Bella Coola form an isolated island of Salish-speaking people, separated from others of the same stock by tribes of Athapascans and Kwakiutl language.[3] Culturally, they belong to the central section of the North Pacific coast area.[4]

The Bella Coola River rises among the mountainous uplands of central British Columbia. Its two main branches fall rapidly, about forty-five miles from the sea, into two deep gorges which unite, some five miles further on, to form the valley of the Bella Coola. Down this the river rushes in an uninterrupted course (see Plate 1). Few shallows and no rapids for the use of large boats, even if such had been known to the Bella Coola, it serves to bear dead logs and canoes, which have come from some neighbouring valley. The valley is narrow, rather than wide, as those who visit it lamented to by lofty snow-capped mountains.

THE [illegible] described in the last chapter are essentially religious since they display an attitude of respect and [illegible] of propitiation to supernatural powers having greater strength than human beings. This is self-evident in the earlier [illegible] and, though less noticeable, is present also in those concerning diseases since these were here thought to be supernatural [illegible] placing them on a plane slightly removed from that of [illegible]. Theoretically, it seems as if a clear division might be drawn between the concepts just mentioned and those of a magical [illegible] which, although the element of contact with the supernatural is present, yet the end desired is obtained by the mere performance of an action. In the Bella Coola there is a slight overlap between the two types. For example, the acquisition of an object from which supernatural power forces may be secured is religious, but to use it towards magical ends were obtained, neither supplication nor further forces are necessary. Nevertheless, it is possible to separate these magical beliefs from mere religious ones, though it must be emphasized that the drawings in the diagrams on the [illegible] there is opposite to the white ones.

If it is difficult to find a clear dividing line between religion and magic, it is impossible to draw one between the terms and

(1.1) The Bella Coola are a small tribe inhabiting the coast of Dean Inlet in Bentinck Arm, two long and narrow fiords situated in about latitude 52° north, in British Columbia. Their habitat extends along Bella Coola River, which empties into North Bentinck Arm. The name "Bella Coola" is corruption of the word "Bilxula" by which name the tribe is known to the Kwakiutl. There is no term in their own language embracing all the tribes speaking the Bella Coola language. It seems that at a former time the tribe was quite populous; but, owing to various epidemics and the introduction of other diseases, its numbers have decreased down to the present time to far less than a hundred souls. The language spoken by the tribe belongs to the Salishan family, more particularly to the group of dialects spoken along the coast of Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia. The great similarity between the Bella Coola and the other Coast-Salishan dialects leads me to assume that at one time the tribes speaking these dialects inhabited contiguous areas. (1.2) The great distance the Bella Coola are separated from other tribes speaking Salishan languages by a considerable stretch of country, which is inhabited by tribes of Athapascan and Kwakiutl lineage. Vocabulary and grammar have been only sketchily presented to an extensive circle of readers. The relation of their language to the other dialects of the Coast Salish is similar to that of the Tillamook, another language belonging to the Salishan family, but is spoken on the coast of Oregon, so are separated from the rest of the Salishan territory by the dialects inhabited by the Chinook.

(1.3) Physically the Bella Coola have evidence of longsustained contact with the northern Coast-tribes, and also with the Athapascan tribes of the interior. Linguistic interchanges have been quite frequent, as much so that their dialect physical appearance differs considerably from that of the northern Indian tribes, of which they form a branch. This seems to rest on superior climatic conditions and habitat, which differ fundamentally from those of the Salishan tribes.

(1.4) In the present paper I shall describe the mythology of the Bella Coola, to discuss its development.

(2.1) Our previous knowledge of the mythology of this tribe is based on other texts by Adrian Jacobsen, Philip Jacobsen, Gladwin, and the writer. Later I published a few brief notes on their traditions.[1] Gladwin gave [illegible] some remarks on the religious life of the Bella Coola in [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] to advantage. At the same time, I published a brief description of the [illegible], based on information received from a small group of members of the [illegible] who were travelling in Germany. In this description also there are a number of misconceptions. The Indians were shown a collection of masks from Vancouver, Island with which they were not familiar. They gave, however, explanations of these masks judging by the markings on masks of their own tribe; consequently the explanations given there are not correct. In 1898 I met in with a number of Bella Coola who were fishing for salmon in Fraser River. The information obtained from them was published in the reports of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, 1899.[illegible] I further published a description of their ceremonies in 1900.[illegible] Further therefore described some of their traditions and customs in 1899 and 1900.[illegible] I published a collection of traditions in 1899 and 1900.[illegible]

Of the collections which have been made hereafter in our being we [illegible] the principal characteristics of the mythology of the Bella Coola. The [illegible] of the Tsimshian tribe were consider the Sun as the most important deity, but in the same time they believe in a great many beings of supernatural power. For this reason their whole mythology is very complicated. The Bella Coola on the other hand have developed a peculiar mythology in which a number of supernatural beings have been simplifiedd. It seems that these [illegible] which position are assuming the supernatural beings "[illegible]". The general features of this system are as follows:—

The Bella Coola believe that there are five worlds one above another. The middle one is our own world the earth. Above it are several [illegible] heavens, while below it there are five underworlds. In the upper heaven resides the supreme deity, a human who therefore considered [illegible] deity with the sun of mankind. In the centre of the lower heaven lies [illegible] to the north beside the house of the gods to which souls the dead and all the other deities. The zero point is an object corresponding to the moon. The underworld is inhabited by the ghosts who are in there in seven underworlds, whence they may be sent down to our earth. The ghosts

[illegible]

It is necessary to make a few remarks on the relation of the [illegible] of the Bella Coola Indians to their mythology. I have not seen any of their [illegible], and my descriptions are based on legends and upon the accounts published by Frigg and Boas [illegible].

The Bella Coola have two [illegible]—the [illegible] and the [illegible] which correspond to the [illegible] and the [illegible] of the Kwakiutl. I have described these [illegible] in another paper.[1] The [illegible] are small [illegible] representations [illegible] the [illegible] legends, some of which have been recorded by Frigg. [illegible], while the [illegible] are [illegible] representations of the [illegible] of members of various [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. Among these, the [illegible] [illegible], the [illegible] of the [illegible], and the [illegible] of the [illegible] are the most [illegible]. There are [illegible] in the Bella Coola the [illegible]. [illegible] I described on pp. [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] the two [illegible] societies. The [illegible] which I obtained on these points is [illegible], [illegible] and [illegible]. I cannot quite reconcile the [illegible] given by [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] the accounts which I received. It seems that [illegible] accounts do not clearly distinguish between the [illegible] [illegible] to various [illegible]. In the [illegible] which [illegible] to I described [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] to the Kwakiutl in regard to the origin of their [illegible] [illegible]. [illegible] [illegible] that a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible]. It is represented as having an [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible]. I have [illegible] [illegible] among the Bella Coola, but received the [illegible] [illegible] that the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]. It is not impossible that a few [illegible] may have adopted the [illegible] from the Kwakiutl [illegible], but I have not been able to find it among the Bella Coola. [illegible] considerable to interest to all the anthologies of the South Sudan coast, they overlap each with a degree as among the Bella Coola; and I provide the fact that the explicitness are kept secret to the various familiar accounts on the various conditions.

The prayer of the Bella Coola directed to them as "Tribes" has a considerable resemblance to the prayer of the Tsimshian addressed to Lucifer, the sky. So both tribes say that the idea that when the five wings the face is will be clear weather, and man will be happy; consequently the prayer to the sky "to wipe the face" occurs quite often.

One of the most important customs that the Bella Coola borrowed from the Coast tribes is the Potlatch ceremonial, with which are connected the various social institutions particularly the custom of ceremonial cannibalism. The ceremonies and the paraphernalia used by the Bella Coola and by the Kwakiutl are practically identical. I will show in (a) the legend explaining the origin of cannibalism. Among the Bella Coola and Kwakiutl, another tradition is told to explain the origin of the custom. This tradition tells of a great called Hamatsa[illegible], who lives in the forest and who causes the members of the Cannibal Society. The series of traditions explaining around this being differ fundamentally from those referring to the Cannibal Society of the Bella Coola. The custom has also spread to the Tsimshian, who say that the secret society was introduced by a hunter who was taken into the lands of a chief by a white bear. Inside the cave a house, in which the various societies were performing their ceremonies. It appears therefore, that the same ritual which is practised by these distinct tribes is explained by their fundamentally distinct myths, and the more complete that is the case the ritual is older than the myth—that the latter has been invented to refer to explain customs that were borrowed from foreign tribes or that pertained to the primary phenomena, while the myth is secondary.

These considerations explain some of the psychological motives for the development of certain traditions and myths, as well as the varied forms stories of the idea traditions of the Bella Coola. They do not however, explain the most fundamental characteristics of the traditions of the tribe. I pointed out in the final chapter of this paper, that, nevertheless the numerous contradictions contained in both legends the conception of the world and the functions of the various deities are so well defined that we must consider the mythology of this tribe (well) superior to that of the neighboring tribes. While the most beliefs of a great many tribes are not coordinated, we have here a system of deities. The existence of a systematic mythology among the Bella Coola proves that under favorable conditions the advance from the lower forms of beliefs to higher forms may be a very rapid one.

PREFACE

THE term Bella Coola can be applied to the Indians who formerly occupied more than twenty villages on the lower Bella Coola River in central British Columbia, to their near kinsfolk on the Kimsquit River, and to those living at the head of South Bentinck Arm. Disease and changed conditions consequent upon the coming of the white man have so reduced their numbers that the last two groups of settlements have been virtually abandoned, while only one village remains in the Bella Coola valley. This is located on a reserve near the mouth of the river, and its four hundred inhabitants comprise practically all the survivors of what was once a tribe of several thousand people, with a distinctive language and culture of their own.

The material contained in this monograph was collected in this one village many years ago for the National Museum of Canada.[1] I was in the field during two periods that extended from March to August, 1922, and from September, 1923, to February, 1924. My field notes were worked up and the completed manuscript submitted to the Museum in 1926. Since that time it has suffered various vicissitudes. Recommended for publication by the Chief of the Anthropological Division, it passed through the hands of various editors, questions were raised about its use and the suitability of detailed studies of social anthropology in a government publication, and by the time these matters were adjusted, funds for extensive publications were unavailable and the manuscript was put aside. Since the aim of the investigation was to record, as far as possible, the non-total of the complex and interwoven social life of the Bella Coola, I did not think it desirable to prepare short articles[2] summarizing different aspects, preferring to await an 121 light on obscure points. That is a task for the comparative student and nothing but confusion would result from such an incorporation in this volume. For the benefit of the reader, footnotes have been inserted referring to The Mythology of the Bella Coola Indians[1] by Boas, the most comprehensive description of the tribe. In the field I deliberately disregarded published accounts.

And what of these people, the subject of this book?

122 The intimate experiences of the second winter in Bella Coola only confirmed my feeling of sadness at the decay of the old arts and crafts. Music, painting, carving, weaving, story-telling, acting, all are passing away. Only a handful of the tribe survives, and of them the younger people ape the white man and have little interest in the lore and customs of their fathers. I know of few sadder experiences than talking with some Bella Coola patriarch and realizing the tragedy which he feels at the termination of his people's culture.

Though the individual may suffer, civilization must press onward and the life of the Indian will soon disappear. With it will pass forever manners, customs, beliefs, rites, and knowledge, data of value to students of man both now and in the future. Every year lessens the amount of information available. In Bella Coola, for example, the death of Captain Schooner left a gap which none could fill. Others must follow him, and within a short time there will be no ethnological work possible in that tribe. A tribe of the people may survive, but their culture, the growth of generations, will have been swept away.

123 Most of those to whom I am indebted for help in this study have passed away. Dr. A. C. Haddon and Dr. W. H. R. Rivers, both of Cambridge University, who were my mentors in anthropology, are dead; so too is Dr. E. Sapir, former Chief of the Anthropological Division in the National Museum, who gave me instruction in phonetics, and Mr. H. I. Smith, Dominion Archaeologist, to whom are owing most of the photographs re-

The following village may be included with the above: [173]

(27) Nuxwq: on the shore of North Bentinck Arm, to the east of the creek that flows into it at Green Bay. This long-deserted village was built so close to the ocean that high tides reached almost to the houses. According to one informant, the name was derived from that of the first chief sent down from above to that spot; while another connected it, etymologically, with Nuxx, the name of the barren district some four and a half miles up the valley of the creek. In recent years this village site has been used only as a summer camp. [173]

The name given to the Bella Coola valley is Nuxālk; that given to the inhabitants of the valley, excluding those of village no. 27, is Nuxālkmq.[11] 101 103

Two points must be considered with regard to the above list of towns: In the first place, can it be regarded as an accurate list, or do the towns belong to the realm of mythology? In the second place, are the customs and beliefs of the inhabitants of the different towns sufficiently similar to be described without reference to local differences? 128 173 361

The first question is difficult to answer. The Bella Coola undoubtedly consider the existence of these towns to be an historical fact, but so do they regard the peopling of the earth by men created in the land above. Nevertheless, the above list appears to be substantially correct. The Bella Coola, although now collected into a single village, still remember their ancient homes. One man, for example, stated as a matter of course that he was a man of Swabdi. Further inquiry elicited the information that he had been born at Sisal, where his father had moved at the time of the smallpox epidemic. It later appeared that my informant's father was born at Tsmosil, had married there, and that it was his father who had moved [164] [166]

[11] Boas, p. 68, states that Nuxālk is only applied to the lower villages of the valley. All the writer's information was contrary to this view. [114]

128 from Swaloli. My informant's grandchildren regard them-
173 selves as Swaloli boys, and their names are embodied in myths
361 of that village, although their forbears have not lived there
166 for five generations. There is no reason to suppose this case exceptional. Other instances were obtained of movements of people from one village to another at earlier times, and there seems no cause to doubt the general accuracy of these. Names [554] embodied in the origin myths of different towns are used as prerogatives and have been potent factors in keeping their memory alive. Uncertainties and inaccuracies there must be in the foregoing list, but on the whole it appears to be fairly reliable, since few contradictions were received from different informants.

128 Accounts obtained of the same ceremonies from the descen-
184 dants of people of different villages were found in most cases to be identical. There were a few differences in custom between
[101] the other. These will be mentioned when necessary, but on the whole the inhabitants of the Bella Coola valley can be considered as a tribal entity.

114 Boas (p. 48) gives a list of Bella Coola towns which agrees 361 fairly well with the above. Among his villages are included Pe-ozb (no. 4), Nalpatsémaxa (no. 7), and Nuxálkum (no. 16).[10] All the older people agreed that these are the names of streams, though settlements located on them may have been known by the same designations. Names of the five villages recorded by Boas, nos. 6, 8, 9, 19, and 24, were not known by several old men questioned on the subject.

101 The villages of the Bella Coola valley did not form a political 619 unit; each was independent. A common language was spoken throughout and the inhabitants of the different towns recog-
[631] nized that their origins and customs were similar. This was

from the moon and stated that there were mountains and snow on it. It is commonly stated that the marks on the moon represent a man carrying a bucket.

The stars figure but slightly either in Bella Coola mythology or thought; it is not even known who made them. Two in the Great Bear constellation are called respectively Tpikim and Xnqumc, "Little Girls." A lone star in the same part of the sky, named A'ics, is said to be following the girls to the lower for illicit intercourse.

Moon, stars, and above all the sun, were, and still are to a certain extent, used by the Bella Coola in computing the passage of time. There are no individuals with the definite prerogative of keeping count of time, but formerly wise old men used to do so.[9] Differences of opinion were the rule rather than the exception, a condition which often led to bitter disputes concerning the proper date for starting the winter ceremonials. Boas (p. 41) has recorded the Bella Coola calendar in greater detail than the present writer has been able to do. The making of calendrical observations is a lost art, and the following list of the months was all that could be learned. It will be noted that these agree with Boas in regard to the months in the early part of the year, but not in those between the summer and winter solstices; no explanation is offered for this disparity.

First moon after the summer solstice: Ilkilhamid, which has the significance, "The Time for Sockeye Salmon to Ascend the River."

Second moon after the summer solstice: Ki'ululid, "The Time for Eating Dog Salmon."

Third moon after the summer solstice: Ki'qmai ed, "The Time for Eating Coho Salmon."

Fourth moon after the summer solstice: Sqalqum, "The Time for Gathering Fern Roots," or Ilakhamc ili Ano'ilmulmulc,

9. Khamqish informants stated that there were professional calendrical experts in the history, when he was a young lad although members of the Raven society did, though, it sometimes attended to this matter.

One of Hyperion's principal functions is that of acting as leader of the Sector Gamma of the supernatural beings. As already described, these take place in Nuwaiki, the name of which is changed to Nuqaibwairu for the occasion, while the supernatural cows are awaiting Hyperion's entry at the winner selection. As soon as he comes, his arrivers have caused most of his guests to rush forth. Among those remaining is Saran-Ballam, the Lawyer, his chief adviser in Sector Gamma. This being is somewhat indifferently regarded as a supernatural grizzly bear. He is subordinate to Hyperion, and cannot himself initiate proposals, but he can interrupt the speeches of his superior if he feels bold. Human singers are under his special guidance. He is so powerful that if he turns his head to wager on any mortal, the horse falls dead. So far as could be learnt, Saran-Ballam is concerned only with Sector Gamma and never visits this earth.

One of the most invisible of the Bulla Cooln supernatural beings is a woman, Kimmi-o, Aiuda, "The Sorrow-Maker" or Dji-Sendoll, "The Slave-Owner." Some (p. 68) recorded little definite information about her, but the writer could gather only inconsequential fragments. Wherein we so slavish to her, but she takes little interest either in their welfare or actions. In the beginning of time, Hyperion sent her down to earth to watch the behaviour of mortals and report to him. She needed a central location for this purpose and accordingly chose Bunnerton Bay, where she could watch the canoes as they passed up and down the coast. At first the inhabitants of the earth showed her great respect, but gradually she was ignored and canoes passed her home without stopping. Moreover, she began to fear that she might be injured by the proximity of mortals, and especially that human footsteps might contaminate and scar her supernatural frame. So she fled far to the south, whither no one knows. In fact, no one is even absolutely certain that she went to the south. According to a well-known Bulla Cooln tradition, a man once tried to climb Mount Ruqbah and found a pleasant grassy place near the sun. He concluded that this sun is the home of the souls. Below the door of her house, whenever it may be, there are ministers (sun-gods) which open their principal mouths and speak in the voice of the animal or bird portrayed. The sun did not hear that her home was in the land above Pamalt'a, as Boas (p. 48) states. In the present time beyond edge of Pamalt'a is an enemy that failure to confirm the previous observation is not surprising.

One of two passing remarks of elderly informants imply that Pamalt'a may once have been more important in Bella Coola belief than she is now. One old man, already in his dotage, stated that long ago the dead used to dwell in her house. Another declared that long ago prayers were addressed to her, which is never done now. The word Sunset is commonly used by the Bella Coola in a manner difficult to translate. It serves as equivalent for "planet" or "Heavenly body," but has no underlying significance of a supernatural feature or agent. It is not a word to be used in casual conversation, it is reserved for important occasions or times of emotional stress. The comparative unimportance of Pamalt'a probably rests on the fact that she belongs merely to the realm of sun-mythology and has no sociological significance, even as the parent of a Bella Coola.

Another supernatural being to be removed from this world than he seems has little now the form of the Bella Coola, is Owikeno. He is the male being whom Pamalt'a sent down from above in the beginning of time to hold the earth in position, and who has since performed this duty. He lives among the ice of the far north, and has not been seen by mortals for many generations. He holds a rope fastened to the earth, which he is afraid that it has slipped slightly for want a new grip and pulls the rope taut, pressing the world against the soles of his feet as he sits with legs extended, as a man would do to hold right a tottering column. It is the tightening of the rope which causes an earthquake. If Owikeno should lose his grip entirely the earth would capsize. He is partner for several Bella Coola [illegible]

Paltry chiefs frequently invite their fellows to ordinary [illegible] when no soul or dog has been killed. On these occasions, as at soul feasts, the guests are designated by their personal names, not by those in general use.

Chiefs are also accustomed to meet for the discussion of [illegible] connected with the wider community, on such occasions his number may be augmented by men of influence in the own society, though they do not rank as chiefs. Such a meeting is always called when a new member is to be initiated into a further society. If there is difference of opinion the influence of even a small chief is outweighed by a man of importance in the society. The matter is discussed by all sides and a decision reached by general agreement. It is difficult for a white man to understand how such is possible unless either a vote, or general recognition by all that the opinion of some individual must be accepted. The latter was given at one such meeting, and was struck by the manner in which after considerable, and at times heated, discussion, a common of opinion was reached, and accepted even by those who had proposed a contrary course.

Since wealth is so important in chieftainship, it would be desirable at this point to consider the concepts of wealth. Unfortunately, it is impossible to give a satisfactory treatment of this subject. The coming of the white man altered the economic aspects of Bella Coola life so radically, and at such an early period, that concrete examples of economic investigations, so useful in a thorough study, could not be obtained in the field. It is possible that greater attention to this subject might have produced more satisfactory results, but I am doubtful of this.

In the old days, "wealth" was of two categories: (a) Prerogatives, tangible or intangible, which could be shown, privately or ceremonially, or could be exponded in words, and (b) Goods which could be distributed for validating such prerogatives. Individual possessions, counted for distribution, were hardly considered as wealth; a sewing-machine, a bottle of whisky, a bed, or some other lovely might give satisfaction to the owner, but did not increase his importance in the eyes of his fellows. The value of objects was only for their use in ceremonial distribution; indeed, prior to such distribution, they were only of potential value. This attitude controlled Bella Coola economics in the early days of contact, and still influences their behaviour. A native moneylender was actually commended on the fact that he would gain no advantage from the goods on his shelves, since he hoped merely to sell them, not to give them away.

A man's relatives were expected to help him in the acquisition of goods, but the extent of their contributions was never

ORIGIN MYTHS

[illegible]—Bella Coola Origin Myth—Origin Myths of Other Tribes—Early Traditions Among the Coastal Algonkins—Forms of Origin Myths—Crude Origin Myths

Introductory

[illegible] will be given here of the origin myths which are believed to authentic as much of the ritual already described, and to which repeated reference has been made. Professor Boas published such an admirable collection of traditions of this type (pp. [illegible]) that the present writer paid little attention to the subject. The Bella Coola Indians, who are intensely proud of the deeds of their first forefathers, that several hesitated on recounting them before they were willing to do other work. In consequence, a fair number of myths was collected through necessity. Some idea of the type were recounted almost entirely in pantomime, their signification has declined since the prohibition of this rite. Consequently, many legends are only remembered in part, the [illegible] and other primitive series of ceremonies have received less for no more than a small part of the rich field which must once have existed among the Bella Coola.[1]

As Professor Boas has clearly shown, origin myths which have, in the beginning of time, the supreme god sent down to earth the first ancestors of the Bella Coola people, well usually provided with names of ancestors, a house, and certain supernatural powers. The right to the names of these people, as well as to the use of ceremonial objects used by them, has been the privilege of their descendants. But there only Bulu Ceela (the first modern descendant, but second Mangantang, will carrying with it a definite prerogative. In a single myth there may be embedded a dozen or more names and incidents which are quoted at the present day to authorize such different claims of culture as dances, rights to hunting grounds, proliferous names of dogs, or burial prerogatives.[1] The myth which gives the initial use of a name, a dance, or any other prerogative, is termed a charter. Each of these is, or was in the old days, considered with great care and never recounted in full detail except to the members of the concerned family, whose name or embodied it. Even in particular the full details of the myth are not told here. Indeed, if a young man is of a Bulu, possessing disposition, unless to preserve the rights of his concerned kins, the details are concealed from him. Even in the present time there is much resentment at any unauthorized use of a charter, and in the old days this would inevitably have led to bloodshed.

Now (p. 110) seems that the terms charter and interpretation synonymous. The writer feels certain that this is an error. I am discussed repeatedly with various Bulu Ceela, all of whom agreed that a charter is a myth which can be sold by anyone, whereas a charter is a myth possessed by the individual or individuals, whose prerogatives are derived from it. To the Bulu Ceela the two are clearly different.

From the box, there also doubt that records of the one change from one category to the other. It readily that cases to give a publish, but lacking the original authorization, most frequently have used a charter, claiming the have to do so. There would be little inconvenience in this for things so, but the prestige of one who can give publication is so great that to lose the claim would probably be accepted. The two

The old woman who mentioned this occurrence noted that both her grandmother, the Barbeyn Dabbum, and her sister, a Spring Dabbum, though still unborn, were aware of the accident and consequent the commencement of the mishap.

On account of their ancestry power, twins are considered weaklings and usually die young in spite of the care lavished upon them and the taboos observed by their parents. A dead twin, instead of being buried, is put in a box which is placed in a tree far away from the village. Every year the tree changes its country, moving into its bushes in order to reach the sun, sinking the body, and this continues until it reaches its goal and merges away into cold ether.

Childhood Immunities

When working in the field, an anthropologist almost inevitably concentrates upon comparatively and other aspects in an individual's life, as the structure of the field contains which in Bulla Gode, as everywhere else, is fundamentally important although it defies description on account of its intangibility. A child grows up in a large house, occupied by several families, in which there is little privacy. The parents provide food and clothing, but more distant relatives take a greater share of responsibility for this than do white people. When food is being given out, a child soon learns that he will be given some of it, and that he will have his portion in any distribution of property. Furniture, bedding, and other necessities are reduced to a minimum, but a boy or girl is welcome to sleep with relatives should his own parents wish to go hunting or fishing. The sense of power possessed by a Bulla Gode will many relations is largely intangible, but it has practical applications and

In the whole community engaged, relatives, and sometimes even a man for having carried out a memorial ceremony, there is no doubt that he is pleased and gratified to work on accomplishing his grief is shifted. These two factors most constantly [illegible] to which memorial ceremonies serve to commemorate the dead, but to [illegible] also to the social importance of the donors. The two combine to bring considerable comfort to the chief who has lost a dear relative. In some cases the social prestige is the end motive, the grief assuaged and unimportant, but in others the latter is the only factor that matters, and a chief is entirely oblivious to any increase in his own status. In memorial ceremonies, both feelings are present in the mind of the donor, and both are gratified.

In the preceding pages, an attempt has been made to describe the traditional death rites of the Bulu Creole. The following section comprises a detailed account of funeral ceremonies witnessed in 1955. The contrast between these and the rites already recorded, will indicate some of the changes in custom which are of such importance in studies of cultural growth or decline. The following description will also serve to demonstrate a point repeatedly mentioned, the manner in which business transactions and arrangements of all kinds take place whenever the people have been called together.

On June 11, 1955, the death occurred in Bulu Creole of Jessie Mae Samuel King, daughter of Captain Johnson. The latter, now deceased, was one of the writer's most trusted friends, and as a result of this friendship it was possible not only to attend the actual rites, but to ascertain much of the feeling underlying them. The advantage lies in knowledge, since it is not sufficiently impossible to question either the father or the husband of the woman too closely. The details will be the uninitiated are expelled, with the exception of the sanak to whom, as guests, a meal is served. Then they too leave and the kokwitsi are together. Finally, the singers strike up one of the dancer's songs, and he dances to it to end the evening's rites.

The fourth day is unknown, "Time Which Is Opened." During the day the carpenters work to complete the masks, and towards dusk the house is again put in order. The kokwitsi are summoned again to practice the songs, if necessary, and always to arrange who shall wear the masks, a matter left to the medicine and the carpenters. Then the uninitiated are called in to see the masked figures and watch any dramatic representation. After these exclusions, the masks are burnt. Then the kokwitsi gather outside the dancer's house where his song is sung once more to send his call back above. Frequently another kwirai now receives a call, so that the rehearsal of one dancer is likewise the footstone for another. The kokwitsi assemble in the latter's house, but the uninitiated are not allowed to return to that from which they have been ejected until the platform-enclosure has been dismantled at the end of the season.

A word might be said about kwirai paraphernalia, although much of this will have to be described in detail for special dances. Boas gives illustrations of a large number of kwirai masks and gives such an admirable description of them that little need be added. They are carved from the solid wood, the larger of lunch, the smaller of alder, and each carpenter endeavours to make a striking effigy of the being portrayed. Kwirai-tsaiaxa is present at every dance and has become so well standardized that she can always be recognized. This is true, also, for Thunder, Echo, the Awaken, the Laughter, the Hummingbirds, and a few other supernatural beings, but so much variation occurs in others that even a kwirai of much experience cannot always tell what being is represented. The masks are painted, and sometimes the designs indicate the being, even though the carving fails to do so, considerable is figures are really beings from another world. The explanation lies in the profound belief of all Bella Coola in the near presence of the supernatural; consequently, a supernatural explanation is the one normally given for all unusual incidents. The dances themselves are filled with strange manifestations, particularly the weird whistling concerning the origin of which the uninitiated have no idea. Once convinced by this means of the presence of unknown powers, it is easy for them to believe that the masked figures are visitors from the other world. Nor was their belief in former days shaken by certain representations which were palpably false, such as that of the sun. No one could believe that the disk which moved across the back of the house was the sun itself; but on the other hand it seemed marvellous to the uninitiated, ignorant of the means used to produce it. To the white man there seems a fundamental difference between a supernatural being and the representation of a strange object made to move by unseen means, but to the Bella Coola both belong to another realm, and are accordingly alike. Moreover, there were occasions when the uninitiated must have seen the shifting or actual falling of a mask, for example, during the fight with wasps. But here again the deep belief of the non-members came to the help of the dancers, who told their guests that this was caused by the coming of a call to the actor, and what might easily have become doubt and suspicion was thus changed to respect.

The writer laboured under two tremendous difficulties in collecting information about dance masters; the present dances are mere shadows of what they formerly were, and there are no more uninitiated. The presence and quest for information served to stimulate memory and led to a partial revival of the old rites, but the bulk of his material was obtained from informants rather than from actual observation. It is a universal characteristic of mankind to idealize accounts of former practices, so it is not only possible, but probable, that the foregoing descriptions are more perfect than many of the rites to which they refer. Even when full allowance is made for this, the fact 595* will remain that the kakaxtar were able to carry out dances 796* in which they deceived the uninitiated. Above all, it is clear 781 that those who were not members of the society had the great- 114 est respect for the powers of those who were, and although doubt may have existed concerning the identity of the supernatural visitors, there was not the slightest concerning the ability of the kakaxtar to have, for example, their muscle ripped open. The writer discussed this point with too many old men and women to have the slightest uncertainty on this point, and he feels confident that anyone who could have listened to the account of a reliable old man concerning his fears when he had "killed" a kaxtar in this manner, would have shared his conviction.

It would be fascinating to discuss at some length the prob- 595* able history of the kaxtar society, but this would entail a com- 796* parison with the rites of other coastal tribes and belongs to the 178 realm of comparative ethnology. This monograph deals only 184 with Bella Coola practices as the writer saw them or heard 592 them described, so that the history of the society can only be traced from this angle. It appears certain that the rites have increased in secrecy. One old marshal with whom the matter was discussed remembered having heard that long ago masks were constructed in the presence of the uninitiated. Considered as an isolated statement this would have little value, but in conjunction with information derived from Kimsquit it becomes of importance. It is true that in Kimsquit the masks are made in secret, but they are shown to the uninitiated as masks, and the writer was told of one instance in which Thqen, during his round of the village, fell into the water and remained there all day, to the amusement of non-members who recognized that he was merely a disguised human being. It is even said that long ago the manufacture of masks was entrusted to inferior uninitiated. It is clear that there has been a tremendous increase in secrecy even at Kimsquit, and a great deal more at Bella Coola. The writer believes that

BELLA COOLA-ENGLISH VOCABULARY

DURING the period in the field, the writer's attention was devoted entirely to sociological and religious investigation, and no attempt was made either to analyze the intricacies of the Bella Coola language or to record texts. This part of the monograph consists only of words which were collected haphazardly, and no effort was made to compile an exhaustive list, or even a representative one. This explains the preponderance of proper names, and the large number of nouns connected with rituals of all kinds, some of which are rapidly disappearing from common usage. Many of these were used by the writer unwittingly in gathering technical data, and their incorporation is unquestionably correct. A few words, however, were not rechecked on different occasions, or from different informants, so that some errors may have crept in, either in translation or in recording. No terms have been employed of which the writer has any real doubt, but the same accuracy is not claimed for this vocabulary as for the monograph as a whole. Lack of knowledge of Bella Coola grammar made it impracticable to utilize the words recorded in the songs, since many of them include affixes and other structural elements that affect the root.

In listing the words alphabetically, the following arbitrary system of letter order has been followed and all symbols have been disregarded, for example, a and ā are not separated.

collected during 1920 to 1923 among the Bellacoola, illustrate the extent of their belief in this direction.

Most of this information was given me by the late Captain 115
Schooner, born about 1848, and Joshua Moody, born about 1868, both apparently full-blood Bellacoola Indians. Neither of them [191] spoke English and both gave me the data in Chinook jargon, which I have endeavored to interpret and arrange in logical order, but have tried to render in as nearly as possible the Indian mode of thought, feeling and expression. Schooner was a pagan gentleman. Joshua has great knowledge of plants and animals, and is a Bellacoola scientist, but his great ambition and jealousy, combined with his disloyalty in giving up his own people's customs and adopting a very thin veneer of Christianity, color his statements relating to beliefs, although his plant and animal data have always withstood cross examination and comparison with the data supplied by other Indians. Alec Davis and Mrs. Willie [191]
Mack told of the toad. They do not talk English and spoke to me in Chinook jargon. Only the accounts about the grizzly bear skin and the bracelet of beaver skin, which were given me by Mrs. Stemsiger, were told in English.

The material was not given as accounts of magic or witch- 114 craft, but rather as part of the data regarding the properties of 121 plants and animals of which I was endeavoring to collect as complete information as possible.

Joshua, who is even younger than Captain Schooner, remem- 114
bers the time when Mr. John Clayton was the only white man 115 living in the Bella Coola valley, and when they saw only one other white man every year or two. Consequently these men remember the old Bellacoola beliefs before they were much, if at all, affected by European ideas.

It will be noticed that magic among the Bellacoola is con- 789
sidered of use both for beneficial and injurious purposes, and 754 that the materials giving effect to it are of both plant and animal origin.

ENTOMOLOGY AMONG THE BELLACOOLA AND CARRIER INDIANS

By HARLAN I. SMITH

B 131

THE Bellacoola Indians live in the Norway of Canada, about midway of the Pacific Coast, where Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the first white man to cross Canada, reached the sea; that is, about half way between Vancouver and Prince Rupert. Their country is around the head of the inlets about sixty miles in from or east of Ocean Falls and the usual route of the steamers up and down the coast. This inland passage is with few exceptions protected by the outer fringe of islands. The Bellacoola language is one of the Salish linguistic stock. The people are of the typical North Pacific Coast culture, characterized by the extensive use of red cedar and sea products, especially salmon, huge houses of split cedar planks with carved house posts, and totem poles, and immense seagoing canoes dug out of cedar. They were expert carpenters and had a peculiar art, especially in painting and carving, largely of conventionalized animal forms—a valuable contribution to the art of the world. This art may become of great financial value to the manufacturers of this country as well as a magnet capable of exploitation to bring in tourists with money from foreign lands. These Indians had a very highly developed social organization, many dramas and rituals, and a complex financial system popularly known as the potlatch.

The Carrier Indians of Ulkatcho, on the other hand, live in the high plateau of the semi-arid region, perhaps 75 miles northeast of the Bellacoola. They differ from the Bellacoola in language, appearance, and culture perhaps as much as do the Turks from the English. They had a less realistic art, which was largely geometric and pictographic, highly conventionalized and symbolic. Their social organization and financial system also were less highly developed.

From time to time during 1920-1923 inclusive, I have secured from both these peoples data about their use of materials. Part of these data refer to insects, and may be of interest to entomologists, although my spelling of Indian words is very problematical, because some of the sounds I can neither hear nor make, and I am unable to record adequately many of those that I can hear. The data here given are preliminary to a complete working over of my notes, but are believed to be nearly complete.

Insects apparently were not so well observed by the Bellacoola as were useful mammals and plants, the stinger of the bumble-bee, for instance, being supposed to be in its mouth. Few insects had names, that is, mainly those which were used or which troubled the Indians. Insects were not used for food, and honey was unknown until after the coming of the white man. The head of the gad-fly was used as a pattern in painting designs, the nest of the yellow-jacket in sympathetic magic or witchcraft, and "fly spit" was said to be good for sores. They had a story about the bumble-bee.

Among the Ulkatcho also observation of insects was weaker than that of mammals and plants, and they apparently had names for only a few insects, those which troubled them. Ant lyon pits and its method of taking prey were known. Insects were of no use to the Ulkatcho whatever. An instance was observed of an Indian smoking himself with a buzzing fly held in his mouth. They employed smudges, fish oil, gum of the cottonwood, and blossoms of cow parsnip with oil to protect themselves from mosquitoes, black flies and no-see-ums, and smoke to protect foods from flies.

The Ant lyon, among the Ulkatcho, is called Kinselkats. It is said to be numerous at Ulkatcho, but that it was useless and that there was no story about it. My informant voluntarily showed me the pits made by the larvae of this insect and, catching ants for the purpose, demonstrated its well-known method of taking its prey.

The grasshopper (Orthoptera), that makes a noise by rubbing its wings together when it flies, was called Telcus, among the Ulkatcho.

"Fly spit," that is the material surrounding a nymph of a spittle insect, also known as a frog hopper (Cercopidae), is said

105 The Bella Coola are a small tribe inhabiting the coast of Dean Inlet and Bentinck Arm, one long and narrow fiord situated in about latitude 52° north, in British Columbia. Their habitat extends along Bella Coola River, which empties into North Bentinck Arm. The name 'Bella Coola' is a corruption of the word 'Bilxula,' by which name the tribe is known to the Kwakiutl. There is no term in their own language embracing all the tribes speaking the Bella Coola language. It seems that at a former time the tribe was quite populous; but, owing to various epidemics and the introduction of other diseases, its numbers have dwindled down, so that at the present time it has been reduced to only a few hundred souls. The language spoken by the tribe belongs to the Salishan family, more particularly to the group of dialects spoken along the coasts of Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia. The great similarity between the Bella Coola and the other Coast Salish dialects leads me to assume that at one time the tribes speaking these dialects inhabited contiguous areas. At the present time the Bella Coola are separated from other tribes speaking Salishan languages by a considerable stretch of country, which is inhabited by tribes of Athapascan and Kwakiutl lineage. Vocabulary and grammar have been highly modified, particularly by an extensive choice of vowels. The relation of their language to the other dialects of the Coast Salish is similar to that of the Tillamook, another language belonging to the Salishan family, which is spoken on the coast of Oregon, is so much separated from the rest of the Salishan territory by the dialects inhabited by the Chinook.

105 144 Physically the Bella Coola have evidence of long-continued contact with the northern Coast tribes, and also with the Athapascan tribes of the interior. Evidently intermarriages have been quite frequent, so much so that their present physical appearance differs considerably from that of the southern Salishan tribes, of which they form a branch. The same is true in regard to their customs and beliefs, which differ fundamentally from those of the southern Salishan tribes.

121 In the present paper I shall describe the mythology of the Bella Coola, and discuss its development.

II.

114 Our previous knowledge of the mythology of this tribe is based on studies made by Adrian Jacobsen, Philip Jacobsen, Gerkens, and the writer. In 1905 I published a few brief notes on their traditions.[1] Gerkens pub-

They looked very sore, because they had eaten the bear. Then the youth said to the girl, "There are two trails here,—one leading to the left, the other to the right. You follow the one, I will follow the other. If the trails meet, we will marry; if they do not, we have separate horses." They started, and after a while met each other. Then the youth married the girl. (Book of the Bear, Plate 9, Fig. [illegible])[1]

It is necessary to make a few remarks on the relation of the ceremonials of the Bella Coola Indians to their mythology. I have not seen any of their ceremonials, and my descriptions are based on inquiries, and upon the accounts published by Fitty and Adrian Jacobsen.

The Bella Coola have two ceremonials,—the tsaq'k and the ta'ituo, which correspond to the cat'lacs and the ta'ituelqa of the Kwakiutl. I have described these ceremonials fully in another paper.[2] The tsaq'k ceremonials are mostly dramatic representations illustrating the clan legends, some of which have been recorded in Chap. IV, while the ta'ituo ceremonials are dramatic representations of the initiation of members of various clans into certain secret societies. Among these, the Cannibal Society, the Society of the Laughers, and the Society of the Throwers, are the most important. These are called by the Bella Coola the ulnat'cala, Oha, and Dalna. I described on pp. 34, 35, the spirits presiding over the two first-named societies. The information which I obtained on these points is perfectly clear and consistent. I cannot quite reconcile the explanations given by A. and F. Jacobsen to the accounts which I received. It seems that their accounts do not clearly distinguish between the opinions held by various tribes. In the article above referred to, I described fully the opinions held by the Kwakiutl in regard to the origin of their Cannibal Society. They believe that a spirit called Baxbakualanuxsi'wat initiates the Cannibals. He is represented as having an enormous black head with dilated nostrils and large mouth. I have made frequent inquiries among the Bella Coola, but received the uniform answer that this being does not initiate their Cannibals. It is not impossible that a few families may have adopted this tradition from the Kwakiutl tribes, but I have not been able to find it among the Bella Coola. Jacobsen maintains that Baxbakualanuxsi'wat is the particular spirit of the Cannibal among the Bella Coola, and brings forward the well-known

Accompanied by many men, he is led after two days more, to the river for final purification. He is painted into the water for struggles to free himself. He rises on their his companions, and above his chest. Finally he is led back. Then he sleeps, because the spirit has left him entirely. The people now then while he is going back to the house. Then he is offered a piece of salmon, which is placed on his throat, while the people shout, "Hup, hup!" The salmon is taken away again, and after some time he is allowed to take one bite. Then he must be alone. After the bearing season is ended, he is quite allowed to eat in the same way as other people do. The piece of salmon that was placed on his throat is taken to children as a protection against sickness. Finally a ceremony is performed which is called "taking the tip of the Ts'ayas out of the Cannibal's body." While this is being done, the people cry, "Hup!" Then they throw the tip upon another Cannibal, who at once falls into an ecstasy. Then the shaman takes it back and throws it up towards the sky, where it disappears. The dish and the spoon that the Cannibal used during his ecstasy are destroyed. For two years he must wear a small ring of red cedar-bark, to conceal as well as to warn.

The Ots is also initiated in honour to the being described before (p. 57). There are different traditions regarding his initiation among different clans. Some Ots, during their performances, walk upon which are scattered through the house. Where he returns from his initiation, small initiation, called ma'ilaxa, which imitate the voices of eagles, are heard outside of the house. Then the Ots comes to a state of ecstasy, something the people who assemble to hold him, and tearing their blankets. Finally the people succeed in placing a blanket over his head, and he begins to come to his senses. When he enters the house, the people bear him, then he touches the chosen leader a song. The mask worn by the Ots is quite large, and characterized by a large nose (Plate XII, Fig. 4). He carries a dancing-club (Plate XII, Fig. 10), and rings made of red cedar-bark. He is accompanied by two assistants, who also wear masks.

VII.

We will now discuss the probable origin of the mythology described in the preceding pages. In order to do so, it is necessary to make a brief statement in regard to the social organization of the neighbouring tribes. In another paper[1] I have fully discussed the considerable amount of borrowing that has taken place among the Coast tribes, and the relation of their

[illegible] distributed in three of the clans. It is [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] tribe. The members of the Bella Coola Indians in three of the [illegible] tribes on the one hand and in the northern of the Tlingit-[illegible] tribes on the other, is evident.

It is however, important to compare this social organization with that of the neighboring tribes, in order to gain a clearer understanding of the origin of this peculiar organization. In some tribes, the Bella Coola are divided into village communities which are organized on an exogamic basis. Each village community has its totem, which is represented in certain ceremonies. The supernatural beings which play a part in these ceremonies are personified by certain dances. Other Coast tribes have a much more complex organization. The Tlingit and Haida are divided into two clans, each of which is subdivided into a great many families, which, as it would seem, were originally village communities. This opinion is based on the fact that the names of many of the families were in combination or "combinations of each and each a place." The two clans are present in all the villages of the tribe, each family belonging to either one clan or the other. The Tsimshian have the same system, except that the number of clans is four instead of two. Each tribe is divided into families, which embrace the inhabitants of a certain region; but all the families of the whole tribe are classified according to the four clans. Among the Haida, Tlingit, and Tsimshian, descent is purely maternal; among the northern Kwakiutl tribes conditions are somewhat different according to observations made by Dr. Livingston Farrand. There we have village communities which are subdivided according to four clans in the same way as those of the Tsimshian but descent is not purely maternal. There is a strong preponderance of the latter form of descent, but parents are at liberty to place their children in either the paternal or maternal clan. The preponderance of maternal descent is, however, so strong, that from my previous occasional inquiries I drew the inference that descent was purely maternal.

Among the southern Kwakiutl tribes the families, constituting a village community are subdivided into a number of clans, but each clan is confined to one village. We do not find a limited number of clans pervading the whole tribe, as we do among the northern tribes. An analysis of the social organization of this tribe has shown that the present organization has evidently developed from a previous simpler state, in which the tribe was divided into single village communities. The present more complex organization resulted from the amalgamation of various villages. Owing to the influence of the societies of the northern tribes, each village community adopted a crest, which in course of time became the totem of the clan.[1] The Kwakiutl have a peculiar organization, which may be considered a transitional stage between

121 If I were to investigate and report on the Bella Coola at 128 the present time, I would undoubtedly be influenced by many years of contact with American anthropologists and their work. I would assume a greater knowledge of North-West coast institutions, less interest in the details of ceremonial class, and it would be impossible not to avoid comparisons with, and observations upon, the theoretical implications of many of the facts recorded. But though every field investigator is strictly objective as to the facts he collects, yet his interests, and his method of presenting them, are coloured by his background; in my case, by the older school of English anthropology. On the whole, I think this is fortunate. It means that the Bella Coola are portrayed as I saw them when I came fresh to a new field, practically uninfluenced by problems of North-West coast culture, and fully prepared to throw myself into their life. They were "my people," not a group in which I was interested because they had, or had not, certain culture traits with which I was concerned. In the course of my teaching experience, furthermore, I have wished repeatedly to give serious students detailed field monographs in which are recorded the interwoven social, religious, and folk-lore concepts of a people, the sum-total of their mental life, collected by one man at one time. This I have tried to do for the Bella Coola.

123 Following the English tradition, I wish to record how this material was collected. Before leaving for British Columbia, [115] I was advised by the late H. I. Smith, who had worked in the area, to talk to Joshua Moody (see Plate 1), an elderly Bella Coola Indian with whom Smith had worked. On explaining to Joshua that I had come to record in permanent form the traditions and lore of his people, Joshua grinned broadly and promised his help. Unfortunately, he spoke only a few words of English. I tried interpreter after interpreter, Indian and white, with only fair success, and my difficulties increased with the [464] opening of the canning season and the consequent employment of the younger men and women. I was urged to learn the [122] Chinook jargon, which serves widely as a lingua franca on the

126 whom I was working. Before I left, this medley contained so much Bella Coola that it was unintelligible to white people who knew Chinook alone.

Activities in the community would have interfered seriously with my work during the summer of 1922 if two men had not been confined to the village, Captain Schooner owing to an injured wrist, and Jim Pollard by the illness of his wife. These two men were willing to work half a day apiece without pay. Each was intensely proud of the traditions of his people and, realizing that their culture was passing away, was glad to assist in making it permanent in writing. An intimacy sprang up between Captain Schooner (see Plate 3) and myself culminating in my adoption, a circumstance which established and improved my position in the community. In this way I was enabled to collect a large amount of material before July when it was necessary for me to leave for the east.

In September, 1923, when I returned to Bella Coola, I found that Captain Schooner had died a few months before, respected alike by white men and Indians. With the aid of others with whom I had made contact it was possible to obtain much new information, as well as to clear up many obscure points. The previous summer I had been so overwhelmed with material that I had no time to collate it in the field and the gaps only became apparent after a year's study. The men were so busy hunting and laying in stocks of fire-wood, however, that I found it difficult to arrange regular hours of work, but this was a trifle compared with the initial difficulties of my first trip. In October, when the Bella Coola began to prepare for the winter dances, they had to appoint a successor to Captain Schooner, who had played a leading part in their production. Having been adopted by him, it was suggested that I take his place, a proposition which I readily accepted. This admitted me to the ranks of the old men, and I imagine that my interest encouraged them to hold more ceremonials than they had done for several years. In former times, a number of the older men used to devote much time and thought to the composing, re-

[illegible] and gratitude to each of these four. Dr. D. Jenness, who succeeded Dr. Sapir, was more co-operative. In Bella Coola, I was received with uniform kindness by the white inhabitants, particularly Mrs. Chesson, Mr. and Mrs. Burt Robson, and Mr. and Mrs. Andy Christensen.

Finally, and most important of all, I wish to express my appreciation to the Bella Coola themselves. Without their generous, kindly and helpful co-operation, this book could never have been written. I came as an universal stranger; they received me as a friend and a guest; and I left with intense regret. My chief friends were Joshua Moody, Captain Schooner, and Jim Pollard, but I was also greatly assisted by Mr. Willie Mack, Mr. and Mrs. Tallio Charlie, and Mr. and Mrs. Lame Charlie. To a host of others I am indebted in only a slightly less extent. The aid and friendship of these men and women is one of my pleasantest memories, and one which I wish to record in all gratitude and appreciation.

In the actual publication of this complicated manuscript, I have likewise been fortunate in receiving co-operation and help. The University of Toronto Press accepted it for publication during the war, facing—and overcoming—the inevitable shortage of materials and of skilled craftsmen. Great difficulty was experienced in obtaining the type for phonetic symbols; to avoid undue duplication all native words, whether proper or common names, have been printed in italics. It is a tribute to the Press that it has completed the work. I am especially indebted to several former members of the editorial staff: Mrs. Hewitt, who supervised the initial editing, and her assistants, Mrs. Hackett and Mrs. Bucek. Mr. Weir, foreman of the composing room of the Press, has surmounted endless difficulties with enthusiasm and ingenuity. I am also grateful to Miss Harman, Associate Editor, who took the responsibility for final production details. Mr. Burns, General Manager of the Press, and Professor Brown, Editor, have both been helpful and co-operative throughout.

use his own discretion as to the design. At the top he always 211 places the bird or animal cloak in which his first ancestor, 556 traced patrilineally, came to this earth. Beneath this is the cloak of his mother's first ancestor if it differs from his father's. 778
There are no fixed rules for other representations. Sometimes 532 a man wishes to display the cloaks of the first ancestors of his [793] wife, or wives; more often, the designs are of creatures with which his own ancestors came in contact after reaching this earth.[1] One of the first settlers, Smanax (I, p. 331), married a Bella Bella woman from whom he obtained a ceremony connected with a whale, an animal which has often been used on the totem-poles of his descendants. The lower figures on totempoles often represent creatures from which a recent ancestor of the chief obtained supernatural assistance. Consequently, the number of designs which may be used is legion, and the order of portrayal is immaterial. Moreover, Bella Coola art is not sufficiently realistic for designs to be easily recognized, nor is there standard conventionalization of little used animals; so it follows that the designs on totem-poles are often unidentifiable.[2] This is of little consequence, since their value rests neither upon the artistic skill exhibited, nor even upon their significance in connection with the owner's ancestral myth, but upon the goods expended to validate the display.

All Bella Coola totem-poles are carved from the trunks of [824] huge cedars, with the wood cut away so that the designs stand out in high relief. The carvers are allowed great latitude both [184] in choice of form and colouring, hence there is wide variation

[1]Mamamkaiu is the term applied to animals with which ancestors came in [225] contact, other than their cloaks.

[2]This statement represents the layman's point of view, that is, of the Bella Coola who was not himself a carpenter-sculptor. It is probable that an expert would have greater facility in recognizing the conventionalized forms used by his ancestors, although the whole pattern of Bella Coola culture was opposed to extreme standardization. Unfortunately, wood-carving, in fact art work of every kind, had degenerated to such an extent that only one man with any recognized skill in that respect was still living when this study was made. He was both unreliable and uncooperative, so that it was impossible even to collect examples of his work, still less to record his interpretations of the designs of masks or other objects carved by his predecessors.

presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alt dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the nuxut, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alt should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alt names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alt appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alt can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nuxpual for his name Sesalots which came to earth with Smanus (I, p. 331) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alt, Thiyakum, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sisaqal (I, p. 316), who assumed the designation of Thiyakum after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'nilas.

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,* long, long ago, Sqaxtlw came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sawan-a, and a mortal; so he

539 brothers have the right, moreover, to hunt and collect food in the places
424 used by these first ancestors. The areas so authorized are:

Atsaulqmax: the mountain where they first came to earth.

Ohpowky: a valley leading into the main valley of the Kimsquit River where Ooqumkilda was accustomed to hunt.

Nalak kit: a valley where Imanat's wives used to pick berries.

Ymuck: a level tract of country on the bank of the Kimsquit River twenty-eight miles from its mouth. No people landed here and Imanat pre-empted it as a hunting-ground.

Nalqa kat: another valley where Imanat's wives used to pick berries.

The place in the Kimsquit River where their salmon-weir was erected, and the spot where they caught eulachon.

536 The length and wealth of detail embodied in this myth raises the 115 question of whether it is one of the usual type, or represents a combination of several stories strung together and adorned by a man eager to glorify the traditions of his own ancestors. It was received from Jim Pollard, a Kimsquit Indian, descended from Imanat, and himself the son of this same, a valuable and reliable informant. Jim is a man of great ability, who has given more protection than any other Indian of either Bella Coola or Kimsquit, and who, accordingly, has been able to validate very fully his ancestral myths and the names embodied therein. Owing to the deaths of his relatives, Jim has been able to use designations and portions of this legend which otherwise would certainly have belonged to other people. In this respect it, therefore, represents an amalgamation, but one of a legitimate nature. Theoretically, every myth would be complete if it were not for the parts possessed by others, and the aim of every wise Bella Coola is to seek the return of these pieces by judicious marriage. Jim has been able to achieve this by the death of his relatives and the assistance of his wife, herself a descendant of Imanat. Before the coming of the white man and the consequent dwindling of population, it is unlikely that any one person would have the duly validated right to tell a myth of this length, but theoretically it was possible, and might have been done by anyone as superior to his fellows as this man is to the present inhabitants of Kimsquit.

[824] the surface of the water, invisible to all. Its destination is [825] Imaiac-a, whence its captain leaps to Nacqulwaiste to await the coming of Alquaiaw. The crew consists of a number of supernatural beings, who will be described in connection with the ceremonial on the night of nalacum. This canoe, which brings the salmon and berries to Bella Coola, has four masts but no sails, and is fourmous. Whenever the weather is fine, Naákynum lowers first one side and then the other of his craft so that the salmon may leave; after swimming around for a time they always return, refreshed by their exercise. In former [785] times when people were purified by ceremonial chastity, sev-
[831] eral succeeded in seeing the craft, and from them it is known [787] that it is about six hundred yards in length, that it travels without leaving a wake, that any canoes passing near are sucked along after it, and that a mallard duck, perched on the bow, quacks continuously. Intelligent informants agreed that the bringing of the salmon during the autumn was inconsistent, but they could offer no explanation. One man believed that [624] this was pointed out not many years ago by a man whose [776] patron was Naákynum, but that the marshals requested him not to upset established ritual by too much logic. Naákynum
[575] is patron for several kakaciat, who are believed by the uninitiated to be able to see his canoe. As he passes up the river [796] the kaciat dances begin.
[184]

It is unnecessary to describe the full ritual in each village, as this is supposed to be identical, and probably contains only [424] slight variations, if any. In Tsmaat the kaciat who has the [551] prerogative of seeing Naákynum is a certain Kwaiike-i,* in Kimsquit, Hackwamacum,* and in Hakiaat, Kemtown. Although,

[115] *Details of this dance were learned from the father of Kwaiike-i, who intimated that the name was a family possession. Several months later an old woman informed us the leading of this dance-series by her father and said that the present one had failed to secure it. Rivalry feelings are often caused by disputes of this kind.

the Bella Bella, Fort Rupert, and Rivers Inlet people. in Bella Coola a poor man may be the most dreaded l of all, if he has been able duly to validate and per- s right in this respect. Nor is the dance carried out e same rigour in Bella Coola as among the tribes of the oast.

ritual of different prerogatives varies to such an extent eral accounts must be given, in spite of the repetitions is form of presentation entails. On account of the of time necessary, a Cannibal dance usually begins the season. The following describes the manner in Kämätslaks of Kimsquit, who can bite the living, car- t his rite; it was obtained from his brother, who is hly conversant with the details. It will be convenient to Kämätslaks as X, and to use the present tense out.

eeting is held at which the marshals and others choose, ment with X and his relatives, a day suitable for him nence his performance. Under normal circumstances ome qoiłum that a marshal announces that he can hear , and on the following evening, when the ritual has npleted, the uninitiated are startled to hear continuous g from the slopes of the mountains near the village. truments used are of the usual bladder type, but the wn-out sound, termed Aiiläxa, is said to be the voice indly supernatural woman, Snitsmän·a.[1]

[1] ...ade function of this being seems to be the restoring to life of those who have been killed in the performance of kusiut rites. The Bella Coola in whether or not she is identical with Tlentsätsa·a. The noise which coming is produced by the whistles of four kukusiut who throughout the the forests and mountains within ear-shot of the village. By bending up and down, they are able to increase the weirdness and apparent of the sound. The four travel in single file; the leader blows, and when is nearly exhausted he presses the hand of the second man, who starts urthwith, while the original leader drops to the rear. As the second eary, he signals in the same way to the third, and so on; in this way ng is continuous, and the uninitiated are convinced that it cannot be mortals, even if such an idea should occur to them. If a non-member t the four, they would at once kill him or make him a prisoner, keeping night until he could be initiated into the society.

songs are sung, all that are needed when a Cannibal does not go to the land above. 575* 796* 787

On the following day, gothm, the masks are manufactured and the ritual proceeds in the normal manner. In the evening the uninitiated are invited to watch the dances, at which X is the first to perform, lengthening his face and protruding his lips to their greatest extent in order to frighten his beholders.

The ritual of the next evening, nakuam, corresponds to the usual pattern. Before the entry of the uninitiated, X has concealed himself so that nothing can detract from their awe at sight of the masked figures. Alquntim stands in state behind the fire, sometimes announcing his own name, while Ana'likwelsaix moves to and fro, adding to the solemnity of the occasion with her explanations, echoed by the heralds. Alqutlas, represented with blood-stained lips, moves around the fire, restrained by the three Holders, and the audience is told that this is how they act in the land above. When the guests have gazed sufficiently on these marvels they are sent away, and the masks are burnt in the usual manner, accompanied by the gentle singing of one of X's songs. Late at night a number of kukusiut go with X to the sidewalk outside his house, where they expel his call by pressing upwards with their hands against his stomach and calling hoip.

For the rest of the winter X conducts himself in the manner of any kusiut who has danced. 575* 796*

Although similar in outlines, the prerogatives enjoyed by Cannibals differ so considerably that no clear picture of the rites can be obtained without detailed descriptions of several. The following is an account of a dance carried out by Lulalimut, a biting Cannibal of Nusqalst. It was obtained from one of the marshals who, of course, understood the details of every performance. The origin of the name is unknown, although the informant believed that it had been created in this world by the chiefs in consequence of the manner in which a shaman ancestor of the dancer had been in the habit of biting people [424] [115]

In the course of generations, Snung has combined with his self-anthropophagic prerogative that of eating dogs. As already mentioned, such a merging of rights, obtained from different ancestors, is by no means uncommon. The following account of the manner in which he carries out (or carried out, for the dance has not been performed for a number of years) his rite was obtained from one of the Kimsquit marshals. Many details are omitted which have been fully described in former Cannibal dances. It will be convenient to refer to Snung as X.

As with other Cannibals, when the call comes to X he begins to cry out and the uninitiated are expelled from his house, but not before they have seen him sink his teeth into his own arm, and apparently inflict a serious wound. In reality the Cannibal usually cuts himself in anticipation, so that the application of his teeth merely serves to reopen the incision and cause the blood to flow freely. Dogs are given to X, as to other dog-eating Cannibals, and he is escorted to every house, so that the uninitiated may stare with awe upon his blood-stained body and dripping jaws. Later, when he and the ɬukusiut have returned to the Cannibal's home, a herald goes to every house, announcing that his fellows are going to fasten X. The rope used in this particular rite is long and thin, with a small loop in the centre for his neck. It is forced upon X with the usual struggling, and again the herald makes his round, announcing:

"We are measuring his arms for cords of dyed and undyed cedar-bark."

These too are placed upon him, and the ɬukusiut march X, pinioned, to every house, while he growls and gives every indication of being half mad with anger at his bonds. He is taken back to his own house and at intervals throughout the day a herald informs all in the village of the number of dogs he has eaten, and of the number of wounds he has inflicted upon himself.

That night X eludes his captors and is carried away to the

they do not like. No compensation can be claimed, on the theory that supernatural beings do not have to pay for any damage they may do. Although the property of some kukusiut is destroyed, the chief sufferers are the uninitiated; this serves to increase their fear and respect for the society with which such all-powerful beings are in league. After visiting every house in the village, the party returns to X's, where the masks are burnt, the call sent back, and the proceedings conclude in the usual manner.

A certain amount of information concerning the history of the Breaker dance was obtained from Syuł, the owner of the prerogative just described. He is a well-informed man, but the writer had no opportunity of comparing his beliefs with those of his associates, so the following must be regarded as unsubstantiated evidence. This man stated that the Breaker dance is the most important of all in Bella Bella, and that many Bella Coola prerogatives have been obtained from this source, although some of their first ancestors likewise enjoyed it. He further stated that the term, wałkista, by which the Bella Coola always designate a Breaker, is of Bella Bella origin, and that the ancient Bella Coola term was dztia.[*] Syuł also told of an occasion when a number of Bella Bella, present on the qoiłm night of a Bella Coola ceremony, were disturbed when eating by the thud of a stone thrown, from outside, against the wall of the back-room. Out rushed a number of kukusiut, incensed at the disrespect shown to their gathering. They caught the offender, but released him when he was found to be a Bella Bella Breaker, foolishly demonstrating his prowess. The marshals decided to retaliate and arranged with two Bella Coola Breakers to exercise their rights and destroy the canoes and food-boxes of their guests. They did so, and later paid for the damage. The Bella Coola were thus able to demon-[*] Syuł and several of his children are the only Bella Coola known to the writer who habitually use the sound "s." For example, he says "Ewlsrt," instead of "Ewlsłł." He says that he is himself unable to distinguish any peculiarity in his own pronunciation, although other Bella Coola are aware of it.

575 ʼnuxuiat send back X's call in the usual manner. Then, two 996 by two, the masks are cast on to the fire and the ceremonial is over.

THE DANCE OF THE TALLY POSTS

[973] As previously described, a tally post is erected in the land [777] above for every Bella Coola at birth. As long as this memorial [753] is upright and firm, the individual to whom it refers enjoys health and prosperity, but if it becomes crooked he falls ill.
[424] The uninitiated believe that several ʼnuxuiat have the prerogative of climbing to the land above during the ceremonial season and straightening leaning tally posts. This is such a [178] useful ability that it must have exercised great influence on [164] the uninitiated in early days, but the rite has not been properly carried out since the smallpox epidemic in the last century.
[115] The following account was obtained from two old men who remembered the manner in which a certain Qoikoil of Tsmaxl performed a year or two before "The Great Sickness." Neither of the informants was a ʼnuxiat at the time, but they were able to supplement their recollections of the dance with what they afterwards learnt when initiated, so the following account is probably accurate in outline though deficient in detail. It will be convenient to refer to the dancer as X, and describe the ceremony in the present tense. It was also performed at Kimsquit many years ago.

The rite resembles ʼnuxiam dances in many respects. X must obtain the consent of the marshals during the preceding summer, and their permission is refused unless the prospective dancer is a man of proved discretion. If they agree, X asks a [253] number of ʼnuxuiat women to help him by making a very long and strong rope of nettle fibre. At intervals the work-women gather for the purpose in the back-room of X's house, taking [418] care that no uninitiated see what they are doing. Every effort is made to ensure that there is no flaw in the rope as a break would be a serious matter, punishable by death.

Near the winter solstice the marshals choose a suitable time assemble to witness the dance of Alpuxúm. This is his function in the land above, so it is natural for him to do the same in this world.

THE DANCE OF Alpuxúm'S FISHERMAN

Alpuxúm in the land above has a servant who uses a hand-net, xoxo, in fishing for his master. He is accordingly known as Alpuxúm's Xoxoxúm, "Fisherman," and is patron for a ʌuxiut.

THE DANCE OF THE TOP

The playful Sówilpumalh: Alpuxúm has a favourite toy consisting of a stick which can be made to spin between the hands. This top, if it may so be termed, is patron for some ʌuxiut. The writer was unable to learn how it is displayed on nalaxam.

THE DANCE OF THE PETRIFIED HAMMER

The patron of one ʌuxiut is a hammer which in some way was changed to stone in the beginning of time when the Beila Coola River first flowed to the sea.

THE DANCE OF THE GRIZZLY BEAR

A ʌuxiut named Sélwat has, as patron, a grizzly bear resident in Xwaqwa's house.

VARIOUS ORIGIN MYTHS

In most cases ʌuxiut dances have been preserved until the present day, although the myths on which they depend have long since been forgotten, but the reverse is sometimes the case. The following myths, were recorded with few, or no details of the associated dances. In several cases, one of the same type has already been recorded, so that the significance will be apparent.

A COMPOSITE ORIGIN MYTH[*]

Long ago there lived in Sisaa a man and his wife who were powerful, prosperous, and able to give their children many good names. This 424 Qwaixosän·i moved to and fro among the chiefs as they were busying

* 575 themselves in preparations for leaving, and drew to herself the spirit of
* 796 every one of the party. As they pushed off from the shore, she put these 539 on a board which she set afloat behind them. It capsized in the first rapids, immersing the various spirits, and presently the canoes were upset and their occupants all drowned. The six orphans continued to live at Stuix where they intermarried with the poor people and in time the village increased in population and fully regained its old importance.

This myth has many points of resemblance with those described in vol. I, chap. IX. Each of the six orphans, and especially Qwaixosän·i, received the boon of supernatural good fortune, but the present given to the five took the form of a kusiut prerogative. The names so received are either in use at the present time or have but recently become dormant. Nuxim was used by the father's brother of the woman who related the story; Song'mai belongs to her son, a boy about eight years old; Nuxem is the property of another youth, related to the family; uxem has been lent to a friend, subject to recall at any time, and Qwaixosän·i is used by a girl relative about twenty years of age. Each of these has the prerogative of carrying out the dance given to their ancestor at Stuix, long ago.

ORIGIN MYTH OF THE DANCE OF THE SUPERNATURAL CARPENTERS[108]

In the beginning Äłqwnäm sent down to a point on the upper reaches of the Clearwater four brothers, Ninitsamloix, Waixxum, Äłqwnäm, and Hai·la·kala with several sisters whose names have been forgotten. They thought they were the first to reach this earth but presently, to their sorrow, saw Tłäkwakila, a man who had preceded them, and the women cried bitterly in their mortification. Äłqwnäm had given Ninitsamloix shamanistic power which he now used as he rubbed his hands over his sisters' faces to carry away their tears.

"Become fog," he said, as he held the palms of his tear-stained hands towards the land of the Ta·yo·xl people.

[821] That is why there are thick fogs in the vicinity of Alert Bay to the present day.

Ninitsamloix and his relatives moved a short distance down the valley

*575 long ago the kusiut society was composed of individuals re-
*796 garded as having supernatural endowments, and who perhaps 178 believed this themselves. In course of time their influence 184 increased to such an extent that they were able to convince non-members of the supernatural origin of objects used in their [532] ceremonial.

Unfortunately, information from Kimsquit was obtained [115] almost exclusively from one old man, who, though a marshal well informed in kusiut matters and in many ways an almost ideal informant, had long since realized that the dances could be nothing more than representations, and it is possible that his remarks were coloured by this knowledge. Though he tended to minimize the attitude of belief with which the un-[781] initiated regarded masked figures, yet he fully agreed with every statement made by the Bella Coola themselves with regard to the firm belief of non-members concerning the supernatural powers of the dancers. He also confirmed statements [688] respecting punishment if an error should occur, and mentioned the shooting of a Bella Bella dancer who had allowed his mask to fall during a sisook dance. As far as actual ritual is concerned, the differences in procedure between Bella Coola and Kimsquit are unimportant, and differences in belief are less than they appear at first sight. The Bella Coola kukusiut [781] seem to have perfected their organization and to have been able to impress the uninitiated to a greater extent than their Kimsquit fellows, but the fundamentals of the society are identical.

*575 Traditions concerning the early history of the society are *796 probably of little value historically, but they are important as 173 indicating the mental attitude of the Bella Coola. Considering the importance of the society there are relatively few accounts of what took place long ago; the Bella Coola know that it exists, believe that the rites are identical with those carried out by their ancestors for generations, and theorize no further.
It was only in the beginning of time that things were radically different; it is believed that then all the people were endowed

CHAPTER II

SONGS

Introductory — Ssaok Songs — Xe tla Songs — A'alk Songs — Nuxäxkämg Songs — Marriage Songs — Mourning Songs — Shaman Songs — Kusiut Songs — Non-Ceremonial Songs

Introductory

THE singing of songs is an essential part of all Bella Coola rites so that a study of them is important, entirely apart from their musical value. Their texts throw light on the beliefs of the performers, on the aims of the ceremonies, and, above all, give concrete instances of what the uninitiated are led to believe. This is particularly true of those used in kusiut dances, and for this reason all songs have been deferred until this chapter in which they can be grouped together. [190]* [575]*

The texts of songs are difficult to obtain. Snatches of many are remembered, but few individuals are acquainted with the complete version. A phonograph was used to record the music, and it was soon found that very few people were qualified to sing into the machine. Some became confused and forgot the words; some began to laugh; and some lacked the poise to attempt to sing. One elderly Kimsquit man, Jim Pollard, was found to be the best and most reliable singer, and he was used almost exclusively for phonographic work. Hence the records are stamped with his musical technique. Others approached his ability, but he alone preserved an art which had been common in former days. Over one hundred songs were obtained with the assistance of this man. 126 115 533*

The text was always obtained before a song was sung into the machine, thus assuring that the recorded version agreed with the written words. Even with this check, the writing down of songs is extremely difficult. Choral endings are widely employed, consisting of non-essential suffixes inserted for musical effect. It was often impossible to record these in the 126 533* 195 grave difficulties in explaining their customs, as the white man has in understanding them. 153 124

The writer was impressed by the brilliance shown by several of the natives. Joshua Moody, for example, is essentially the philosopher. More individualistic than most of his tribesmen, he was one of the first to adopt Christianity and has been a faithful follower of the new creed. Deeply interested in religious questions, he has stored up what has been told him of the Bible and pondered deeply on all problems of life. Not particularly practical, subject to fits of anger or moroseness, but with a meditative temperament which delights in seeking biblical parallels and synonyms for Bella Coola practices, his is the kind of mind which, in other walks of life, would have produced the professor of philosophy. Jim Pollard is quite another type. Essentially practical, he has devoted his energies to keeping abreast of changing conditions. He is the best singer and composer in Bella Coola, the best canoeman for miles; he has learnt to handle a motor-boat engine, to aid prospectors for minerals, and has succeeded in amassing and saving a considerable amount of money. Jim excelled all other informants in clearness and logical presentation of his explanations, though he showed a slight tendency, intelligible enough, to gloss over aspects which he knew would be considered unpleasant. If Jim had been a white man, he would undoubtedly have made his mark in the world of business. The late Captain Schooner differed from either of the preceding. Older than they, and unconverted, he, perhaps, came nearest to the original, uncontaminated Bella Coola type. Heavy in build, coarse in humour and expression, he had a heart of gold and was a fine example of a native gentleman. He was glad to assist most patiently in recording ancient lore, being intensely proud of the traditions of his ancestors. A friendship developed from this which is one of the writer's happiest memories. Often in the evenings life in general was discussed, the war, the rush of progress in big cities, the quest for wealth, the spread of white civilization, and the problems raised by the contact of peoples.

177 he revealed himself as a tribal patriarch, proud of his family's [153] history and eager to assist his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, but feeling himself lost and helpless in the struggle before them. With sadness, but without bitterness, he used to speak of the approaching end of Bella Coola culture, and his words brought home the tragedy which the spread of civilization brings to so many, and the responsibility resting upon the white people as a whole.

153 Until an intelligence test is devised to correlate the mental 115 ability of the white man with that of the native, it is impossible to compare the two scientifically. None the less, the writer deliberately expresses the opinion that Joshua Moody and Jim Pollard are two of the most brilliant men he has met in any walk of life. They are undoubtedly the most able of the Bella Coola; others have only slightly less ability, while the mass of the population compares favourably with an
178 average white community. Their ability, however, is definitely conditioned by their conservatism. Absolute trust in the traditions of their ancestors has checked speculation, as the established explanation is never questioned; new inventions, unauthorized by custom, have been regarded as almost sacri-
[626] legious; the force of public opinion, while valuable as a deterrent to anti-social practices, has effectively restrained innovations. The Bella Coola are a good example of a community where development has been atrophied by extreme conservatism fostered by religious beliefs.

105 Taking into account the material obstacles, the achievements of these people have not been insignificant. In former [322] times, provided only with tools of stone and untempered copper, they built graceful canoes, made watertight boxes, hewed planks from mighty cedars, and erected large houses which called for considerable engineering skill. Judged by
[532] white standards, their carving and painting lacked artistic deli-
[535] cacy, but it required no mean ability to portray crest designs to meet their own standards. Passing from the purely mechanical are apparently more recent comers to the coast than their neighbors and have not fully adopted this coast culture.

The following examples of sympathetic magic and witchcraft, 114
collected during 1920 to 1923 among the Bellacoola, illustrate 121 the extent of their belief in this direction.

Most of this information was given me by the late Captain 115
Schooner, born about 1848, and Joshua Moody, born about 1868, [191] both apparently full-blood Bellacoola Indians. Neither of them spoke English and both gave me the data in Chinook jargon, which I have endeavored to interpret and arrange in logical order, but have tried to render in as nearly as possible the Indian mode of thought, feeling and expression. Schooner was a pagan gentleman. Joshua has great knowledge of plants and animals, and is a Bellacoola scientist, but his great ambition and jealousy, combined with his disloyalty in giving up his own people's customs and adopting a very thin veneer of Christianity, color his statements relating to beliefs, although his plant and animal data have always withstood cross examination and comparison with the data supplied by other Indians. Alec Davis and Mrs. Willie [191]
Mack told of the toad. They do not talk English and spoke to me in Chinook jargon. Only the accounts about the grizzly bear skin and the bracelet of beaver skin, which were given me by Mrs. Stoessiger, were told in English.

The material was not given as accounts of magic or witch- 114
craft, but rather as part of the data regarding the properties of 121
plants and animals of which I was endeavoring to collect as complete information as possible.

Joshua, who is even younger than Captain Schooner, remem- 114
bers the time when Mr. John Clayton was the only white man 115 living in the Bella Coola valley, and when they saw only one other white man every year or two. Consequently these men remember the old Bellacoola beliefs before they were much, if at all, affected by European ideas.

It will be noticed that magic among the Bellacoola is con- 789
sidered of use both for beneficial and injurious purposes, and 754 that the materials giving effect to it are of both plant and animal origin.

MATERIA MEDICA OF THE BELLA COOLA AND NEIGHBOURING TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

By Harlan I. Smith

INTRODUCTION

This paper describes the materia medica of four tribes of British Columbia, the Bella Coola of Bella Coola valley, the Gitksan of Skeena river, the Carrier who live in the territory behind both of these tribes, and the Sekani of the headwaters of Peace river. Among the Bella Coola the medicines are largely family possessions known to a few individuals only, so that two families may have different remedies for the same specific complaint; but this is not the case among the other tribes. Everywhere magical practices enter largely into the treatment of disease, but are not touched upon in this report. It was impossible for the Indians to diagnose many of their maladies, so that the identifications given here are in many cases problematical.

Most of the information relating to the Bella Coola was given the writer in 1920-22, by Joshua Mossly, apparently a full-blood Bella Coola Indian, born about 1868. As he did not speak English he gave the data in Chinook jargon, which has been interpreted and arranged in logical order. Joshua is an Indian scientist with great knowledge of the local plants and animals. He remembers when Mr. John Clayton was the only white man living in Bella Coola valley, and when the inhabitants saw only one other white man every year or two. Consequently he can recall the old Bella Coola material culture before it was much affected by European ideas.

Some of the information relating to the Bella Coola was given the writer in 1922-23 by the late Captain Schooner, also, apparently, a full-blood, born about 1848, who used the Chinook jargon. Abe Hans, Alexander Clahsan, Louie Hall, and other Bella Coola Indians likewise gave information and corroboration.

Most of the information relating to the Southern Carrier Indians of Tlatchie was secured during 1920-1922 from Charlie Weed, also Fowler Charlie or Handsome Charlie, a native of that place, born about 1874. Charlie used the peculiar form of broken or pidgeon English commonly employed for communication between the whites and the Carrier and Chilcotin Indians of this region.

The information about the Sekani and the Northern Carriers of Hagwilget is from stray field notes kindly supplied by Mr. D. Jenness.

The information relating to the Gitksan was secured in 1925-26 from the late John Fowler and Abraham Fowler of Kitwanga, John Fowler and Dick Robinson of Hazelton, with additions and corroboration from a few others, all old Gitksan Indians, apparently full-blood. The information was secured mainly in English, although Abraham Fowler used also the Chinook jargon.

The method the writer employed was to submit specimens of the plants to his informants and question them concerning all their uses. Of the information thus obtained only the medicinal portion has been presented here. The plants were later identified by Mr. M. O. Malte, of the National Museum, Ottawa.

represent. Every time the sacred objects of a gens are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the various gentes, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual. That is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the gens to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, could not become Sisaa'ka. A person cannot take a new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or elder brother. Nesh'-la'ata, to whom I owe my information regarding the gentes, and who is a member of the gens Iala'atimsit of the Talo'ma, stated that he had received the raven when he gave his first potlatch. At his second potlatch he received the eagle. He hopes that his mother will give him the whale at his next potlatch, and will at the same time divulge to him the secrets connected with it. In course of time, he said, he might get even others from his brother; but if the latter's children should prove to be very good, and develop very rapidly, his brother would probably give his secrets to his children. At festivals, when a person acquires a new secret, he changes his name. Each person has two names, a Ki'ititt name, which remains the same throughout life; and a Qi'ntelem name, which is changed at these festivals. Thus, Nesh'ala'ata's (which is his Ki'ititt name) present Qi'ntelem name is Ati'itsawe'ba'ait, but at his next potlatch he intends to take the name of Kalic'kin. These names are also the property of the various gentes, each gens having its own names. In the list of gentes given above, the names enumerated are the Ki'ititt names of the members. In two cases only the Qi'ntelem names have been ascertained (see p. 420). When a man possesses several Sisaa'ka secrets he will distribute them among his children. When a girl marries, her father or mother may, after a child has been born to her, give one or several of their Sisaa'ka secrets to her husband, as his children make him a member of the gens. When a person gets to be old he gives away all his Sisaa'ka secrets. After any secret has been given away the giver must not use it any more. The crest and the Sisaa'ka carvings must not be loaned to others, but each person must keep his own carvings. The only exceptions are the sacred headdresses and the raven rattles, which are not the property of any particular gens.

The laws regarding the potlatch are similar to those of the Kwakiutl. The receiver of a present becomes the debtor of the person who gave the potlatch. If the latter should die the debts become due to his heirs. If the debtor should die his heirs become responsible for the debt. Property is also destroyed at potlatches. This is not returned, and serves only to enhance the social position of the individual who performed this act. It is not necessary that all the property given by a person in a potlatch should be owned by him. He may borrow part of it from his friends, and has to repay it with interest. I was told, for instance, that a man borrowed a large copper-plate and burnt it at a potlatch. When doing so he had to name the price which he was going to pay to the owner in its stead. Since that time he died, and his heirs are now responsible for the amount named at the potlatch.

The Ki'ititt is presided over by a female spirit, called Aneshkimal's. Her abode is a cave in the woods, which she keeps shut from February till October, remaining all the while inside. In October she opens the door of her cave and sits in front of it. A woman is said to have been the first to find her. Aneshkimal's invited her into her cave and taught every morning when the sun rises. He takes care that he rises properly. The first six of these deities are grouped in pairs, and are believed to paint their faces with designs representing moon, stars, and rainbow. In the ka'sint these deities make their appearance, and are represented by masks. Xe'xtsina and Xemxemali'xa wear the design of the full moon, indicated on the mask of Xe'xtsina by a double curved line in red and black, the black outside, passing over forehead, cheeks, and upper lip. Xemxemali'xa has a double curved line in red and black, the red outside, which passes over forehead, cheeks, and chin. Alemki'lik'a and Alemali'xa wear the design of the crescent, drawn in red and black, with differences similar to those between the first and second masks. The fifth Q'emq'emki'lik'a and Q'emq'emali'xa have designs representing stars, both wearing the same style of mask. The seventh is Qala'xawa, whose face represents the blossom of a salmon-berry bush. The next in order, Kali'las (who wants to have blankets first), wears the design of the rainbow in black and blue. The ninth, A'lamk'a, wears on the head a mask representing a kingfisher, and is clothed in a bird-skin blanket. The last of the series is a woman called L'ilat'aqlilas (the eater), the sister of the others. Her face is painted with the design of a bladder filled with grease. She figures in several legends as stealing provisions and pursued by the people whom she has robbed.

The sisan'k', which is danced at potlatches and other festivals of the clans, is presided over by a being that lives in the sun. A man who had gone out hunting met the sisan'k' and was instructed by him in the secrets of the dance. When he returned, he asked the people to clean their houses and to strew them with clean sand before he consented to enter. Then he danced the sisan'k' and told the people what he had seen. He said that the being had commanded them to perform this dance and to adorn themselves when dancing with carved headdresses with trails of cruise skins, and to swing carved rattles. The man, later on, returned to the sun. Ever since that time the B'laula dance the sisan'k'. Besides this, it is stated that the raven gave each clan its secrets. Each clan has its peculiar carvings, which are used in the sisan'k' only, and are otherwise kept a profound secret, i. e., they are the sacred possessions of each clan. All clans, however, wear the beautiful carved headdresses and use the raven rattles, regardless of the carving they represent. Every time the sacred objects of a clan are shown to the people a potlatch is given. The sacred objects, although the property of the various clans, must nevertheless be acquired by each individual—that is to say, every free person has the right to acquire a certain group of carvings and names, according to the clan to which he or she belongs. Slaves and slaves' children, also illegitimate children, can not become sisan'k'. A person can not take a new carving, but must wait until it is given to him by his relatives—father, mother, or older brother. Nuk'sla'xiq, the Indian, to whom I

THE term Bella Coola can be applied to the Indians who formerly occupied more than twenty villages on the lower Bella Coola River in central British Columbia, to their near kinsfolk on the Kimsquit River, and to those living at the head of South Bentinck Arm. Disease and changed conditions consequent upon the coming of the white man have so reduced their numbers that the last two groups of settlements have been virtually abandoned, while only one village remains in the Bella Coola valley. This is located on a reserve near the mouth of the river, and its four hundred inhabitants comprise practically all the survivors of what was once a tribe of several thousand people, with a distinctive language and culture of their own.

The material contained in this monograph was collected in this one village many years ago for the National Museum of Canada.[1] I was in the field during two periods that extended from March to August, 1922, and from September, 1923, to February, 1924. My field notes were worked up and the completed manuscript submitted to the Museum in 1926. Since that time it has suffered various vicissitudes. Recommended for publication by the Chief of the Anthropological Division, it passed through the hands of various editors; questions were raised about its size and the suitability of detailed studies of social anthropology in a government publication, and by the time these matters were adjusted, funds for extensive publications were unavailable and the manuscript was put aside. Since the aim of the investigation was to record, as far as possible, the sum-total of the complex and interwoven social life of the Bella Coola, I did not think it desirable to prepare short articles[2] summarizing different aspects, preferring to await an 128 opportunity for the publication of the manuscript as a whole.

[121] I am deeply grateful to the Canadian Social Science Research Council for making this possible, and to their anonymous readers, many of whose suggestions I have utilized in the final draft, and to the University of Toronto Press for their subsidization.

Though the lapse of time between the field investigation and the appearance in print of the results is unfortunate, it is a matter of less importance than would be the case in other branches of science. To the student of social institutions, the significant fact is that a certain group of homo sapiens has practised certain customs, whether in 1922 or 1948 is immaterial. Furthermore, the aim of the investigation was to collect [121] information on Bella Coola life as it was before the breakdown of their own culture, and for this, data collected between 1922 and 1924 are more valuable than those acquired today. The manuscript was prepared from my extensive field notes, when the material was still fresh in my mind, and, with the exception of this preface and a few minor changes in editing,[8] is presented as it was written in 1924-26.

121 When studying the Bella Coola, I was definitely under the influence of the English school of anthropologists. To Haddon, Rivers, and Seligman, to name the outstanding English field anthropologists of their generation, the study of a native tribe meant an expedition to some far-off corner of the world, to a people about whom little was known. A return visit was improbable; aboriginal customs were passing away, hence it was the duty of the field investigator to learn and to record every scrap of information. I remember Dr. Haddon's insistence that it might be some trivial detail which would throw light on culture distribution, and hence, perhaps, aid in the reconstruction of tribal or racial movements, or in theoretical studies of the development or degeneration of institutions. Characteristic of this school, too, was an intense human interest in field work. To overcome the difficulties of language, of suspicion, and of native reticence was a task in itself. And only when this was accomplished and the investigator recognized as a friend, could the information be obtained upon which the investigator was to describe "his people." As a broad generalization, the attitude of American anthropologists to field work in America is very different. Indians live near at hand; well-educated interpreters and informants are usually available; there is no thought of gleaning information from suspicious natives at the ends of the earth; and, perhaps most important of all, so much of Indian life has disappeared that the American anthropologist must learn by interview and question, rather than by observation and participation. The American school has tended to return repeatedly, often for short periods, to a small group or even to a single informant, and to publish intensive studies of aspects of culture with which the investigator is concerned.

Both approaches have their advantages. Anthropologically, using that term in its broadest sense, American Indians are better known than the natives of other continents; the professional anthropologist knows where to find detailed studies in technical journals and government publications, and to combine them if he wishes to know the life of a people as a whole. But to the anthropologist who is not a specialist in America, as well as to scholars in other social sciences, this lack of synthesis is a definite deterrent, and it may well be asked whether the anthropologist has played his part in making known the results of his branch to workers in cognate fields. It was this which led R. H. Lowie to publish his Crow Indians,[4] and though the author reiterates that the volume contains little that he had not made known in earlier writings[5] in anthropological journals, it is safe to say that the Crow Indians will be read, quoted, and used when other reports on which it is based have been forgotten.

121 128 If I were to investigate and report on the Bella Coola at the present time, I would undoubtedly be influenced by many years of contact with American anthropologists and their work. I would assume a greater knowledge of North-West coast institutions, less interest in the details of ceremonial rites, and it would be impossible not to avoid comparisons with, and observations upon, the theoretical implications of many of the facts recorded. But though every field investigator is strictly objective as to the facts he collects, yet his interests, and his method of presenting them, are coloured by his background; in my case, by the older school of English anthropology. On the whole, I think this is fortunate. It means that the Bella Coola are portrayed as I saw them when I came fresh to a new field, practically uninfluenced by problems of North-West coast culture, and fully prepared to throw myself into their life. They were "my people," not a group in which I was interested because they had, or had not, certain culture traits with which I was concerned. In the course of my teaching experience, furthermore, I have wished repeatedly to give serious students detailed field monographs in which are recorded the interwoven social, religious, and folk-lore concepts of a people, the sum-total of their mental life, collected by one man at one time. This I have tried to do for the Bella Coola.

123 Following the English tradition, I wish to record how this material was collected. Before leaving for British Columbia, [115] I was advised by the late H. I. Smith, who had worked in the area, to talk to Joshua Moody (see Plate 2), an elderly Bella Coola Indian with whom Smith had worked. On explaining to Joshua that I had come to record in permanent form the traditions and lore of his people, Joshua grinned broadly and promised his help. Unfortunately, he spoke only a few words of English. I tried interpreter after interpreter, Indian and white, with only fair success, and my difficulties increased with the [464] opening of the canning season and the consequent employment of the younger men and women. I was urged to learn the [122] Chinook jargon, which serves widely as a lingua franca on the [198] coast, and began the study with much misgiving. The results were surprisingly satisfactory. 123 [122] [198]

After a few weeks I found that I had sufficient knowledge of Chinook to dispense with interpreters and deal directly with the older people, a tremendous advantage. Pride of ancestry is one of the strongest characteristics of the Bella Coola, and once convinced of my sincere interest in and respect for their history, they were willing to talk. They resent the condescension with which most white men regard them, so that contact with one who was friendly and sympathetic came as a pleasant surprise. There were, of course, difficulties. The canning season had begun and every able-bodied man was working away from the village. The conviction of each person that he was the best source of information, and that conferences with another were useless or unreliable, caused distrust. The desire of each informant to discuss only what interested him; the complexity of Bella Coola life itself; the necessity of checking every statement, and the extreme difficulty of doing so on account of discrepancies in the myths of different families; the fear, almost groundless, of each individual that someone else had infringed on his rights by recounting some legend; and, not least, the need for tact, patience, and a sense of humour under all conditions, were some of the obstacles to be surmounted. Nor was Chinook entirely satisfactory. It has enough words for matters pertaining to fishing, hunting, and trading, but for the realms of sociology or theology it is inadequate. This difficulty could not have been overcome without the patient help of my informants. Animated by the desire to help, they used every expedient in the way of parallel and synonym to explain obscure terms. Sometimes a younger man was called in for some abstruse meaning; more often it gradually became clear from different applications. Once the significance of a word was definitely understood, I made a note of it and used it henceforth. A useful vocabulary was thus built up, and conversations were carried on in mixed Bella Coola and Chinook, eked out by whatever English words were known by the person with [181] [464] 124

124 whom I was working. Before I left, this medley contained so much Bella Coola that it was unintelligible to white people who knew Chinook alone.

Activities in the canneries would have interfered seriously with my work during the summer of 1922 if two men had not [115] been confined to the village, Captain Schooner owing to an injured wrist, and Jim Pollard by the illness of his wife. These two men were willing to work half a day apiece without jealousy. Each was intensely proud of the traditions of his people and, realizing that their culture was passing away, was glad to assist in making it permanent in writing. An intimacy sprang 123 up between Captain Schooner (see Plate 3) and myself culmin- [597] ating in my adoption, a circumstance which established and improved my position in the community. In this way I was enabled to collect a large amount of material before July when it was necessary for me to leave for the east.

In September, 1923, when I returned to Bella Coola, I found that Captain Schooner had died a few months before, respected alike by white men and Indians. With the aid of others with whom I had made contact it was possible to obtain much new information, as well as to clear up many obscure points. The previous summer I had been so overwhelmed with material that I had no time to collate it in the field and the gaps only became apparent after a year's study. The men were so busy hunting and laying in stocks of fire-wood, however, that I found it difficult to arrange regular hours of work, but this was a trifle compared with the initial difficulties of my first trip. In October, when the Bella Coola began to prepare for 123 the winter dances, they had to appoint a successor to Captain 796 Schooner, who had played a leading part in their production. 887 Having been adopted by him, it was suggested that I take his place, a proposition which I readily accepted. This admitted me to the ranks of the old men, and I imagine that my interest encouraged them to hold more ceremonials than they had done for several years. In former times, a number of the older men used to devote much time and thought to the composing, remembering, and rendering of songs; in 1923 it was found that Jim Pollard (see Plate 4) alone had a sufficiently accurate memory to act as announcer. As more and more men wished to perform, he found himself unable to keep the texts in order, and asked me to join the choir as prompter. I held this position for the rest of the winter, taking a full part in every ceremony. Although the old customs had broken down enormously, this actual participation enabled me to understand the winter dances in a manner impossible from mere description. Later on, phonographic records were made of many of the songs used, thus preserving specimens of the fast disappearing music.

My intimate association with the Bella Coola enabled me to collect the material here presented which, having been verified and reverified, I have every reason to believe is correct. Nevertheless, it has one serious defect owing to the lack of acuteness of my ear. I found it almost impossible to differentiate certain sounds; in fact, I sometimes recorded the same word with different spellings. Consequently, I cannot guarantee the accuracy of the native terms used in this monograph. Moreover, I was entirely unable to analyze proper names, which would have been of great value in understanding the attributes of supernatural beings.

When writing up field notes, the realization of my own inefficiency in the recording of sounds tempted me to rely upon the spelling of Boas whenever possible. After considerable hesitation, I rejected this course for the following reason. Ethnological work falls into two categories, descriptive and comparative. This monograph is of the former type, based on actual work in the field and the inclusion of any material from another source would destroy its originality. I believe that a descriptive work should consist exclusively of the author's own research, and I have adhered to this principle in spite of the advantages which would have followed the use of Boas' linguistic terms. For the same reason no attempt has been made to compare the customs and beliefs of the Bella Coola with those of other tribes, although this would undoubtedly have shed light on obscure points. That is a task for the comparative student and nothing but confusion would result from such an incorporation in this volume. For the benefit of the reader, footnotes have been inserted referring to The Mythology of the Bella Coola Indians[6] by Boas, the most comprehensive description of the tribe. In the field I deliberately disregarded published accounts.

And what of these people, the subject of this book?

The intimate experiences of the second winter in Bella Coola only confirmed my feeling of sadness at the decay of the old arts and crafts. Music, painting, carving, weaving, story-telling, acting, all are passing away. Only a handful of the tribe survives, and of them the younger people ape the white man and have little interest in the lore and customs of their fathers. I know of few sadder experiences than talking with some Bella Coola patriarch and realizing the tragedy which he feels at the termination of his people's culture.

Though the individual may suffer, civilization must press onward and the life of the Indian will soon disappear. With it will pass forever manners, customs, beliefs, rites, and knowledge, data of value to students of man both now and in the future. Every year lessens the amount of information available. In Bella Coola, for example, the death of Captain Schooner left a gap which none could fill. Others must follow him, and within a short time there will be no ethnological work possible in that tribe. A tithe of the people may survive, but their culture, the growth of generations, will have been swept away.

Most of those to whom I am indebted for help in this study have passed away. Dr. A. C. Haddon and Dr. W. H. R. Rivers, both of Cambridge University, who were my mentors in anthropology, are dead; so too is Dr. E. Sapir, former Chief of the Anthropological Division in the National Museum, who gave me instruction in phonetics, and Mr. H. I. Smith, Dominion Archaeologist, to whom are owing most of the photographs reproduced here. I can only place on record my deep obligation and gratitude to each of these four. Dr. D. Jenness, who succeeded Dr. Sapir, was most co-operative. In Bella Coola, I was treated with uniform kindness by the white inhabitants, particularly Mrs. Clayton, Mr. and Mrs. Bert Robson, and Mr. and Mrs. Andy Christensen. 000 [127]

Finally, and most important of all, I wish to express my appreciation to the Bella Coola themselves. Without their generous, kindly and helpful co-operation, this book could never have been written. I came as an uninvited stranger; they treated me as a friend and a guest; and I left with intense regret. My chief friends were Joshua Moody, Captain Schooner, and Jim Pollard, but I was also greatly assisted by Mr. Willie Mack, Mr. and Mrs. Tallio Charlie, and Mr. and Mrs. Lame Charlie. To a host of others I am indebted in only a slightly less extent. The aid and friendship of these men and women is one of my pleasantest memories, and one which I wish to record in all gratitude and appreciation. [115]

In the actual publication of this complicated manuscript, I have likewise been fortunate in receiving co-operation and help. The University of Toronto Press accepted it for publication during the war, facing—and overcoming—the inevitable shortage of materials and of skilled craftsmen. Great difficulty was experienced in obtaining the type for phonetic symbols; to avoid undue duplication all native words, whether proper or common names, have been printed in italics. It is a tribute to the Press that it has completed the work. I am especially indebted to several former members of the editorial staff: Mrs. Hewitt, who supervised the initial editing, and her assistants, Mrs. Hackett and Mrs. Buzek. Mr. Weir, foreman of the composing room of the Press, has surmounted endless difficulties with enthusiasm and ingenuity. I am also grateful to Miss Harman, Associate Editor, who took the responsibility for final production details. Mr. Burns, General Manager of the Press, and Professor Brown, Editor, have both been helpful and co-operative throughout. 128 [104] 000

000 It is a pleasure to record my indebtedness to my wife for her help in the initial preparation of the manuscript. In the final revision, and in seeing the manuscript through the press, I received painstaking and efficient help from Miss Margaret Thomson, my museum assistant. Miss Catherine McEwen was kind enough to prepare the line drawing of a Bella Coola mask used on the title-page.

CHAPTER I

LOCATION AND ENVIRONMENT

Location—Bella Coola Villages—Tribal Organization—Neighbouring Tribes

Location

"BELLA COOLA" is the common designation of those Indians who, until a few years ago, inhabited the valley of the Bella Coola River in central British Columbia. Boas has recorded[1] that the name is a mis-pronunciation of Bilxula,[2] a Kwakiutl word of doubtful origin which white pioneers assumed to be the appellation of the people in question. There is no term in their own language to include the groups treated in this monograph. Linguistically, the Bella Coola form an isolated island of Salish-speaking people, separated from others of the same stock by tribes of Athapascan and Kwakiutl lineage.[3] Culturally, they belong to the central section of the North Pacific coast area.[3]

The Bella Coola River rises among the mountainous uplands of central British Columbia. Its two main branches fall rapidly, about forty-five miles from the sea, into two deep gorges which unite, some five miles farther on, to form the valley of the Bella Coola. Down this the river rushes in serpentine curves (see Plate 5). Too shallow and too rapid for the use of large boats, even if such had been known to the Bella Coola, it serves to bear their dug-out canoes, each hewn from some mighty cedar. The valley is never wider than two or three miles and is hemmed in by lofty snow-capped moun-

133 tains. From each pocket between these mountains an ice-cold affluent comes swirling down to the main river. The 137 predominant tree in the river valleys is the cedar[4] which in many cases attains great girth and height. Cottonwoods flourish in places, and everywhere there is an almost impenetrable undergrowth of devil's club, berry bushes, and other shrubbery of almost tropical density. On the lower slopes of the mountains, moss-festooned pines and spruces are the most common trees, gradually becoming smaller and fewer until the 133 barren peaks are reached. The mountains rise so precipitously that their snowcaps and glaciers seem to overhang the valley, a narrow ribbon of green winding far below. The range of vision from the bank of the river is limited by the all-encircling mountains. Here and there a distant vista opens up to expose peak after peak, but on the whole there is a feeling of confinement, in contrast with the open wastes of the upper country where the Bella Coola rises. Mountains, forests, flowing water, these are the three dominant impressions of the country (see Plate 6).

136 The mammals of central British Columbia, although comparatively common, have never been of primary importance.
[291] The marten, the wolverine, the lynx, and bears, both black and grizzly, were formerly hunted for their skins to serve as [262] cloaks. Deer were killed whenever possible, but formed a negligible item of diet. The beaver also was prized for its [439] flesh. The skins of moose and caribou were traded from the Carrier Indians, but neither of these animals was found in the [286] Bella Coola area. The mammal of greatest economic importance was the mountain goat, the wool of which was woven into [237] blankets. Smoked goat meat was formerly found in every [251] house and was almost the only flesh available during the winter. Small game was abundant, but seals were a luxury.
[262] Neither were birds of great importance to the Bella Coola.
[223] Members of the tribe resident near the sea-coast used to kill

quantities of ducks and geese, and the inhabitants of the inland villages sometimes made hunting expeditions to the nesting places of wild-fowl in the lakes of the interior uplands. Although numbers of birds were sometimes killed in this way, they were never a steady article of diet. The same is true of grouse. Always plentiful, these birds were commonly killed, but never in large numbers. 223 [136] [262]

The basis of the food supply was fish. The river teemed with salmon, which enabled the country to support its relatively large population. Spring, sockeye, hump-back, dog, and coho salmon, all entered the river in thousands during the spring and summer, while the steel-head could be caught throughout the year. They were taken in weirs and their flesh smoked for winter use. Throughout the year, salmon was the principal article of diet. Second in importance was the oolachen, a fish somewhat resembling a herring, which entered the river in great numbers during April or May. They were taken in purse-like nets,[1] allowed to rot for ten days or two weeks, and then boiled. The grease was skimmed off and kept indefinitely to be used as a relish for other foods. It was always a sign of poverty if a person were obliged to eat herring without oolachen grease. Trout and bull-heads were found in the river, but were not sufficiently plentiful to be of importance. 226 262 [251] [252] [263] [237] [735] [556]

Although no form of agriculture was practised, the Bella Coola used vegetable food to a considerable extent. Berries were abundant; some were eaten raw, but many more were pounded into a pulpy mass and dried in the sun. Cakes prepared in this way kept indefinitely and formed one of the regular winter foods. The bark of the hemlock and cottonwood was eaten, as well as the roots of many plants. In recent years many of these have not been used, so that an investigator is apt to overlook their great importance in early times. Although useless for food, the cedar was the corner-stone of Bella Coola material culture. From its trunk were split out, with wedges, the wide planks which formed 262 [241] [251] [178] 824 322

524 their houses. Dishes, benches, cooking-boxes, cradles, totem-[322] poles, canoes, all were carved from this wood. The bark was 285 woven into baskets, and when dyed formed the most common [53] ceremonial decoration.

Even within the forty miles of the river valley formerly occupied by the Bella Coola there are considerable variations in climate. At the mouth of the river the typical Pacific coast type is found, without great extremes of temperature and with much rain, especially in winter time. During winter, the moisture is precipitated as snow a few hundred feet above the valley, and the limit of the snow can be watched on the mountain slopes, rising or falling a few feet from day to day. Farther up the valley, the winters are colder and in many cases snow lies for weeks on the ground, and in the upper part of the Bella Coola area the winters are severe, although much more moderate than on the upper regions immediately to the east.

173 What has been the history of the inhabitants of this land?
[176] They believe that long, long ago, Alquntám, the supreme god, caused their first ancestors to be created in his house, Nacwátʼa, in the land above, and sent them down to populate the Bella Coola valley. These first people came in groups of two or three, brothers and sisters, or occasionally man and wife, each group descending, in many cases in animal form, to a certain mountain and then making their home at its foot. They brought with them animals and fish, tools and houses, also the knowledge of ceremonial dances. In fact, they differed from the Bella Coola of the recent past only in having greater supernatural power. These first people increased with extraordinary rapidity, until each group grew into a village, bound together by a knowledge of their first ancestor. In 173 course of time the occupants of certain villages combined, as 361 some increased more rapidly than others, but on the whole each settlement maintained its character of being the descendants of one group of the first settlers of this world.

[175] This mythological belief is a fair picture of Bella Coola life as it was when the first white man visited the valley. Mar-

173 kenzie, making his memorable overland trip to the Pacific, 361 records coming upon Indian villages at every few miles of his 175 course. Boas describes the way in which the inhabitants of each of these claim to be descended from one group of ancestors.

161 Though it is impossible to estimate the former population of the Bella Coola valley with any degree of accuracy, it must have been in the thousands. In 1922 there were surviving rather more than three hundred individuals, who live in one village on an Indian reserve near the north bank of the Bella Coola River, about a quarter of a mile from the sea. In the last century the [164] tribe was stricken with smallpox, and since then consumption, [177] venereal disease, measles, and other diseases of the white man [182] have taken their deadly toll. Changed conditions of life and decay of the rich ceremonial around which centred their interests in the old days are also contributory factors in their decline. Within the last few years, however, the population has begun to increase.

Bella Coola Villages

361 The following list of Bella Coola villages was obtained. In an effort to learn which had been deserted in recent years, [24] the writer always asked whether or not a town was occupied [175] at the time of Mackenzie's visit, an event of such great interest to the grandparents of the older people that the memory of it is still preserved. Villages said to have been occupied at that time are marked with an asterisk.

133 Three rivers empty into the head of South Bentinck Arm, which is about one mile in width (see Plate 7). The Bella Coola, flowing from the east, enters at the southern edge, and the Nulqutéuqu-e winds in from the north to the opposite angle of the head of the fiord. This stream, "The Nearest [103] River" of the Bella Coola, so-called because of its proximity to the sea, is shown on maps as the Nechestaunnay. Between the mouths of these two is the Ts-eub, a small stream rising

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

133 on the northern side of the Bella Coola valley, east of the Necleetsconnay. Before merging their waters with North Bentinck Arm the three flow more slowly and there are extensive tide-flats (see Plate 8). Several villages formerly clustered around their mouths.

561 (1) Ẑémux: on the west bank of the Necleetsconnay about three-quarters of a mile from the sea. Nothing is known of this long-abandoned village of which even the name is uncertain. The mountain that rises behind its site is called Ẑémux, and it is supposed that the village had the same designation. Some of the older people state that there was no town, only a temporary hunting station, at this spot.

(2) Tsiálkmq, "Short Feet": on the very shore of North Bentinck Arm, west and north of the mouth of the Necleetsconnay. The fiord terminates in a tolerably square end, running north and south, and this town was at the northern edge. It was built on piles and the inhabitants could step to the ground only at low tide. This is the explanation given of the peculiar name, a reference to the curtailed walking space. Long ago it was a large town, but was probably occupied only during the winter. In summer the people are believed to have [166] moved to Nemdm-u, "The Place of Flies," on the north side of North Bentinck Arm, about one mile from its head.

[712] *(3) Ałpálxel, "The Fenced Town," so called because it was stockaded: near the south bank of the Pe-xub, about a quarter of a mile from the sea, near the site of the present mission church. It was inhabited until about 1870. According to one informant this village was founded by a certain Tálxwam, a descendant of Tsiatmals, who decided to move close to the river.

(4) Tlełp-el, "Small Mound," so called from the knoll on which it was situated: above Ałpálxel, and about one-half mile to the north of the present Bella Coola River. Its site is crossed by the road connecting the Indian village of Bella Coola with the white settlement of the same name.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

(5) Ánutsqwa·xstl, "Labretted": the eastern continuation of the last mentioned.[1] The name is explained as follows: 361

One of the people who came to the earth in the beginning of time, Ťaiakwala by name, travelled to the Skeena River, and there saw women wearing labrets. On his return to Bella Coola he settled at Ánutsqwa·xstl and carved on his totem-pole[2] the figure of a woman with an abalone-shell labret as a memorial of his voyage. Visitors coming to his potlatches named the town from this figure. [173]

This was one of the largest towns in the valley.

?*(6) Aimä·ts: a small town to the north of the last, not far from the Pe·ɜlɔ. It is assumed that it was founded by a descendant of Ťaiakwala named Aimä·ts. The consensus of opinion is that it has not been occupied for many years, but one informant recently dug up a clay pipe on the alleged site. 172

*(7) Slskistl, "What Has Been Divided": on the south shore of the Bella Coola River about a quarter of a mile from the sea. This village was founded by a certain Q̓eil.

*(8) Qomqo·ts, meaning doubtful, perhaps "Salty": this, the most populous village of the valley in the recent past, is still inhabited by one or two families. The inhabitants of other towns explain its large population by marriages with slaves. This is the upper, or eastern, continuation of the preceding, and the two in combination formed a row of houses stretching for three-quarters of a mile (see Plate 9). 162 582 567

(9) Oosskpamx, "The Treeless Place": on the north side of the Bella Coola, supposedly about half a mile above Aimä·ts. This village was long ago deserted.

(10) Ťcuxlcuwtelpa·ts, "Where There Is Much lcuxlcuwtelp," a kind of hollow-stemmed plant: some distance from

[1] Several towns, each consisting of a single row of houses, are regarded as forming two villages. In such cases there is no visible boundary mark.

[2] The Bella Coola believe that their early ancestors used totem-poles; repeated reference to them will be made, even though the work of Barbeau and others on the recent origin of totem-poles on the North-West Coast indicates that the Bella Coola concepts are not historically accurate. [778]

361 the north bank of the Bella Coola,* near the lower slope of the mountain, and about three miles from the sea. It is probable that there was a town at this spot very long ago, according to the statement of one old man, and the numerous repositories (II, p.8) in the vicinity support this view.

*(11) Sınxl, "Sunny," or "Fallen Sun": on the south side of the Bella Coola opposite the preceding. It was deserted about 1907. This was a fairly large town, though never as big as Q̣omqo·ts. The name is derived from Sun, sınx, and there [173] are two explanations given for it. One informant states that [178] the name came from the many revelations of the Sun to the first people there; another that the first chief, said to have been named Stälıımx, erected a large totem-pole, decorated with the figure of a sun. This blew down, in consequence of which the people called their town Sınxl, "Fallen Sun."

*(12) Sq̣omell: on the south side of the Bella Coola about three miles from the sea, and a short distance below the end of the present bridge. The meaning of the name is unknown.

*(13) Tcımotl, "Where the River Is Sufficiently Deep to Cover the Stones, but Shallow Enough for Rapids": the upper continuation of the last-named. It was deserted during the [164] smallpox epidemic. The name of the chief who came there [173] at the beginning of time was given as Tswakilak.

(14) Sno'oniqwlx, "On the Point": on a curving promontory on the south bank of the river about four miles from the sea. It was long ago swept away when the river changed its course.

(15) Nu'exmäq, "The Place of Foul Water": on the north [133] bank of the Bella Coola a little above the preceding, at a place where there were a number of stagnant pools between the river and the mountains. No one knows how long ago this town was abandoned; but as the names of people living there figure in stories which are said to be of no great antiquity, it was probably deserted not many years ago. Probably a large town since it was a good fishing place. 361

[133] *The river frequently changes its course, so that village sites now at a considerable distance from it may once have been on its banks.

(16) Ṫsılkt, "Bald Eagle": also on the north shore of the river, a little above the last-named. Probably washed away by a flood long ago, although traces of the salmon-weir were still visible recently. [226]

(17) Nuqäxmäts, "The Place of Much qäxmäts" (the fern Asplenium cyclosorum): on the north side of the river about one mile above the preceding. This large town is believed to have been deserted long ago, though, in apparent contradiction, traces of it are said to be still visible. [137]

*(18) Snulɜli, "The Place of Dog Salmon": on the south bank, above the last-named, at a place where a small stream enters the Bella Coola River; this divided the town into two sections. It was long deserted and the river has carried away that part of the village below the creek. The name is derived from an enormous dog salmon which is believed to have been seen at long intervals in a waterfall near this spot, always with a water ouzel perched on its back. [825]

(19) Oq̣mikımx: on the lower end of the island near Hagenburg post office, eleven miles from the ocean. Although long deserted, traces of this village can still be seen. The meaning of the name is unknown.

*(20) Nukils, "The Place of the Whirlpool": on the south side of the river, eleven and a quarter miles from the sea. It was a village of moderate size, recently abandoned. The first occupant was said to have been Łkamkila, which means, "The First of All." [173]

*(21) Äsän-än-i, "The Concave Town," so called because it spread around the shore of a bay scooped out by the Bella Coola: south side, slightly above the influx of the Nusälsım River, thirteen and a quarter miles from the sea. It was deserted about 1880.

*(22) Nusq̣alst, "The Place of Sq̣alstutl": on the north side of the river, opposite the mountain of the same name. It also was deserted about 1880. Sq̣alstutl is a kind of stone suit- [316]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

361 able for axes, which occurs in the valley of a small stream on [316] the slope of the mountain.

*(23) Nulleax, "The Place Where There Are No Falls": an affluent from the north enters the main Bella Coola about thirty-one miles from the sea and the town was located on this creek about two hundred yards above its junction with the Bella Coola. The ruins of this moderately large town were still [175] standing about 1870. Mackenzie reached the Bella Coola River at this place. At the time of his arrival the population was [166] larger than usual, because the salmon-weir had withstood
[226] some heavy freshets which had destroyed several weirs on the Bella Coola, and driven the inhabitants of other villages to Nulleax.

[133] It is said that the affluent at Nulleax, the stream Xaiqts, is the only one in the whole Bella Coola valley that does not drop precipitously into a ravine leading to the main river. Its source is a spring at the end of a pocket-like valley, at the base of steep cliffs, but it does not fall down these. The town is named from this circumstance. The area around the spring is called Nusnāxunxkt, and it is said that some families living on the Skeena sing of it as the spot where their first ancestors came to earth, although their descendants do not know where it is located.

*(24) Stuux: on the point between the La'xulx (Atnarko) and Sla·kl (Whitewater) rivers which join to form the Bella Coola. This, the most populous of the upper river towns, was deserted not long ago. The meaning of the name is unknown.

(25) Qwlisstl, "The Place of Herbage": on the north side of the Atnarko River, a few hundred yards above the forks. This small town was deserted many years ago. The name was [137] given on account of the hill behind the village being covered with a rank growth of plants and small bushes, but no trees.

(26) Snuhlstl, "The Place of Falls," so called from the [133] strong rapids of the Atnarko at this point: on the north side of the river about ten miles from the forks. This large town [173] was long ago deserted when a large rock in the midst of the

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

stream, on which the salmon-weir rested, was carried away.[10] 361

The following village may be included with the above: [173]

(27) Nusxeq: on the shore of North Bentinck Arm, to the east of the creek that flows into it at Green Bay. This long-deserted village was built so close to the ocean that high tides reached almost to the houses. According to one informant, the name was derived from that of the first chief sent down from above to that spot; while another connected it, etymologically, with Nusx, the name of the barren district some four and a half miles up the valley of the creek. In recent years this village site has been used only as a summer camp. [173]

The name given to the Bella Coola valley is Nuxälk; that given to the inhabitants of the valley, excluding those of village no. 27, is Nuxälkmx.[11] 101 103

Two points must be considered with regard to the above list of towns: In the first place, can it be regarded as an accurate list, or do the towns belong to the realm of mythology? In the second place, are the customs and beliefs of the inhabitants of the different towns sufficiently similar to be described without reference to local differences? 128 173 361

The first question is difficult to answer. The Bella Coola undoubtedly consider the existence of these towns to be an historical fact, but so do they regard the peopling of the earth by men created in the land above. Nevertheless, the above list appears to be substantially correct. The Bella Coola, although now collected into a single village, still remember their ancient homes. One man, for example, stated as a matter of course that he was a man of Snubli. Further inquiry elicited the information that he had been born at Sinxl, where his father had moved at the time of the smallpox epidemic. It later appeared that my informant's father was born at Tsmoil, had married there, and that it was his father who had moved [164] [166]

[11] Boas, p. 69, states that Nuxälk is only applied to the lower villages of the valley. All the writer's information was contrary to this view. [114]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

128 from Snuhli. My informant's grandchildren regard them-173 selves as Snuhli boys, and their names are embodied in myths
361 of that village, although their forbears have not lived there
166 for five generations. There is no reason to suppose this case exceptional. Other instances were obtained of movements of people from one village to another at earlier times, and there seems no cause to doubt the general accuracy of these. Names
[554] embodied in the origin myths of different towns are used as prerogatives and have been potent factors in keeping their memory alive. Uncertainties and inaccuracies there must be in the foregoing list, but on the whole it appears to be fairly reliable, since few contradictions were received from different informants.

128 Accounts obtained of the same ceremonies from the descen-
184 dants of people of different villages were found in most cases to be identical. There were a few differences in custom between [796] the people of Stuix and those of the other upper valley towns on the one hand, and the inhabitants of the lower valley on

114 Boas (p. 48) gives a list of Bella Coola towns which agrees 361 fairly well with the above. Among his villages are included Peɔsb (no. 4), Nulqustkwan-e (no. 7), and Nusälsum (no. 16).[11] All the older people agreed that these are the names of streams, though settlements located on them may have been known by the same designations. Names of the five villages recorded by Boas, nos. 6, 8, 9, 19, and 24, were not known by several old men questioned on the subject.

101 The villages of the Bella Coola valley did not form a political 619 unit; each was independent. A common language was spoken throughout and the inhabitants of the different towns recog-
[631] nized that their origins and customs were similar. This was [197] also recognized to be the case with regard to the people living on South Bentinck Arm, and at the head of Dean Channel.

[11] Using in each case the spelling of this monograph.

Indians from both of these areas were interviewed and it was found that, except for minor details in certain beliefs, their customs were identical with those of the Bella Coola proper. Accordingly, in this monograph, the term "Bella Coola" will be taken to include the inhabitants, not only of that valley, but of South Bentinck Arm and the head of Dean Channel. Those living on South Bentinck Arm will be referred to as Täl·io people, the Bella Coola term for them; those of Dean Channel as Kimsquit, the name by which they are generally known. It is an anglicized form of the word Kimgkwut, meaning "Canyon," by which the Bella Bella designate the people of Dean River. 101 619

(28) Sätlia: on the east side of South Bentinck Arm, about a quarter of a mile from the point that marks its junction with North Bentinck Arm. Food was obtained from an ocean fish-trap.[11] Long deserted except as a summer camp. 361 [226]

(29) Qankilst, "Island": east side of South Bentinck Arm, slightly north of the island opposite the Hot Springs on the west side of the fiord. The town took its name from this island. In summer the numerous inhabitants lived immediately opposite it, at a place where they had an ocean salmon-trap; in winter they moved to a fortified spot at the base of a mountain slightly farther to the north. This village was blotted out by a landslide one spring long ago, and the few survivors were unable to re-establish it. [133] [226] [221] [731]

*(30)[12] Tsaoltmem: on the east side of the fiord about four miles above the last-named. A small town, whose inhabitants lived on the catch from their ocean fish-trap; it was recently deserted. [226]

[11]Ocean fish-traps work as follows:—A pen is made by a series of stakes, into which the salmon enter at high tide. It is then closed and, as the falling tide lays bare the mud, the imprisoned fish can be scooped out by hand or in hand-nets.

[12]Mackenzie did not visit either South Bentinck Arm, or Kimsquit, but it will be convenient to continue the use of asterisks to mark those towns which are said to have been inhabited at that time. [175]

361 (31) Ḳxdis, "Ocean Fish-Trap": on the east side of South Bentinck Arm, about a quarter of a mile from the Nuk" River. [226] It is doubtful whether this was a town, or merely a camping place of the people of Nuk" when using their salmon-trap.

*(32) Nuk": on a raised mound at the south side of the mouth of the Nuk" River, which enters the head of South [731] Bentinck Arm from the east. The meaning is unknown. This [164] was a populous town until the inhabitants were decimated by an epidemic of smallpox.

*(33) Täl·io: on the west side of the mouth of the river of the same name which flows into South Bentinck Arm from the south. The location of this village was constantly changed, [133] owing to destructive variations in the course of the river. It was formerly a large town, and has been deserted only since 1900. This village had another name, Ṭqwantlos, "Facing," so called because its houses faced those of the town of Nuk".

*(34) Ȧs·ux", "At the Head": at the head of South Bentinck Arm there is a bay running south-west, into the upper end of which a small stream empties. The trail leading to the [487] lake at the head of Rivers Inlet follows this valley. Ȧs·ux" was located on this creek, at some little distance from the ocean; the name was derived from the geographical location of the town. It has not long been deserted and must have been a populous place to judge from the numerous repositories (II, p. 8).

(35) Ḳwapx: on the east side of the mouth of a creek flowing into the bay at the head of South Bentinck Arm, from the south. This town was of moderate size. The meaning of the name is unknown. It is thought to be in the Rivers Inlet language.

VILLAGES AT KIMSQUIT

[133] Two rivers, the Dean from the east, and the Kimsquit from the north, flow into the head of Dean Channel, and the villages of this area can be grouped according to the two rivers.

Villages near the Dean River 361

*(36) Anuthlx: the present site of the Kimsquit Indian village near the mouth of Dean River. The meaning of the name could not be learnt.

*(37) Nulal, "Canyon": on the shore of Dean River at the bottom of the canyon. This large town was only recently deserted.

(38) Ăqet·i, "Occupied Mound": on the south side of Dean River about one mile from the sea. This small town was deserted many years ago. The name is derived from the small mound on which it was built.

*(39) Nutsqwalt, "Many Spawning Sockeye Salmon": on south side of Dean River, about one and a quarter miles from the sea. A large town recently deserted.

*(40) Nusqāpts, "Place of Many Spring Salmon": on south bank about twenty-five miles from the sea. This spot was not settled when people first occupied this world, but later Ăkqun-tăm (I, p. 330) took possession of it. [173]

(41) Ixwink: east side of river twenty-eight miles from the sea. There is doubt about this town. It is said to have been a colony of the Kimsquit River settlement, a statement difficult to understand.

(42) Siwal·ot, "Where Canoes Are Left": on the north side of the river about thirty-five miles from the sea. Immediately opposite was Sulkelta, "Winter Trail." These two are considered as forming one town, but were probably never more than camping grounds at the spot where the winter trail to the interior left the river. It is possible, however, that they formed a town, since the names of the alleged first settlers in the beginning of time are preserved. [487] [173]

*(43) Ăskha: at Salmon House on the upper Dean River.

The history of the villages on the upper Dean is puzzling. Mythological accounts of their founding were obtained, and some of the older people stated that they had been occupied until recent years. On the other hand, there are apparently 174

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

175 The Dean River is called Nalsl, and the generic name for the people of the Dean valley is Satslmq. About eighty years [101] ago a smallpox epidemic so reduced the villages on the Kima- [164] quit that the survivors abandoned them and moved to the [731] Dean. At that time a certain Kimsquit man is believed to have said: "We will take their places and kill even their dogs."

Since that time, the joint settlement has suffered one [164] epidemic after another, until a mere handful of the people [731] survive, and they are almost entirely descended from the Kimsquit River immigrants. Within the last few years, these have requested permission from the Bella Coola to abandon Kimsquit entirely and live among them. The two groups have [628] always been on the best of terms, but the Bella Coola have not forgotten the fate of the Dean River people and have been unwilling to admit the Kimsquit survivors.

361 *(44) Sä-tsk': this large and important town, at the mouth of the river, was deserted at the time of the smallpox epidemic.

*(45) Nurwlst: this settlement can be grouped with the last-mentioned, although situated on the shore of Dean Channel, at the site of the present Manitou Cannery, six miles away. No meaning of the name is known.

Tribal Organization

619 The subject of this monograph is the people of the above forty-five villages. They will be referred to as a tribe, and as this term is customarily limited to a political unit, a brief justification for its use is necessary.

342 Each Bella Coola village consisted of a single row of houses, 361 built along the shore of a river or the ocean. The front doors

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

opened out on to a wooden platform, which served as sidewalk 342 and extended from one end of the settlement to the other. 361
The outer side of this structure was always supported on piles; in fact, in many cases, the houses as well as the whole sidewalk were thus raised from the ground. This type of construction was necessitated by the sloping sites of the villages, but had the added advantage of being a protection against attack. The villages differed in size from insignificant settlements of three to four houses, to ones with twenty or thirty, each containing several families. The ease with which the red cedar could be split and worked into large planks made possible the construction of these large, rectangular houses which, with their horizontally laid walls and sloping roofs, presented a picture of stability and relative comfort superior to that of most Indian habitations.

Each village was practically an independent political unit. 631
Neighbouring settlements had many common interests which 628 threw them into contact with one another, but there was no organized cohesion between the towns of the Bella Coola valley, or between those of Tăl-ĕo and Kimsquit. There was still less to draw these three groups together. There was no supreme chief and no governmental meeting of the tribe as a whole. Not only were the three divisions not bound to support one another in war, they were often at loggerheads among themselves. Indeed, bloodshed between towns of the Bella Coola valley itself was not uncommon. Moreover, each group tended to merge with its neighbours. The Tăl-ĕo people frequently married with the Rivers Inlet and the Bella Bella; 563 the Kimsquit with the *xŭdzep of Dean Channel and the Kitlope 648 of Gardner Canal; and the Bella Coola of the upper valley with the Carriers.

In spite of these inconsistencies, the application of the word 619 tribe is justifiable for the following reasons:

A. Language. All spoke the same language. There were dialectical differences among the people of Bella Coola, [197]
Tăl-ĕo, and Kimsquit, but each group could understand the 619 others. This differentiated them clearly from all neighbouring [197] tribes.

B. Ceremonial. A member of a secret society in any of [575] the above towns was accepted as a member in any other one.
[609] A person of another tribe, even if known to belong to a comparable society, was treated as an uninitiated person.

C. Origin and Religion. The people of Bella Coola, Tal-io, and Kimsquit felt themselves to be akin through acceptance of the fact that their ancestors had been created together in the beginning of time. This marked them off with [771] great clearness from all other tribes, especially from the Carriers of the interior. This belief formed a sentimental and religious bond of great strength.

Neighbouring Tribes

648 It is desirable to describe, briefly, the tribes with which the Bella Coola came in contact.

The Carriers

East of Bella Coola, amid the mountains of the interior, roved the Carriers. In summer they often came down to the river valley to fish or trade for salmon, and in winter they were sometimes forced by cold and starvation again to visit the Bella Coola, Bella Bella, or Rivers Inlet people. There was a [563] good deal of intermarriage between them and the inhabitants of the upper valley, so that the wanderers were able to spend the cold months with relatives. None the less, the Bella Coola
[180] considered these people utterly foreign in habits and beliefs,
[578] and to call a man a "Carrier" was, and still is, a deadly insult. The Carriers lacked the rich ceremonial life of the coastal peoples who, therefore, regarded them with scorn and con-[796] tempt. The presence of a few of the much-despised Carriers was, however, almost necessary to the correct performance of the winter dances since they were uninitiated spectators whom it was necessary to impress and delude.

THE BELLA BELLA

West of Bella Coola lived the Bella Bella, known as ápulázmq. Although linguistic differences prevented free exchange of ideas, and active hostility was not unknown, there was considerable intermarriage between the two tribes. The Bella Coola recognized the similarity of culture between them; in fact, whereas a Carrier was despised for lack of knowledge of ceremonial and dramatic matters, a Bella Bella was respected for his superior lore in that respect. The Bella Coola believe that many of their rites have been obtained from them.

The chief Bella Bella villages are said to have been: Ṡpuéna, on "Kwatna" Bay; Nź'ma, at "Nama"; Ṡpeiyai, four miles from the last-mentioned; Nalum.

At Ṡpuéna, the nearest settlement, so many of the people spoke Bella Coola that it was practically bilingual. There had been so many intermarriages for generations that the people were not considered foreigners; in fact, Boas includes it among Bella Coola villages (p. 48). There were seven villages on Kwatna Inlet and the Kwatna River which flows in from the south-east.

(1) Ṡiwalkamitl, "Where It Spoke": a small outpost on the eastern shore of Kwatna Inlet near the entrance. There may once have been a permanent settlement at the site, but for many years it was used only as a look-out station when raiders were expected.

It is said that on one occasion, long, long ago, a party of Kwatna people was encamped at this spot, waiting for enemy raiders whose approach had been reported. They did not appear when expected and one of the watchers, wearied by the long wait, said to the genital organs of one of his female companions who had annoyed him:

"Tell us what is going to happen."

"You will all be killed to-morrow," answered a rumbling voice from the organs, to the great amusement of everybody.

So it transpired. The hostile raiders surprised the watchers the next day and only one escaped to tell the tale.

The place has since been known as, "Where It Spoke." It was long ago deserted.

[96] [173] Another version of the same incident relates that a voice came from a woman's arm to warn the party of their approaching doom, without a question having been addressed to it. The settlement was abandoned in consequence.

*(c) Ape i, "Occupied Mound": on an island in Kwatna Inlet. One elderly man stated that the ruins were still standing within his father's life-time. This village was peculiar in [74] having separate burial-grounds for chiefs and commoners.

(d) Nuklipulind, "Place of Many Boulders": a large pile-built village on the shore of Kwatna Inlet, north and east of the mouth of the river. At high tide the ocean penetrated under the stagings and swirled among the many boulders there from which the town was named. It is said that there was some friction between the people living at either end of the village, and that a ditch was dug to separate the hostile sections. The place was long ago deserted.

(e) Awatos, "House of Tiers": on the east and north side of the Kwatna River about half a mile from its mouth. A [142] large, semi-subterranean house with many platforms stood in the centre of the village, from which its name was derived. The place was long ago deserted.

(f) Awakw-lit, "The Place of Big Stones in the River": on the same side of the river, about three miles above the last-named. It was a large town in the distant past. The situation was at a place where the river was very dangerous, with large boulders projecting above the surface of the water.

*(g) Wakwas: about a mile above the preceding, on the same side of the river, immediately above a small creek. This [164] town was deserted at the time of the smallpox epidemic. The meaning is unknown, and it is thought the name, Wakwas, is in the Bella Bella language.

*(h) Name unknown. The largest town at Snaiss was about one-half mile above the preceding, where the river forks. It was practically wiped out at the time of the smallpox epidemic.

[164] [173] [22] [142] At each of these river villages was a salmon-weir which furnished the chief article of diet.

THE ustaw.[1]

Before the smallpox epidemic, about 1862, there were towns on the fords and villages of Dean Channel between Kimsquit and Bella Bella. The inhabitants were called ustaw by the Bella Coola, and ustaiy by the Bella Bella. Their settlements were at Elcho Harbour, Green River, Cascade Inlet, and at several unidentified places. Their language is said to have differed slightly from that of the Bella Bella, but the people themselves married freely with both Kimsquit and Bella Bella, thus forming a connecting link between these tribes.

A list of ustaw towns was obtained from one old man, who claimed to be a descendant of the people. It was impossible to verify this information, and since he himself was not an ideal informant, the following can be regarded only as approximately correct.

(1) Ilkw: at Elcho Harbour.

(2) Kilo'o: on a ford one mile above the last-named.

(3) Ilkk or Yuqwa: on a river three miles above the preceding.

(4) Nawaid'a: on a river two miles above the preceding.

(5) Nuqual: on a ford three miles above the preceding.

(6) 'Ouilow: on a ford three miles above the preceding.

(7) Iarwalk: on a river two miles above the last-named and thirty miles below Kimsquit.

According to the old man from whom the above list was obtained, Nawalc, at Kimsquit, recorded earlier as village no. 45, was also populated by ustaw people. There was so much intermarriage between the two groups that it is now impossible to ascertain whether the inhabitants not only of Nawalc, but of Iarwalk as well, were predominantly Kimsquit or ustaw.

The open plateau in which the Bella Coola River rises has always made travel possible for long distances, so that not only the neighbouring Carriers, but Chilkotin as well sometimes descended to the valley. On the coast, though the dense underbrush prevented travel along the shore, the long fiords, sheltered from the open Pacific, were ideal for the use of canoes.[16] Comparatively lengthy journeys were neither difficult nor uncommon. The Tsi'is people were usually on amicable terms with the inhabitants of Rivers Inlet, and the Kimsquit with the Kitlope. The Bella Coola were accustomed to attend potlatches at Alert Bay and Fort Rupert,[17] Knight's Inlet, and Bute Inlet, receiving their hosts, in turn, at Bella Coola. On the other hand, there was little friendly intercourse with the northern tribes, of which the Kitkatla especially were dreaded by the residents of the central coast. Until recent years the Bella Coola had no direct knowledge of other Salish-speaking peoples, although some of the Chilkotin told them of a tribe living far to the south, in the interior, whom they encountered in some of their wanderings and used to term Nuxálkmy, recognizing the similarity between their language and that of the Bella Coola. A few years ago several Bella Coola attended a boarding-school and were amazed to find that many of their words were understood by fellow-students from Chilliwack.

To sum up: The Bella Coola were in close contact with the neighbouring coastal tribes, with the members of which they felt themselves to have cultural affinities. They recognize that they have received many ceremonial rites from their neighbours, and must have adopted other elements of culture which they now consider indigenous. It is probable that certain Bella Coola customs must likewise have been transmitted to other tribes, but such lie without the scope of this monograph. The outlying villages were in close contact with foreign neighbours, and tended to assimilate elements of their culture, but, on the whole, the Bella Coola present a tribal unity with distinctive local customs, falling within the general pattern of coastal culture.

RELIGION

The Universe—Supernatural Beings—Supernatural Elements in Human Beings—Means of Propitiation

The Universe

ONE of the subjects about which Bella Coola philosophers pondered in former times, and about which definite information has come down to the present generation, is the universe. The young people, who have absorbed a certain amount of education from the white man, are scornful of the beliefs of their fathers, but it was possible to obtain the following information from a few of the older men and women. 772 [177]

They say that the earth is circular and flat, like an island. What it rests upon is problematical, though the assumption is that it is water. The world is kept from capsizing by the supernatural being, Sninia, who lives amid the ice in the far north; he grasps a rope to which the earth is fastened, and he keeps it steady by maintaining a tension on the rope to hold the world against his feet. Long, long ago Sninia was seen by human beings, but in later years no one has penetrated to his distant home and the Bella Coola have little regard for him. It was in the distant past, also, that human beings discovered the earth to be round, after certain semi-supernatural men had made a circuit of it. The four corners of space have not the same importance to the Bella Coola as they have, for example, to the Indians of the Plains. It is only through questioning that the investigator learns that the East is regarded as the top of the world, the South is the sun at its zenith, the West is the bottom, and the North is nothing, merely the opposite to the south. These beliefs play little part in the lives of the people. [796] [823]

Above our earth stretches an inverted dome, its edges resting on those of the world. This dome, the sky, is called

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEB Bella Coola Nuh

772 cosq'. If the Bella Coola were strictly logical, one should expect them to conceive the upper surface of cosq' as being convex. Instead, it is considered a flat surface, very similar to the earth, and no explanation is given of what fills in the space between the dome, concave as viewed from this world, and the upper plane which could rest only on the peak of the dome. But logical accuracy is not a Bella Coola characteristic. This flat land is called skiwa'ši or nacosq' nemalhqmil. It is illuminated by a second sun, shining on it as the sun does on the earth. Far in the east of this upper region are extensive tide-flats. This land above is the home of many supernatural beings, who will be described in due course. The relative position of the sun to this upper world is ill-defined. According to some accounts, it travels by clearly marked trails on the surface, and a transparent dome is postulated to explain how its light reaches this earth. Others state that it moves like a bird or flying canoe through the space between the world and the dome-sky above. On many of these points there is a striking difference of opinion, which the Bella Coola explain by saying that their information is derived from ancient stories, which are personal possessions, and that no one knows the beliefs of his fellows. A co-ordinated theology, as Boas points out, has not evolved among the Bella Coola.

772 773 [776] The sky, as it may be called if the reader will bear in mind that it is the underside of a flat land, was not always in its present condition. The Bella Coola say that long ago the supreme god instructed his Carpenters (I, p. 31) to make a sky. They started from the eastern extremity of the earth, but after a considerable part of the dome had been erected, it fell with a thunderous crash, because no supporting posts had been set up. The part that escaped this calamity is called Sałwalkwas. Undiscouraged, the Carpenters continued their work with the assistance of posts and so built the sky as it is seen today. Then the supports were taken away.

772 [921] As already stated, a sun shines on the land above. As that sun by morals is attached to the land above, so is this upper one reached to another land above the one of which our sky is the underside. Boas (p. 41) has described this upper land in some detail. A number of Bella Coola were questioned on this subject, but for some time no one could be found with knowledge of its existence. At length one of the older people remembered that a man who had died some thirty years ago had a personal story connected with it, and later a Kimsquit man was able to furnish definite information. He explained that in his family there was a myth dealing with this matter; others might have heard this myth, but since it was not their property, of course they would not be able to impart the facts contained in it, nor would they necessarily believe in. Consequently, an upper land, superimposed above that which is immediately over the earth, cannot be described as a Bella Coola belief; it is shared, so far as could be ascertained, by only two families.

1:66:Dwelth E-5 (922-924)948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

The chief feature of this uppermost world is its distance and unapproachableness. To the supernatural beings living in the intermediate land it is a far-off place; in fact, their attitude towards it corresponds to that with which mortals regard the land above their own. The supernatural ones can, when they wish, visit this upper world, which is called Nagwalcili. A sun shines there, but it is a different kind of sun from that known to mortals. On the whole it appears that this upper sky-land does not differ materially from either the earth or the land immediately above. No human being has ever reached this distant land, so what little is known about it was brought down in the beginning of time by the first people.

In addition to these two upper worlds, the Bella Coola know of one, or perhaps two, below. One of these is inhabited by ghosts.[1] It somewhat resembles the earth, but is unsubstantial and ethereal. It is considered to be immediately

[1] On the present view the Bella Coola are in a state of transition between the old beliefs and the new. This concept is held only by the older people, so it might be more accurate to describe it as one which they, the older ones, used to have. It has been thought advisable to use the present tense throughout in recording customs and beliefs which are now rapidly passing away.

NEB Bellacoola NEA

beneath the Bella Coola valley, and the land of the living forms a dome over it corresponding to that of the sky over this world. But everything is reversed. A river flows in the land of ghosts, but it rises in the west instead of the east; when it is warm on this earth it is cold in the land below; when it is sunrise here, it is sunset there. Shamans are believed to have penetrated frequently to this land, and on information from them the Bella Coola base their beliefs.

There is another land beneath the ocean. In this live the fish and sea mammals in human form, as well as other beings to be described in the next section of this chapter. Like all other worlds it has a sun above it,[1] and conditions are said to be similar to those existing on this earth. The Bella Coola are uncertain whether this undersea world is at the same level as the land of ghosts, and whether or not it extends beneath the rivers.

Although Bella Coola concepts regarding the sun and other heavenly bodies will require further consideration, it will be convenient at this point to describe them in outline. The sun is regarded as a heat-radiating ball of such intensity that a human being cannot approach it. Its path, as it crosses the land above, varies from day to day until it reaches its limits at the solstices. As it travels, it is accompanied by the drowning of two Sisiúlas, supernatural feminine beings who remain continually, one in the east and one in the west. According to most informants, the ends of the sun's course, though fixed and invariable from year to year, are not marked by any visible means. Others state that at each limit there is the mouth of a cuang, a mythological animal of enormous size.

The moon is thought likewise to travel[2] each day but is said to be very cold. Few stories are current concerning it, although the Bella Coola say that long ago a man tried to reach it, only to be driven back by the intense cold. A shaman who died not many years ago claimed to have received power from the moon and stated that there were mountains and snow on it. It is commonly stated that the marks on the moon represent a man carrying a bucket.

[1] One informant stated that sun was served that purpose.
[2] The Sisiúlas drown as it travels, as they do for the sun.

The stars figure but slightly either in Bella Coola mythology or thought; it is not even known who made them. Two in the Great Bear constellation are called respectively Tpikoia and Xwpoma, "Little Girls." A lone star in the same part of the sky, named A'lse, is said to be following the girls to the forest for illicit intercourse.

Moon, stars, and above all the sun, were, and still are to a certain extent, used by the Bella Coola in computing the passage of time. There are no individuals with the definite prerogative of keeping count of time, but formerly wise old men used to do so.[9] Differences of opinion were the rule rather than the exception, a condition which often led to bitter disputes concerning the proper date for starting the winter ceremonials. Boas (p. 41) has recorded the Bella Coola calendar in greater detail than the present writer has been able to do. The making of calendrical observations is a lost art, and the following list of the months was all that could be learnt. It will be noted that these agree with Boas in regard to the months in the early part of the year, but not in those between the summer and winter solstices; no explanation is offered for this disparity.

First moon after the summer solstice: Sikâlamuk, which has the significance, "The Time for Sockeye Salmon to Ascend the River."

Second moon after the summer solstice: S'ûlulûl, "The Time for Eating Dog Salmon."

Third moon after the summer solstice: S'ûmai ûl, "The Time for Eating Coho Salmon."

Fourth moon after the summer solstice: Sipâlpam, "The Time for Gathering Fern Root," or Sûlulmai ûl Ewûlûmulûs,

9. Kimsquit informant stated that there were professional calendrical experts in his home when he was a young lad although members of the healer society (ch. chap. 4) sometimes attended to this matter.

"The Coming of Ewi'ilmulnain."[4]

Fifth moon after the summer solstice: ussiuil, "The Time for Easier Dances,"[5] or Sipalemain di Sisi, "The Gathering of the Supernatural Beings."

Sixth moon after the summer solstice: Sisnu, "Sits Down," that is, when the sun reaches the solstice.

First moon after the winter solstice: Sowulmgwum, "What Swings Away Food," or Sulili, "Angry Moon."

Second moon after the winter solstice: Mnsuidiwut, "Facing in Both Directions," that is, half the month belongs to winter and half to summer, or Lumulu di Nuuiddmg, "The Potlatch of the Nuuiddmg" (I, p. 184).

Third moon after the winter solstice: Sinjum, "When Herrings Spawn." These fish are said to have arrived on the same day of this moon as the winter solstice in the December sun.

Fourth moon after the winter solstice: Sipalp, "Time for Making Salmon Weirs."

Fifth moon after the winter solstice: Sinowud, "Time for Making Hand-Nets for Oolachan."

Sixth moon after the winter solstice: Sicdwl, "Time for Eating Spring Salmon." It is in this month that the summer solstice occurs.

The chief difficulty experienced by the Bella Coola in computing time rests on the fact that each month is judged by the moon, whereas the main periods of the year depend upon the solstices. One old man, from whom much of this information was obtained, stated that trouble always came at the winter solstice when the month was divided into two sections. The above list is obviously incomplete and inconsistent, but it was the best available.

Supernatural Beings

In any primitive community the social, religious, political, and economic aspects of life are so interwoven that they cannot be considered as distinct subjects; not only does this present difficulties to the investigator in the field, but it also makes it so easy task to describe the facts as obtained. With many tribes it is possible to deal first with the social life, and later with religion, shamanism, and other associated topics. Such a form of presentation has many advantages and would, if possible, have been followed. Unfortunately, the social organization and rank of the Bella Coola largely depend upon their religious beliefs as expressed in their mythology, and an understanding of at least the main features of these is essential. In this chapter a summary of these has been made, leaving for later description personal relations with the supernatural world and other points which do not profoundly influence the beliefs and practices of the whole community.

Like other peoples, the Bella Coola differ considerably in the fervour of their religious beliefs. But even allowing for individual variation, religious experiences and beliefs are matters of frequent occurrence and profound importance to the great majority of the tribe. The supernatural world is close around them; a sudden thought is caused by the intervention of a supernatural being; the peculiar action of an animal is an occurrence fraught with grave meaning; an unexplained sound always receives a supernatural explanation. The old beliefs survive even among members of the community who are nominal Christians, and those who hold to their ancient religion live in an atmosphere of the supernatural. The white man, whose scientific training and logic lead him to find a natural explanation for an incident, is puzzled and somewhat amused at what he often calls the childish beliefs of the Indian. The Bella Coola, on the other hand, seeing the hand of the supernatural in every untoward event, considers the attitude of the white man in seeking a natural explanation to be almost irreverent. The mental attitude of the Bella Coola to the supernatural does not differ vitally from that of the white man under like conditions; but whereas to white men religious experiences are most unusual, they are common occurrences to the Indian. A native convert, for example, finds no difficulty in understanding the Old Testament, for the frequent manifestations of the supernatural are like those to which he has been accustomed. One intelligent Indian went so far as to say that he was a better Christian than any white man because he believed every word in the Old Testament, while he had heard that white men doubted the historical accuracy of some of the stories there recorded.

The following incident illustrates rather clearly the attitude of the Bella Coola towards the supernatural. A few years ago a party, consisting of a number of Indians and one white man, was proceeding by canoe up Dean Channel. On the shore, some distance ahead of them, they saw what seemed to be a grizzly bear with its pelt showing the white sheen so much desired by hunters. Hoping for a shot at the animal, they paddled in behind a long point which offered a hidden means of approach. But as the canoe cautiously rounded the tip, within easy rifle range, all that could be seen was a white water-washed stump, somewhat resembling a bear in shape. To the white man it was obvious that they had all been deceived by this resemblance in the distance, but to the Bella Coola it was equally obvious that the bear had changed into a stump. A bear had been there, they had seen it, now there was a stump: "The bear must have changed itself," they said.

If the reader grasps the mental attitude which explains an optical illusion as a manifestation of the supernatural, he will be able to comprehend the important part played by supernatural beings in the lives of the Bella Coola. Creatures of this type, some anthropomorphic and others zoomorphic, range not only the mountains and forests of British Columbia, but also the waters beneath and the sky above. Their true home is on the flat country above the sky; most of them are merely visitors to this world. Supernatural beings of all kinds are termed sisi. The attitude of Indians towards them, and their concepts concerning them, can best be understood by the stories in vol. I, chap. x, and vol. II, chap. v. Bella Coola beliefs are not systematized; if a man is asked about the powers or functions of a certain supernatural being, he will usually answer by recounting a story in which that being appears. What is known respecting many of the lesser supernatural beings depends upon information contained in stories, and as many of these are personal possessions, it follows that there is tremendous variation in individual knowledge. Psychologically, this is of little importance; there are enough supernatural beings for everyone to know some of them, and to expect to meet or hear them in the forests. To insert many of the stories contained in later chapters would break the sequence of description; all that is here attempted is to give a general summary, in a way foreign to Bella Coola thought.

Supernatural beings are by no means all-powerful. It is true that they have miraculous powers and can work weal or woe to human beings who chance to come in contact with them, but likewise they may sometimes be overwhelmed by mortals armed with objects steeped in human essence, such as a blanket which has been worn until it is impregnatnd not only with the smell, but the physical being of its owner. In particular, shamans or other mortals of great strength have been able to conquer the supernatural ones. Consequently, it may be said that although supernatural beings live on a plane different from that of mortals, they are not omnipotent. Long, long ago, man was able to come in contact with them more frequently, but that golden age when the semi-mythical ancestors of the Bella Coola were living has long since passed away, though it is only within the last few years that such beings, particularly supernatural animals, have become comparatively rare. The Bella Coola give three main reasons for this:

(1) Supernatural animals do not like the sound of muskets and have moved far away.

(2) With increasing dependence on the canning industry, fewer hunters penetrate into their haunts in the distant parts of the mountains.

(3) The younger Bella Coola no longer take pains to purify themselves as a means of placating supernatural beings.

* 996 According to the general Bella Coola belief the supernatural ones may be classified as anthropomorphic beings, zoomorphic beings, and supernatural members of the vegetable and minerals kingdoms.

ANTHROPOMORPHIC BEINGS

The Bella Coola agree that the most important of their supernatural beings is Alquntám, the supreme deity, maker of men and animals. He is most commonly known by this name but he has other appellations with reference to his various functions. The word Alquntám is said to be derived from usquntám, "foreman," or "chief." He is chief of the supernatural beings. Other names by which he is known are as follows:

Sawáhalis, a word derived from saw, the Sun. This name is used almost as commonly as Alquntám.

* 996 538 Swaiaíhlis, "The Ivory Man," because Alquntám created the ancestral myths at the same time that he created mankind. The supreme deity is called Swaiaíhlis with reference to his membership in the Sacred society of the supernatural beings.

Swaiaíhlis, "From Whom Come, and To Whom Belong, All Myths." As creator of the highly valued myths, the supreme deity is owner of them.

* 996 Swaiíhlis, "The Wise One," "The Thoughtful," or "The One with Great Mental Ability."

[601] Mamhaiz, a word supposedly derived from mám, "Father," with the suffix haiz as a term of endearment. This is used in praying to Alquntám.

[601] [102] Títi, "Father," the term for father used by a child; this, like the last, is used in prayer.

Indpaíhlis.

Nwudjuwatum, "The Adviser."

Ilkwum.

Nuqulmíhlis, "The Light Giver."

O-hit ó Ishkuq, "The Moon Chief."

These names are not meaningless synonyms; all, or at any two most of them, are usually used in accordance with the functions of this supreme deity. As a Bella Coola has many names, corresponding to his membership in various societies, his professional prerogatives, his secretal myths, and nose nicknames, so has Hyamsim, who is a supernus, many names, according to his special functions. It would be unthinkable for a Bella Coola to pray to Hyamsim, yet it is common for him to pray to Mouskus or Tsut, other names for the same being. The multiplicity of functions and designations approaches the point of obscuring the unity of Hyamsim, which in fact, some Bella Coola even deny. They state that Sunskelis, Mouskus, Smaiskelis, and Nuqulmaitsis are one, but that Hyamsim, Snaiskelis, and Nuqulmaitsis are three distinct supernatural beings. This seeming confusion presents no difficulties to the Indian, since each family has its own myths in which such facts are recorded. He believes them, without questioning those of his neighbour, and it is even possible for an individual to believe two contradictory statements, if he happens to become the owner of two contradictory myths. Evidence collected in the field does not make clear whether the beliefs of the Bella Coola illustrate an incomplete transformation of a single deity into a number of minor ones, or whether they represent the almost complete fusion of a number of beings into one. Following the practice of the great majority of the Bella Coola, the supreme deity will be referred to as Hyamsim.

The most obvious attribute of Hyamsim is connected with the sun. He can move it and can do as if it were his canoe. It has to resemble a canoe, and when he takes charge of the sun it appears as if the latter were a large, self-propelling, radiant boat with windows through which he looks forth. It is said that long ago he allowed mink to take charge of the sun, but the malicious animal ran it so close to earth that the intense heat killed almost all living creatures. When Hyamsim wears the sun he wears a cloak, on the lining of which are salmon; covering this causes the rivers on earth to turn with salmon.

Sqamsin is occasionally, but inaccurately, called Sun, the Sun.

Though Sqamsin often sojourns in the sun, his home is in the far land above the sky, a huge house which figures prominently both in Bella Coola mythology and present-day thought. The name of the house is Nawaiʼa. It resembles those constructed on this earth, but is boundless in size. Like the houses of human beings, its name is changed according to what is taking place within. Every autumn the supernatural beings gather there to await the coming of Sqamsin at the winter solstice; while waiting they pass the time by performing the equivalent of the earthly tsaxat dances (II, chap. i). This assemblage is termed qulwasin, and the house, during this period, Nuqulwasin.

The following names of the house, with meanings, were obtained:

Nawaiʼa, "The Place of Myths."

Nuqumlaxsin, "Where Everything Was Begun."

Nuxoldimasin, "The Place Whence Came the Falling Down."

Nuthamalmasin, "The Place Where Mankind was Made."

Nuxlqumtsin, "The Place Where Sqamsin Speaks."

Nuqulwasin, "The Place of the Qulwasin."

Nuqhlaxsin, "The Place of Meeting," or "The Council House."

Nalmamlt. The meaning of this word is unknown.

Amamlalmalt, "The Moving House." The significance of this last name rests on an ancient myth in which the house is described as travelling from place to place.

To grasp the significance of these designations it is necessary to understand the beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the creation. Their mythology contains no account of the origin or birth of Sqamsin himself, nor of the making of this world; in the beginning of time no living creature, either animal or vegetable, existed with the exception of Sqamsin. He, therefore, decided to alter and populate the world and accordingly created four supernatural Carpenters. They in turn made a number of workers, Alpuxtiulf correspondently. These beings, endowed with enormous power by Alpuxtiu, chiselled from wood a number of human beings, the forefathers of mankind. Some men state that this was done by the four Carpenters, but the consensus of opinion seems to be that they were merely supervisors. No explanation is given of the means used by Alpuxtiu to give life to the beings thus created. The workers made not only human bodies, but constructed their mentality, including the speech. Nacmáit-a contains a large number of rooms, in each of which a different set of Indians, with a different language, was manufactured; thus is explained the diversity of tongues among the people of British Columbia. The Carpenters did not confine their attention to men and women. Supernatural beings, animals, birds, trees, flowers, fish, mountains, rivers, perhaps even moon and stars, all were created almost simultaneously by them under the direction of Alpuxtiu in Nacmáit-a. The sun alone was not made in this way. Alpuxtiu chose the proper plumage or fur for each bird and animal, which the Carpenters painted and carved according to his instructions. As they provided men with different languages, so they furnished the birds and beasts with their speech, which men can no longer understand. Each was given the necessary tools for existence on the earth below; sharp incisors to beaver, strong talons to eagle, a penetrating eye to heron, and so on. The Bella Coola do not regard birds and animals as being of a lower order than themselves, for all were created by the same power, at the same time; in many respects they consider that they belong to a higher plane than human beings. It would be too great a digression to include at this point a number of myths describing the creation, but these will be found in vol. I, chap. vi.

Mythology does not record in detail the sending down to this earth of men and places or of the forefathers of all other Indian tribes; but the manner in which the first Bella Coola arrived is clearly stated. Around the walls of Nacmáit-a were hanging a number of bird and animal cloaks, representing ravens, eagles, whales, grizzly bears, black bears, and a few others. Alquntăm asked each individual which of these cloaks he preferred to wear. One selected a raven, another an eagle, and so on. Each donned his choice from the wall and immediately became the bird or animal chosen. Alquntăm gave each man or woman one or more names, and some food in compressed form; then sent him down in avian or mammal form. Even the animals could travel through the air like birds, and each landed on the peak of a mountain in the Bella Coola country, took off his cloak, and reassumed human form. The discarded coverings floated back up to Nusmăt·a. A few individuals, instead of coming to earth in animal form, swarmed down posts which stretched between the worlds.

This myth is fervently believed by the Bella Coola. Even Christian Indians, though they readily admit the biblical creation as applied to the white race, remain convinced of the manner in which their own ancestors came into being. At the present time, though most ancient beliefs are rapidly passing away, few, if any, Bella Coola doubt this account of the creation of their forefathers. Their conviction rests not only on the religious aspect of their life, but on the sociological. A man's most treasured possessions are the name brought down from above by his ancestor in the beginning of time, the knowledge of the form taken by that ancestor, and information about the place where he landed. A collection of myths of this kind is given in vol. I, chap. VI. Lacking knowledge of his first ancestor's form, a Bella Coola has slight chance of becoming a chief; such lore is the birthright of every descendant of one of those first people, and those without it are almost certain to be the offspring of slaves. The social aspects of creation myths will be described later; at this point a broad outline must suffice. Nusmăt·a, "The House of Myths," is the place in which those myths were made, and are now stored, two reasons for its importance in the eyes of the Bella Coola.

Nusmăt·a is not only connected with the history of an individual's ancestors; it enters into his own future as well. When 177 a Bella Coola dies, his spirit (I, p. 94) travels back on the 773 path of his ancestors from generation to generation until it 775 reaches the spot where the first one came to earth; there it assumes the bird or animal cloak used on that occasion and floats aloft to Nusmăt·a to live forever. Small wonder, therefore, that this house figures prominently in the thoughts of the Bella Coola, and that they cling tenaciously to a belief in it.

Knowledge of Nusmăt·a has been inherited almost entirely 772 from the first ancestors of the Bella Coola, and only a few items of information could be gleaned concerning it. Most men think of it as an enormous replica of their own houses, but one individual, of philosophic temperament, expressed the opinion that it was without any inner partitions. His belief was based on the following incident:

Some years ago a young man died without apparent reason. His sorrowing father kept wondering:

"Why has my son died? Can he have committed some crime or made some mistake?"

Despondent and grief-stricken, for a whole year the man did not wash, ate little, and slept on the floor. At last he wandered away, alone, into the mountains. Night overtook him and he lay down to sleep without food. His son came to him in a dream, telling him not to lament, that he was in a better place than this world, for Ăqwănăw had recalled him to Nusmăt·a to use his voice, which was unusually powerful, as a means of conveying his wishes to the other occupants of the house. Thus comforted, the father returned home in the morning, washed, and again behaved normally. My informant suggested that cross walls would be a bar to the strongest voice, and that Nusmăt·a must consequently be partitionless.

Nusmăt·a contains not only the spirits of all deceased Bella 992
Coola, it is also the home of most of the supernatural beings. 996
These frequently descend to visit the earth, but always return [995] to the house above. So far as could be learnt, the only being irremovably located there is an old woman, Ăsnăqwăqăls. The most prominent article of furniture in Nusmăt·a is Ăqwănăw's seat, in the central position behind the fire. Over it is laid what is probably a moosehide, with salmon painted on it, symbolic of his guardianship of fish for the benefit of mankind. In other respects Nuxmāt-a has no peculiarities. Behind the house is an enormous tree, Tsinpin-iaqim, in the branches of which live innumerable owls.

After this description of Nuxmāt-a, it is logical to return to its master, Alqunātm. Guiding the sun is his most spectacular occupation, but he also governs the movements of moon and tides. Powerful though he is, he continues to take an interest in the doings of mankind whom he created. Prayers are commonly addressed to him, and a certain type of shaman is believed to receive power direct from him. Other supernatural beings may work weal or woe to a Bella Coola, but he feels it is done with the sanction of Alqunātm. At every winter solstice he enters Nuxmāt-a, where supernatural beings from all parts of the universe have gathered to greet him. This assembly is called qulxmaix, and Nuxmāt-a is termed Nuxqulxwaista[1] for its duration. While waiting, the guests perform kuxiut dances, similar to those carried out by members of the kuxiut society on earth (see vol. II, chap. 1). At Alqunātm's entry the heat becomes so intense that the occupants rush forth precipitately, some falling and being trampled upon in the crush. Only three[2] advisers, including Sunxwālaix (I, p. 41), remain to confer with him. They arrange the fate of human beings during the coming year; who shall be made a kuxiut, who shall be born, who shall die. In each case the decision rests with Alqunātm, though he is influenced by his counsellors. Human beings can often learn in dreams what is being decided for them.

Alqunātm, in spite of his strength, shares the limitations of any other chief, and is not invariably successful. The Bella Coola delight in telling stories of how supernatural beings, especially the Raven, outwitted and defeated him. Even human beings, in the beginning of time when they were semi-supernatural, sometimes prevailed against him. One story actually records his murder. From the point of view of morality, an angle from which the Bella Coola themselves do not regard him, Alqantăm is neither moral nor immoral; he has the virtues and vices of a man. That, in fact, is a fair summing up of Alqantăm; he is a superman, creator of life, supreme god in the sense that he is chief of the supernatural beings, but not an all-powerful deity.

Compared with Alqantăm, other supernatural beings are insignificant. The Bella Coola do not regard them as a hierarchy with definitely graded rank and power; accordingly, the order in which they are described is immaterial. Reference has already been made to the supernatural Carpenters.[9] There are four of them, created by Alqantăm in the beginning of time; it was they who constructed the mountains and rivers of this land, the animals and birds peopling them, and supervised the making of mankind. They are considered to be four brothers, collectively known as Mamaxălănx.

The eldest and most powerful is Yalăttwat, "He Who Completes Any Task with a Single Smoothing Motion."

The second brother is Mălăkăllwak, "He Who Completes Any Task with a Single Stroke of an Adze."

The third brother is Mălăpewak, "He Who Completes Any Task with Two Strokes of His Adze."

The fourth and youngest brother is ăkăkăk, "He Who Completes Any Task in a Single Day."

In Kimsquit, Mălăkăllwak is often called Mamaxălănx and the collective term is not used. These names explain the beliefs of the Bella Coola with regard to the powers of the Carpenters. After their work in the beginning of time, the three younger brothers returned to Nanăk'a, where they have since resided, but Yalăttwat came to earth and married a Bella Bella woman. The Bella Coola admit that members of this 776 tribe are superior to themselves in carpentry, and ascribe their [186] skill to the fact that many of them are descendants of Yalâ-

[641] tiwat. Some of the coastal tribes are said to believe that Ilpuxtáw erred in the manufacture of many of the sea mammals, giving them, for example, human heads on fish bodies; he later rectified this by sending his Carpenters to adjust their form. This is not a Bella Coola belief. One elderly man stated that the skill of the Carpenters in painting and modelling was derived from a little girl named Xpuhanas; no confirmation could be obtained for this statement and the information was vague and unreliable.

Since their creation of the sky and many features of this world, as well as birds and animals, the Carpenters have entered but little into the lives of the Bella Coola. Like other supernatural beings, they are capable of going anywhere, but for many generations they have not been seen on this earth.
[575] Their most important function, perhaps, is to act as patrons for various hamat dancers. This subject will be described in detail in vol. II, chap. 1; for the moment it is enough to say that many supernatural beings regard members of this semi-sacred society as their protégés, and grant them power to per-[535] form dances. On these occasions masked figures are used to represent the patrons, thus enlightening uninitiated persons as to the appearance and attributes of various supernatural beings.

Among the many residents of Nacmáx-a are two sons of Ilpuxtáw, Xnalkpmalás Ilpuxtáw and Sxa'alás Ilpuxtáw. The former in particular is dearly loved by his father and is often spoken of as Nacówanacówhum, "The Cherished One."
[575] These two beings take no part in the affairs of mortals except as patrons of hamat dancers. Like all supernatural beings they are considered to be immortal. Since Ilpuxtáw has two sons it is to be assumed that he has, or had, a wife. Her name is not generally known, although she is sometimes spoken of as [538] Nacmáx-ax-a, "The Woman of Nacmáx-a." There are also many stories describing his amours with human women resulting in semi-supernatural offspring.

One of Alquntăm's principal functions is that of acting as leader of the kusiut dances of the supernatural beings. As already described, these take place in Nasmāt·a, the name of which is changed to Nasqulwaists for the occasion, while the supernatural ones are awaiting Alquntăm's entry at the winter solstice. As soon as he comes, his extreme heat causes most of his guests to rush forth. Among those remaining is Sexsexkālaix, the Lawyer, his chief adviser in kusiut matters. This being is somewhat indefinitely regarded as a supernatural grizzly bear. He is subordinate to Alquntăm, and cannot himself initiate proposals, but he can interrupt the speeches of his superior if he feels bold. Human singers are under his special guidance. He is so powerful that if he turns his head in anger at any mortal, the latter falls dead. As far as could be learnt, Sexsexkālaix is concerned only with kusiut matters and never visits this earth. 776* [533]

One of the most intangible of the Bella Coola supernatural beings is a woman, Kūmai·u, Aiatla, "The Sorrow-Maker" or Dji Sīnāsīl, "The Slave-Owner." Boas (p. 28) recorded fairly definite information about her, but the writer could gather only inconsequential fragments. Mortals are as slaves to her, but she takes little interest either in their welfare or actions. In the beginning of time, Alquntăm sent her down to earth to watch the behaviour of mortals and report to him. She needed a central location for this purpose and accordingly chose Restoration Bay, where she could watch the canoes as they passed up and down the coast. At first the inhabitants of the earth showed her great respect, but gradually she was ignored and canoes passed her home without stopping. Moreover, she began to fear that she might be injured by the proximity of mankind, and especially that human footsteps might contaminate and mar her supernatural frame. So she fled far to the south, whither no one knows. In fact, no one is even absolutely certain that she went to the south. According to a well-known Bella Coola tradition, a man once tried to climb Mount Nusqulc and found a pleasant grassy place near [114]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 776 the top. He concluded that this must be the home of the woman. Before the door of her house, wherever it may be, there are miniature totem-poles which open their painted mouths and speak in the voice of the animal or bird portrayed. The writer did not hear that her home was in the land above [114] Nuxmāt·a, as Boas (p. 28) states. At the present time knowledge of Kāmai·ts is so scanty that failure to confirm the previous observation is not surprising.

One or two passing remarks of elderly informants imply that Kāmai·ts may once have been more important to Bella Coola belief than she is now. One old man, already in his [775] dotage, stated that long ago the dead used to dwell in her house. Another declared that long ago prayers were addressed [782] to her, which is never done now. The word kāmai·ts is commonly used by the Bella Coola in a manner difficult to trans- [192] late. It serves as equivalent for "please" or "thank you," but has an underlying significance of a supernatural benison or appeal. It is not a word to be used in casual conversation; it is reserved for important occasions or times of emotional stress. The comparative unimportance of Kāmai·ts probably rests on the fact that she belongs merely to the realm of ancient history and has no sociological significance, even as the patron of a kuxiut dancer.

772 Another supernatural being so far removed from this world
* 776 that he enters but little into the lives of the Bella Coola, is Snimia. He is the male being whom Ālqantām sent down from above in the beginning of time to hold the earth in position, and who has since performed this duty. He lives among the ice of the far north, and has not been seen by mortals for many generations. He holds a rope fastened to the earth; when he is afraid that it has slipped slightly he takes a new grip and pulls the rope taut, pressing the world against the soles of his feet as he sits with legs extended, as a man would do to hold tight a kicking salmon. It is the tightening of the rope which [123] causes an earthquake. If Snimia should lose his grip entirely 575 the earth would capsize. He is patron for several kuxiut
* 776 dancers.

dancers. Sninia differs from most supernatural beings in having his residence in this world instead of in the land above. 776*

Among the beings dwelling in the upper region are a number of Xemxemtnum, whose function it is to ask the sun to appear every day. It travels without their assistance, but if they neglected to arouse it, darkness would prevail all day. The only knowledge of these beings is derived from information given by the first people; they have not been seen by mortals since early days and do not act as patrons for kusiut dancers. [821]

Heat and Cold are regarded by the Bella Coola as anthropomorphic beings, but their beliefs concerning them have not become crystallized, perhaps because of their non-appearance as patrons of kusiut dancers. The following story is told of the annual meeting of Heat and Cold. 776* 821 539

Every spring Cold, Swaxhalats, meets Heat, Sqwilkhus, in some undefined locality and says:

"You will not be welcome in the place to which you are going [the earth]. I have just come from there. People like to get up on cool mornings to start work, they won't pay any attention to you."

But Sqwilkhus replies: "No. They will welcome me. Everyone prefers to spend a few extra minutes in bed in the mornings. It is pleasant to do so when it is warm, hence I shall be welcome in spite of the eagerness of mankind for work."

In spite of its apparent definiteness, this account is regarded merely as a story, and it is doubtful if any historical accuracy is attached to it. The Bella Coola laugh when it is told, and the irony of the conversation is not lost on them.

S'pi', the Cold Wind, is another anthropomorphized being belonging to the realm of stories rather than to that of everyday life and profound belief. His wife is Alilu, and their child is Ice. On a cold morning, if a Bella Coola finds ice on liquid left in a bucket or other container, he warms it at a fire until he can lift off the sheet, and throws it out of the door, saying as he does so: "Alilu—," your child has become cold." 776* 821

776 is in the upper Bella Coola valley near Firvale, cause cold 773 breezes by blowing them through their anuses. ustuman i especially is a prominent figure in mythology (I, p. 670), but she [821] has not appeared for many generations and her actions belong to legend rather than to either religion or social practices. It is said that she has four sons who once wanted to break a large number of grass stalks. Finding it difficult to do so on account of their toughness, they asked their mother to freeze them; she did this and destroyed every other plant at the same time.

776 Another anthropomorphic being is Ixl'ûsl, the super-621 natural South Wind of winter who brings storm and snow.
199 The Carriers affirm that every icicle which grows down until its end is in the snow is his walking-stick, and that to break
[791] one causes famine. Some Bella Coola have adopted this belief and carefully refrain from destroying such icicles.

776 Supernatural beings experience the same difficulty as mortals in reckoning the passage of time. A number of calendrical experts live in the land above, whose duty it is to record both months and years. They are called Ilmunkilhwayuic or Ilmunkilten. They have been seen occasionally, and are [575] shown, as masked figures, at nusut (I, p. 181), but not at kwiat dances. Two of these beings always appear, and they argue about their observations after the fashion of humans.

Another denizen of Nuxmit-a of slight importance in the social life of the Bella Coola is Xwuxwulsta, a friend and [575] associate of Alqunim. He acts as patron of kwiat dancers, and in this manner is brought to the notice of mortals. In the land above his function is to cherish Tlûqmi-ic, a being resembling a diminutive man, created by Alqunim as a child to all supernatural beings. Xwuxwulsta is its guardian or nurse; and for safety he usually keeps his charge in the far distant upper land above Nuxmit-a, where Alqunim frequently visits the two. In some mysterious manner, Tlûqmi-ic has been [779] known to reach this earth, giving good fortune to the lucky finder. He is in many cases spoken of as "The Cherished

One." An informant, wishing to emphasize the care lavished on this being, pointed to a photograph from an illustrated paper of Princess Mary, Viscountess Lascelles, bending over her infant. He remarked that this was the kind of attention shown by Xwaxwaiáitis to his charge.

Of slightly greater importance is the hermaphrodite, Spuns. He resides in the land above, and spends most of his time outside the walls of Nuxwáit-a, acting as guardian to a number of young girls, the children of various supernatural beings. On many occasions he has descended to this world and has been seen by mortals, who recognize him by his peculiar nasal voice, intermediate between that of a man and a woman. It is supposed that human hermaphrodites have been affected in some mysterious way by their supernatural prototype.

Several informants stated that they had heard of hermaphrodites among other tribes, and thought that such existed among their own people in early times, but the term is usually applied, without physiological significance, to two types of individual supposedly affected by Spuns. Several cases are alleged of a male infant changing to a female on being washed and brought into the house. One of these, a girl about twelve years of age, was living in Bella Coola in 1923. The basis for these accounts is certainly error concerning the sex of a new-born child. The second class consists of those who desire to perform the work of the opposite sex. For example, if a boy shows an aptitude for women's work, the parents, realizing that he wants to be a girl, dress and treat him accordingly. One informant knew of a Kimsquit boy, two Bella Bella, and several Kitimat to whom this had occurred. Henceforth they dressed as women, but in due course they took wives whom they helped in all feminine tasks. Another informant knew of two cases of the kind in which the men did not marry and were believed to have an aversion to women. One instance is known of a Kitimat woman who, having assumed man's costume and occupations, refused either to marry or to have anything to do with her own sex. Another case is of a Cariboo

[71] woman who dressed as a man and used to hunt successfully, though she was married. Such practices are said to have been not uncommon among the Haida. The women were considered bold and independent, but the Bella Coola of today know little about them, and are not even certain that Sputz is responsible for a female assuming the actions of a male. It will be readily understood that he is not regarded with much awe, nor does he influence their daily lives.

[77] A supernatural being from whom many Bella Coola have had unpleasant visitations is Dhsnesila, the cause of nightmares. He is a man-like creature with black face and an enormous head which he constantly scratches. His home is in Nuxnit'a, but he frequently descends to this world and frightens sleepers. If a person scratches his head while asleep it is because he has just seen Dhsnesila doing so, and if he walks in his sleep it is to escape this supernatural visitor. A sleep-walker is usually aroused by having a bucket of water thrown over him. A person frequently troubled by Dhsnesila can avoid him by painting a black circle around each eye before going to sleep.

With the exception of Sqaxaxim, the supernatural beings thus far described play little part in the lives of the Bella Coola. They believe in their existence, but do not expect to meet them, and do not believe that they exercise much influence on the course of their daily life. Supernatural beings of this indifferent type are exceptional. A man goes into remote parts of the mountains, or even into little frequented areas around his village, with mingled fear but he recognizes an actively malicious being, and hope that he may meet a benevolent one. Here-over, he is aware that by certain means he may have good expectations of beseeching, cajoling, deceiving, or rendering powerless any supernatural beings whom he may meet. This attitude is typical; the Bella Coola by no means move in constant dread of the mysterious denizens of the forests, nor do they eagerly hope for their appearance; they have their likes and dislikes, their moments of weakness and of strength, their times of greatness and of pettiness, all to be considered with care and forethought.

One of the beings for whom the older people have a profound respect is Thiteplilée-a, a supernatural woman whose home is in Nazmit-a, but who frequently visits this earth. She can be recognized by her snout-like mouth and long, pendant breasts, but even when beyond the range of vision her proximity can be detected by her singing. Thiteplilée-a often takes pity on a person who is dangerously ill and visits him, not only curing the malady but bringing the sufferer a name and song. In many cases he is thus made a shaman with power to cure. At other times Thiteplilée-a bestows her favours on a person in good health, so that wise Bella Coola are always hoping to meet her. Such an experience is not without its dangers, for she is so powerful that nearness to her may be enough to cause death. The exploits of those who have come in contact with Thiteplilée-a belong to shamanism and will be reserved for vol. I, chap. IX.

Thiteplilée-a, though her great power inspires fear, usually behaves in a kindly manner to mortals, who accordingly welcome her. But it is quite otherwise with Sxaiaxwaa, whose coming almost invariably brings death.* He is a black-faced being of repulsive appearance and sensual nature, whose chief function is to seduce women. For this purpose he often skulks near a village at night, and assumes the voice and appearance of a girl's lover to lure her into the forest. Fearlessly she goes with him, but if she allows his approaches, a hemorrhage results and she soon dies. There is said to be no limit to the number of his disguises. For example, he once appeared at New Westminster in the form of a handsome white man; a Bella Coola girl yielded to his pleadings, but as soon as he had left her, she began to bleed and died.* He is so evil that shamans can rarely cure anyone visited by him. Sxoiaxwaw usually carries a stick which he need only to point at a woman to cause her death.

Nor are men exempt from Sxoiaxwaw's visitations. Sometimes he sneaks up behind a man and seizes his arms, so that he cannot see who has gripped him. He is soon released but no matter how quickly he turns around can never see his captor. Presently he begins to bleed from mouth and nose and death follows. Sxoiaxwaw may become visible under such conditions. One old man stated that his son had once been playing outside the village at Kimsquit when he rushed into the house weeping and saying that he had been seized by a black-faced man. In a few minutes his nose began to bleed so that his father knew it was Sxoiaxwaw who had visited him. Nothing was of any avail and the lad died. His approach is usually heralded by a series of grunting, explosive puffs, like those of a big bear rising suddenly. If, warned by the sound, the hearer turns sharply, he can escape danger. An informant described how, when camped on Labouchere Channel, he had once gone to the river for water with two companions, a man and a woman. They all heard these gasping puffs and turned, but he alone had jumped from the path quickly enough. The other two began to pass like Sxoiaxwaw himself; blood gushed from their mouths and genital organs and they soon died.

Like other supernatural beings, Sxoiaxwaw has his limitations. Though he comes to this earth he can travel only on fixed paths, invisible to mortals. If either a man or a woman is unfortunate enough to fall asleep on one of these tracks, it is easy for Sxaiaxwas to gain control over them, and the sleeper wakes to find that he has been bleeding profusely and death is inevitable. This occurred to a man whose experiences are described in vol. I, chap. ix.

* A curious blending of aboriginal and white man's beliefs was recorded in connection with this incident. It is said that as the girl's mother left her, carrying the lad in his hand, she saw two horse rising from his forehead and realized that her lover had been Sxoiaxwaw.

Although Sxaiaxwas is usually a curse to mortals, he can also do good. Occasionally he makes a man a shaman, and in many cases he helps a woman in childbirth. Such beneficent acts are not sufficient to counterbalance his evil deeds, and he remains one of the most dreaded of Bella Coola supernatural beings, a monster whose machinations make camping in a strange place a dangerous undertaking, and who is as likely to strike down rich or poor, young or old.

Less feared than Sxaiaxwas, because he appears less frequently, is Nlai'cmiut. The Bella Coola speak of this being with trepidation, but little definite information could be obtained concerning him. He has human form and sometimes comes at dusk to cause death by carrying away a man's spirit.[1] The home of this creature appears to be beneath the earth rather than in Nacmai'a.

A third dreaded being who, like the two preceding, usually lives on this earth and only visits in Nacmai'a, is Si'ilen, "The Death Dealer." He, too, appears in human form and can be distinguished by the nose-ring which he always wears. Sudden death in the forest is always attributed to "The Death Dealer." If a man is engulfed by a slide, or killed by a falling tree, it is because this malevolent being has entered the slide or tree. Some Bella Coola say that he is responsible for animals who kill hunters. He rarely carries out his designs with the aid of sickness, nor is death by drowning often attributed to him, but for all other fatal disasters he must take the blame. While a corpse is resting in a coffin awaiting burial, Si'ilen invariably sits on the cover, though none can see him. Instances are known in which even this monster has acted in a kindly manner.

The supernatural beings thus far described are usually

[1] See vol. I, pp. 94 f.

* 776 encountered on land, but the sea likewise is the home of anthropomorphic creatures. For beneath the surface is a land much [772] like the earth, inhabited by people resembling humans who sometimes assist a drowning person. The mysteries of this underseas world are known to the Bella Coola chiefly through accounts handed down from generation to generation, though its inhabitants have often appeared at the surface. Their hair is long and somewhat reddish, their bodies are hairless, and their faces are in many cases stained with black. One man stated that about three years before a Japanese, fishing near Nanaimo, had caught in his net one of these people, a girl about two years old. He drew her into his boat, where she squatted on the bottom, docile and submissive. After a time the fisherman became frightened and threw his captive overboard. The [548] Bella Coola say that the Bella Bella, greater seafarers than [776] themselves, have more extensive knowledge of these underseas dwellers.

549 Similar, if not identical, beings live beneath rivers and
* 776 lakes; they have often been seen on the surface, and occasionally, long, long ago, certain fortunate individuals saw their houses. Accounts of such are embodied in Bella Coola mythology and will be described later. The following can be considered an example of a simple type:

About three hundred years ago, Lowemowelain, a Kimsquit fisherman, built a pole-like framework, projecting into the Dean River, on which to stand while fishing for salmon with a long-handled* scoop-net. One August day he was using his net when, after a number of successful scoops, it became very heavy. As the net came to the surface he found, to his amazement, that a small boy was hanging on the rim. A number of people who had been watching from the shore, called to him to throw away his net with its uncanny load. Heedless of this advice, Lowemowelain tried to lift his net and, on finding it too heavy, began to draw it through the water so as to drag it out on the shore. All went well for the first few yards, till suddenly the boy shoved against the net, pushing the fisherman into the water on the other side of the pole. Immediately the supernatural one vanished from sight. As the bystanders rushed to the course of Lemoxwowulais they saw him being carried downstream to a salmon-weir about three hundred yards below. The trap was raised at once, but it was too late; the rash fisherman was dead. No one could give a name to the supernatural being who had caused his death; it was merely one of those dwelling under the river. 776* [539] [761]

*The handles of nets of this type are said to have been about thirty feet in length.

Whales, too, are sometimes observed in the rivers, but though they appear to resemble those of the ocean they are really their supernatural prototypes. [825]

These human-like dwellers beneath the water can, as in this case, cause death, but they are usually regarded as uncanny rather than dangerous. But there is one undersea being whom the Bella Coola regard with unmixed awe; he is Xemoqwe (see Plate 10), lord of the supernatural ones beneath the ocean, as Alqunsiw is lord of those dwelling above. He lives in an enormous house under the sea wherein the fish, the sea-mammals, and the sea-plants have their home. The Bella Coola believe that these beings can take human form at will,* and assume that their behaviour in Xemoqwe's dwelling corresponds to that of human beings in the house of an earthly chief. In the beginning of time, when men were more powerful than in recent years, this house sometimes rose to the surface of the water and adventurous Bella Coola entered it on various occasions, leaving to their descendants tales of the wonders it contained. These accounts have become family myths and are described with others of similar type in Chap. vi, vol. I. Records of this kind vary greatly in detail; in fact, few agree more than in broad outline. Sometimes it is stated that denizens of the sea appear in Xemoqwe's house in the flesh; other myths describe paintings of sea creatures around the walls and the manner in which these are brought to life by Xemoqwe. Irrespective of the exact details, it is clear that he is chief of the undersea beings who serve him and hunt for him, the blackfish being especially proficient in this respect. Xemoqwe resents any slight to his protégés and punishes any mortal who is unkind to them. [761] 773 776* [424] [184]

*Bella Coola concepts concerning the transformability of men and animals will be described in the next section of this chapter.

*776 Although Ḵ'mayms has often been seen by mortals, no one has ever been able to describe his countenance. He always wears a huge hat, beneath which his blackened face, covered with eagle down, is barely visible, since he constantly keeps turning it away from the observer. Occasionally he comes to the surface and has been known even to walk on it. Like other supernatural beings, he is able to ascend to Nuxmāx, though it is not his home. The dread with which the Bella Coola regard Ḵ'mayms is due to his ability to suck canoes down to his home at the bottom of the ocean as if in a whirlpool. He is usually hungry, and nothing pleases him more than human flesh. None the less, he does not destroy life without cause. It angers him to hear his name spoken, so no Bella Coola utters [502] it when on the ocean, for fear that he may be engulfed. Whenever a person is drowned at sea it is believed that the cannibalistic Ḵ'mayms has drawn him down for a meal. [764]

539 To insert the many stories describing Ḵ'mayms at this point *776 would unduly break the continuity of this account, so the following simple example must suffice.

Not many years ago four Bella Bella fishermen were trying to anchor near China Hat. Owing to the action of the supernatural beings dwelling below, the bottom of the ocean rose and lowered abruptly so that their anchor would not hold as the rope was in many cases too short. They were much annoyed by this and, as they strove to fasten their craft, they were exasperated at a lord-fish which kept swimming closely around the canoe. At last one of the fishermen reached out, seized it with his hands, and tore it to pieces, throwing these back on the water. Presently their anchor held and the four went to sleep. But Ḵ'mayms had seen the insult shown to the lord-fish and, as they slept, he sucked down their canoe until, on awakening, they found themselves in the huge house of the lord of the underseas world. There was no water in it, but they recognized where they must be from the fact that the walls were decorated with paintings of marine beings and with ancient tools from canoes lost at sea. An old woman who lives in Ḵ'mayms's house called the four to her fire in the corner and asked them whether they had any false hellebore with them. If they had, they would escape, but otherwise nothing could save them from Ḵ'mayms, who at that very moment was calling his friends for a feast of human flesh. Presently Ḵ'mayms entered, followed in succession by a number of underseas chiefs, including the dreaded guru, Shamchu Nun, in human form. As such 539 came in, every settled in and the canoe was round as if in a whirlpool. 776 *

If it had capsized the occupants would have been devoured, but on such occasions one of the Sisiutlas threw a mound of false lubricant on the surface, which settled the waves. In fact Kwaqam and his friends admitted defeat, granted the four Sisiutlas the power of shamans, and gave them certain prerogatives.

Though Kwaqam is usually ranked to mortals, and is correspondingly feared, instances are known in which he has bestowed shamanistic powers for no apparent reason. The Bella Coola say that the Bella Bella know more about Kwaqam than they do, since he is essentially an ocean being and the Bella Bella are ocean people. It is possible that the Bella Coola concepts of this supernatural personage are entirely of Bella Bella origin. This supposition is strengthened by the fact that Kwaqam seldom appears in connection with the hactat society, but frequently with the xaxalt society, many of the rites of which came from Bella Bella. [756] 177 776 * [576]

Since human beings can travel on the sea only by means of canoes, it is not surprising that the Bella Coola think of supernatural beings as doing likewise. Their beliefs include at least three huge canoes, manned by supernatural beings. The most important is that of Nuklipnem,* the canoe of its captain, whose crew consists of a number of supernatural birds and the hermaphrodite. Every year they come from the lands of the salmon and the herring, in the far west beyond the sea, and bear down to the coast of British Columbia. This belief, which runs counter to the conviction that Hqamim caused the animals and plants to grow, is merely one of the many inconsistencies of Bella Coola theology. Nuklipnem comes every autumn on his way to attend the gathering of the supernatural beings in the land above, and his arrival in the Bella Coola River marks the commencement of the hactat dances. He is one of the most important of hactat patrons and his powers and functions are described in the chapter devoted to that 773 776 * [576] of the crown, one of the members is condemned by the Mythical laws of the parishes of the Way-Farers of the Tide. If he is what he or even calls out, "[illegible]." This serves to keep the Way-Farers on a diameter, and to wakes the rest of the party who hastily down on the fire objects which have been in contact with the human body.

Where stories are told by the Bulla Cuda of the appearance of the Way-Farers of the Tide. The following can be regarded as typical.

A few years ago, a human vessel docked, and the wife, frequently, was managed on Lybrother Channel on the point known as Wapple, near the fire springs. They were discussing a private matter when, to the amusement of both, that dog, who was with them, joined in the conversation. The assumed behaviour should have warned them of approaching danger and they ought to have killed the animal, as indeed the women desired to do. But mutual curiosity arisen and prevented that for them to stay. In some mysterious manner the dog was able to summon the Way-Farers of the Tide, which carried the two away. When they awoke they were in the dead sands, and the power from out of the prevailing was there. They were powerless and could not to call to the crew member on Dock Bastard. Yet, under the dead sun, they to be back, and there also, dead on the sand journey. The sun was not where in that sky, apparently unknown, for that was the danger to which they had been exposed and that was the to Wanapit. The woman told a shaman what had happened and accepted the amulets dearly treasuring. Consequently, though the shaman right of security, the sun sank. The bandaging rushed, on the other hand, refused to pay attention to the danger, which a lot made to become crazy, and then died.

Quite another category of Bulla Cuda supernatural beings consists of ghosts. These beings, once human, have passed by death into the realm of the supernatural. Their home is the land below the earth, where they live the normal escape that everything is average and otherwise. In form they resemble human beings, but their faces are green and wavy. They can sign the land of the living at will, and make their presence known by whistling, which is their language. Their actions are the reverse of those of humans, for example, they often walk backwards, or on their hands. Wands sometimes are [illegible] given, but the supernatural seals their lips so that they cannot recount their experiences. Death invariably follows. Shamans and other mortals endowed with great powers have been able to penetrate to the realm below, and the knowledge of conditions there has been derived from their accounts. Food is [illegible] given to their hand and gloves are often driven up to earth to search for it. Even a small morsel is enough to satisfy their hunger, so that morsels throw fragments on the fire for the benefit of their dead relatives. If a person drop a crumb it is because a ghost has hooked it away from his hand, so when Bella Coola ever picks up such a morsel, knowing that to do so would offend the hungry spirits. Deceased beings are generally feared, although instances are known in which they have shown kindness, particularly to their relatives. Like so many supernatural beings, they figure more prominently as persons of Starlit descent (see vol. II, chap. i). Further information concerning them is contained in the description of life after death.

[illegible] Not even a complete list of beings would enhance the beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the supernatural, since any unexpected visitation is attributed by them to his source. For example, when Mackenzie appeared, the first white man with whom the Bella Coola had come in contact, they thought that he must be from another world. Some thought him a dead man returned to life, and others considered him a supernatural visitor from above who had fallen down to earth, so did their first ancestors. The latter view prevailed, and it was ultimately decided that he must be Qomoqa, a supernatural being member-chief of whom Bella was known. This name was applied to him, and it has since been given to all white men.[1]

[1] Although it was in 1793 that Mackenzie passed down the Bella Coola valley, a number of parties of the white men met subsequently in 1811. When such happened the Bella Coola were doubtless a little forewarned, likewise were they prepared that he had been from the realm that the latter had spoken with. Traditions of the coming of the white men are remarkably accurate, for instance the first [illegible] among men will be dubbed. The Chinook man, for example,

The religious concepts of the Bella Coola are not limited to explanations of strange apparitions, nor to knowledge of a wide range of supernatural beings, anthropomorphic or zoomorphic. Many in whom they believe are invisible and intangible, though some the less potent. Almost every incident of life is ascribed to the help or hindrance of a supernatural agency. If a fisherman constructs a salmon-weir, with a considerable amount of work, the Bella Coola ascribe his success to the existence of some supernatural being or supernatural power; more labour would never have sufficed. If a man has phenomenal success in hunting, it is because the supernatural has helped him in some way. It is not necessary that an anthropomorphic being should appear; they seldom do, but may imply that in some form or another supernatural aid has aided the enterprise.

This attitude is clearly evident in Bella Coola beliefs concerning the construction of canoes. Many professions depend upon prerogatives without which a person cannot hope to succeed. This is not true of canoe-makers, although it is a great advantage to one of them if Tsalaiwat, the Divine Carpenter, appeared to his ancestors in the beginning of time. Even without this in many cases a man can succeed in making a canoe if he is aided by a supernatural teacher, or Master Maker. No one knows much about this being, not even whether there is more than one of them, but it is thought to kindly intervention that a man is able to complete his single-handed task. If carpenters who have left a half-finished canoe in the woods, hear adze beats, as they are returning to it, they remain away from the spot, knowing that their work is being done with superhuman efficiency by a supernatural artisan. Under such circumstances even a ordinary man can construct one of the large, ocean-going canoes. Nanx-ulk, an expert carpenter, named Talalin, was making 372 one at Rescuscion Bay. He had reached the point where he

* 776 needed help to turn the craft over, and one day, returning to his work, he heard the sound of many voices. He turned for a few minutes, and when he reached his canoe it had been turned over as he desired.

On that occasion the beings who assisted the canoe-maker appear to have had definite form, and certainly to have displayed physical strength, but this extreme anthropomorphizing is unusual with respect to the assistance given to carpenters. The construction of a canoe is an arduous and difficult work; the person who has made one is regarded by his fellows with re-[554] spect mixed with envy, and it is tacitly assumed that he must have received more than human assistance. Considering the number of anthropomorphic beings known to the Bella Coola, it is not surprising that some individuals should assume that the successful carpenter must have had assistance from one of them, but to other Bella Coola the explanation would be in the intangible help vouchsafed to him by some kind of supernatural power.

* 776 Similar intangible power is believed to be evident in a person's thoughts. If a man receives either good or evil from a 828 comrade it is his duty and privilege to repay. He intends to do so, but only a good man can carry out the resolution. When a white man would attribute to forgetfulness, procrastination, or laziness, the Bella Coola say it is caused by the intervention of Snqumhulaiem, who steals away his thoughts. It is doubtful whether this being is considered to have any definite form; rather he is a barrier, normally situated within the doorway of every house. The ideas of a strong man are able to surmount the obstacle, but Snqumhulaiem obscures those of a wrestling, and directs him to matters of no importance.

Another intangible supernatural being is that which drives firewood. The Bella Coola say that no matter how 372
* 776 well a fire may be provided with fuel when a person sits down to a meal, it is certain to be either out, or nearly so, when he has finished eating. The natural explanation does not satisfy the Bulla Coola. No one knows the name of the fire devourer, and it may be that he lacks form. Though ignorant of the law of conservation of matter, the Bulla Coola realize that the wood must have gone somewhere, and postulate a land far across the western sea where burnt wood lies in shadowy heaps, each billet retaining its original form though it lacks material substance. This region is presided over by an evil being with a desire for human flesh (II, p. 416).

The above list by no means exhausts the anthropomorphic beings resident either in Nuwuhi'a or in this world. Those described are the most important, and suffice to make clear the religious attitude of the Bulla Coola to beings of this type. Others appear in connection with hactar dances only, and a consideration of these can be deferred until vol. II, chap. x, whereas some belong essentially to shamanism and allied subjects treated in vol. I, chap. xx.

ZOOMORPHIC BEINGS

The attitude of mingled hope and fear with which the Bulla Coola regard their supernatural anthropomorphic beings is typical of their thoughts and actions concerning zoomorphic creatures as well. In the supernatural world the dividing line between human and animal beings is not clearly defined; fabulous monsters have the mentality of superman, and can be appeased, besought, or cajoled precisely as are anthropomorphic beings. Like those of human form, supernatural animals can bestow good or evil on human beings with whom they come in contact. The division shown in this chapter must, therefore, be regarded as merely for convenience; it does not correspond to a distinction in the minds of the Bulla Coola.

One of the most dreaded animals known to the Bulla Coola is the ninag, a monster about the size of a large grizzly bear, with long, silky, beautiful hair, blue-grey in colour. It walks almost upright on short hind legs, so that its long fore-legs touch the ground at intervals; these are provided with sharp [illegible] rations resembling, but larger than, those of an eagle. It has no tail. The great strength of these animals rests in the fact that their eyes revolve in their sockets, so that, when screwed, piercing beams shoot forth which strike senseless anyone on whom they fall. Having thus stunned his victim, the sasq picks him up and stuffs him into a broad-mouthed basket, carried on the back. It is provided with spikes inclined inwards and downwards so that a person thrust within cannot climb out. Human beings are carried in this way to the beast's lair, a cave in the mountains, where they are devoured at leisure. Wolves always accompany sasq; in fact, they may almost be termed attendants upon them (see vol. III, chap. 4). Like other supernatural creatures, sasq are impervious to most mortal weapons, but there is one method of overcoming them. If a human cut himself on the outer side of his right leg so that the blood flows freely, and smears a bullet with this, he can kill a sasq. Similar success is gained by biting the tongue and smearing the bullet with blood so obtained.

Another animal which is credited powerless by the same charm is the hoji. This beast somewhat resembles a man, its hands especially, and the region around the eyes being distinctly human. It walks on its hind legs, in a stooping posture, its long arms swinging below the knees. In height it is rather less than the average man. The entire body, except the face, is covered with long hair, the growth being most profuse on the chest which is large, corresponding to the great strength of the animal. The most peculiar feature of the animal is its penis, which is so long that it must be rolled up and carried in the arms when the creature is walking; it terrifies its victims by striking two stones and breaking branches with its unrolled organ. It is said that a woman was once drawing water on the edge of a stream when a hoji, concealed on the other shore, extended its penis under the water to the further bank and held intercourse with her. The woman rendered her powerless, as if turned to stone; she could neither flee nor remove the organ. The companions who unsuccessfully to out the organ until one of them brought a satisfactory tool, whereupon the monster, dreading its razor-like edge, withdrew.

The following story illustrates, better than any description, the attitude of the Bella Coola towards these animals.

Not many years ago a certain Qáiʼlx was encamped with his wife and child in the Bay of the Thousand Islands, Ítsulaiʼlx, about ten miles above Dean, one of the heads of fiord. He heard a number of the creatures in the forest behind him and asked his gun, as the same came calling out to them to go away. Instead, the breaking of branches and beating upon resonantly some wood. Becoming alarmed, he called out once more: "Go away, or you shall feel my power." They still approached and Qáiʼlx fired in the direction of the sounds. There followed a wild commotion in the forest, roars, grunts, growling, and the breaking of branches. The hunter, now thoroughly alarmed, told his wife and child to embark in the canoe while he covered their retreat with his gun. He followed them without molestation, and embarked his craft out far from shore. The fiord could be heard plainly as they rushed to and fro on the beach, but only the vague outlines of their forms were visible in the darkness. Presently, though there was no wind, the canoe began to roll as if in a heavy sea. Qáiʼlx decided to fire to frightening this, but before he had gone far he paddle struck the bottom, although he was in mid-channel. Looking up, he saw that the mountains were higher than usual, the fiord had, by their supernatural power, raised the whole area so that the water had been almost entirely drained away. They are the only supernatural beings with this power. Qáiʼlx jumped overboard into water which reached only to his knees, and waded the canoe to Kwacowlin Bay, the fiord following him along the shore.[1]

This is not the only occasion on which fiord have appeared near Kwacowlin Bay. Within the life-time of the father of an informant, a chief set out with some friends from Kwacowlin, bound for Dean. They travelled overland to Kwacowlin Bay, thence by canoe, making the journey without incident. When returning, they decided to gather clams on the rocky point of the bay. As the craft drew around the tip of the promontory, they saw a fiord gathering shellfish. The paddlers backed their canoe behind some rocks whence they could watch without being seen. The creature acted as if frightened; it kept looking backwards, then hurriedly scraped up some clams with its tongues, dashed off with these into the forest, and came back for more. The chief decided to attack the animal. A frontal approach was impossible owing to lack of cover, so he landed and crept stealthily through the forest, armed with his Hudson's Bay Company's musket. Presently he stumbled upon a heap of clams which the animal had collected. He waited until it returned with another load, then raised his musket and fired. Instead of killing the hoja, its supernatural power was so great that the hunter's musket burst in his hands, though he himself was not injured. The hoja shrieked and whistled as if in anger, and at once hordes of its mates came dashing out through the forest. The frightened chief rushed out on the beach and called to his comrades to save him. They brought his canoe close to the shore so that he could clamber aboard, and then paddled away northward.

The Bella Coola believe the hoja, unlike most supernatural animals, have not abandoned the country since the coming of the white man. One man was most insistent that they still lived on King Island, and promised to point one out if a visit was made to that spot. This man refused to camp at the place where, he affirmed, hoja are common. Another informant stated that though he had never seen one of the monsters, a bride of them surrounded his camp near Canoe Crossing for a week. Every night he heard them roaring and beating on trees and branches. A curious blending of old and new beliefs was recorded in connection with this statement. This man remarked that he was once paddling forward when he heard the creatures closing in upon him. His head swam with terror, until he remembered that he was a Christian; he called on Jesus to help him, grasped his oar, and dashed towards the place from which the hideous sounds were coming. He heard the animals moving off all round him, but failed to see any of them.

Sasq have been heard as recently as 1924 according to popular belief. In January of that year a number of young Bella Coola were returning home in a motor-boat from Ocean Falls. They camped for the night on Burke Channel, and were alarmed to hear a crashing of bushes and a beating on tree-trunks. Thoroughly frightened, they directed the beams of several electric torches in the direction of the sounds without avail and at last started the engine of their motor-boat, the noise of which frightened the Sasq away. 539 776

An animal somewhat similar to the Sasq is the Alikwi. The Bella Coola state that long, long ago, there lived no human beings near Port John on Evans Arm, King Island. They were a strange people, with peculiar rites including the worship of fire. Their neighbours, the Bella Bella, from whom they differed entirely, determined to destroy the Alikwi. A massacre took place, and only a few survivors escaped to an island in one of the lakes in the interior of King Island. There, in course of generations, they grew hairy and lost their human characteristics; it is said that a few paintings made by them are still visible there. Not many years ago some Bella Coola saw what may have been the last surviving Alikwi. Two hairy creatures were observed fishing from a skin boat on Burke Channel. As soon as they realized that they were observed they dashed ashore, broke up the framework of their canoe, and plunged into the forest carrying its skin covering. Nothing more seems to be known concerning them, nor do they appear ever to have granted supernatural assistance to anyone. 776 629

Another supernatural creature is the Sikwi. It somewhat resembles a cow, although its legs are shorter and its body, which is white and hairless, is heavier. In spite of its awkward build, this animal can move so rapidly as to catch birds and animals with its tongue, which can be shot forth to a considerable length. Various incidents are related concerning Sikwi. One of its characteristics is that it causes pain. The country where one lives is invariably denuded of underbrush and even pebbles; everything movable is blown away, leaving only some 776 and gaping holes in the earth. In such regions no fire can be lit. The last known area of this kind is up the river behind Green Bay, about four miles from the sea. So far as could be learnt, Sókoll have never assisted Bella Coola in any way nor played any part in the social life of the community. They are feared on account of their supernatural power, but appear so seldom that they are practically disregarded.

More common than the last, and accordingly more important, is the Sankas. It is an enormous bird with bony wings and long, flexible beak. As it flies, the wings creak violently, and its note, an oft repeated "Hen, hen, hen," can be heard for miles. These birds are said to have been numerous in former years, and are well known to all Bella Coola. Masked figures representing them are often used as Sacred dances. The Sankas is feared for its practice of inserting its long beak into the rectum of anyone sleeping carelessly in the forest and drawing forth his entrails. This can be prevented by sounding upright a staff, such as all hunters carry, before going to sleep.

A popular story states that once, not many years ago, a number of men camped on the edge of a canyon near their home, without taking this precaution. One of them was awakened by a slight movement of one of his companions and, looking up, he saw the long neck and head of a Sankas projecting over the rim of the canyon and reaching for persons's entrails. The convulsive shiver of the sleeper just had awakened him. With his bow he shot an arrow into the bird's neck, causing it to disappear over the brink. Presently the long beak reappeared and he discharged another arrow with the same result. Again and again this happened until the attack ceased to down. The hunter assumed that a single bird had been repeatedly attacking, but when he looked over the edge of the cliff, he saw below a number of carcasses, each with an arrow in its throat. The canyon must have been a meeting place for the birds. His companions seemed still asleep, but when he investigated he found that all were dead; only the slightly enlarged arrow showed how they had been killed.

No Sankas has been seen within recent years, but one informant and her husband heard them on the south side of the Bella Coola River about two miles from the sea. They would have been frightened at any time but rightfull increased their fears. Their dogs heard the sound and howled in dread. The women drew on their fur several soiled blankets, but only pair of them, and some dry salmon, which all supernatural beings either. Then she and her husband fled home, waving incense to and fro and firing muskets them in all directions. The birds did not follow them, but they considered themselves fortunate to reach Bella Coola unmolested.

The beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the supernatural animals just described are fairly exact; they know their appearance, what to expect, and what to do if one is encountered. In addition to these, they assume the existence of numbers of indefinite form which they term ooqa. Any supernatural creature, a kikooli for example, is spoken of as a ooqa in general, not specific, classification. Consequently, when one Bella Coola may describe as a ooqa is given a distinctive name by someone else with wider knowledge. So far as could be learned, there is no designation other than ooqa for creatures which move from the ocean to hyail to chase the way for salmon, and spend the summer in the lakes of the interior, or beneath the ice of glaciers. They can assume various forms, sometimes even human, though they usually appear as giant, hairless, bear-like creatures with short legs and brown skin. Their eyes are large, round, and glass-like. In whatever form these creatures may appear, they are almost certain to bring disaster to the beholder. One of the haunts of ooqa is beneath the glacier on Mount Ogmore, behind the small mountain which rises behind Ocean, on the south side of the Bella Coola River about half a mile from the sea. It is said that only a few years ago a white man, having heard of these creatures, went to that place with a number of Bella Coola. All the latter were able to hear the roaring of the beasts, louder than the whistle of a steamer, but the white man seemed deaf to it, though the power of the ooqa had affected him, for he died on the way back to the village.

Other ooqa are said to live near Kimsquit. The father of a woman now in middle age is said to have gutted a white man in the open. Through a telescope he saw an enormous animal, and passed the movement to a Kwagiutl Indian in the party. He, too, saw it, but the effect was so powerful that he soon died. Theoretically, a man may receive supernatural aid from one of these monsters, but practically they are regarded as entirely evil and to be avoided.

The creature to which the term sisiutl is most often applied is one that lives in lakes. It has a huge mouth and can walk with incredible force. More specifically, this animal is covered a sisiutl. One is said to have lived not long ago on Nuxalk Bay, about six miles from Bella Coola, and a small one is said to be living even now in Owen Lake. The Bella Coola tell a number of stories concerning the sisiutl; the following is a typical account, and others will be given with folk-tales in a later chapter.

Within the life-time of an informant, two months, a chief's son and a great man's son, went to swim in one of the small lakes near Owen Lake. The chief's son who was really lazy, came out, meeting a large fish, leaving his companion on the shore. When the latter saw on the point of diving in he heard a dreadful rushing noise, combined with an enormous crashing. He called to the swimmer asking him if he, too, heard it.

"Yes," came the answer, "this is a sisiutl," and the youth was almost his prey.

At the same place he put his foot on the back of one. "Come back, come back, there is something bad there that we do not understand."

He dived in the water again, screaming "Oh! There is nothing wrong."

The water boiled, sticks and stones were rushed from the bank and fell not towards the center of the lake. The sisiutl eventually gave up, gave that the youth on land was forced to shoot a two-headed with his arrow, while the lake flattened out towards the lake, the sisiutl to a strong wind. The wind on the water was so terrible that he was almost forced to relinquish his grip before the sisiutl subsided. When he looked at the lake the sisiutl had vanished.

The survivor returned to the village and reported what had happened. No one believed his story, however, he was made a prisoner, accused of having killed the chief's son. For a week the people questioned him daily without being able to shake his story, then they resolved to "Come with me," he said to the fellow-villagers when it was ready.

They waited on the shore while he swam out into the lake saying. Presently the swelling and sinking sound was heard, and now the spectators were forced to clench one-hands to keep themselves from being drawn into the lake, while their legs were taken out horizontally as the pull here on the previous occasion. When the wind subsided the swimmer had vanished.

He had been sucked into the stomach of a gigantic sucker-ring which [illegible]. Groping around, he found the orifice of the shell's suction which he cut the left and put it on himself. Then he made his way to the neck of the monster, not a little thought to, and dived out. The suckers were so far up that he lost in the lake great when he became above it. He swam ashore and the evidence of the left sucker's his story. The circular of the gigantic found to the surface are long forwards.

In addition to the anthropomorphic beings already described as existing beneath the surface of the ocean, spectacular animal monsters also dwell there. One of the worst dreaded is the Kaiwa, which rock wooden objects down to the bottom of the sea. It resembles pitch, and when once it comes in contact with a canoe, it cannot be removed. The idle Gods possess supernatural power in the octopus also, but increasing the dread with which the animal would be regarded in any case. They believe that it is kind of giant [illegible] [illegible] to have to obtain it. It is said that the gas in some resident, but remains to a such within the creature's stomach. mined and carried to the shore. He had thought that it would be easy to free himself, but he found it impossible and was carried under the sea. He hit frantically at the enfolding arms, until he succeeded in freeing his own, with which he pushed up the beak of the octopus, thus killing it. He rose to the surface and returned home more the worse.

The Bella Coola do not profess to know all the animals of the world; and if they see a strange one, they assume it to be one known to their ancestors though unfamiliar to them. Since any unknown animal is considered to have supernatural power, due care must be exercised when one is seen. The following incident illustrates this point.

The mother's brother of an informant worked for some thirty years for a white man in Victoria. His employer once sent him to see a turtle which was confined in a pool in a basement preparatory to being killed for a banquet. As soon as he saw it, he said:

"My parents in Bella Coola told me of such a creature."

A few days before Christmas the turtle was cut up and displayed on four platters in the window of the store; the Bella Coola saw it, and then learned that it had been killed. The same night a sore appeared on his wrist, and by the next day it was large and running. He said to his employer:

"In a few days I will be dead. Do not grieve for me. The sight of such supernatural creatures is too powerful for Indians; I survived one experience, but never has been too much for me and I will die."

His employer wisely sent him to a white doctor who cured him, although the man remained. Years later the man returned to Bella Coola where he displayed the mark as proof of his story. A few weeks later he died, and the Bella Coola are firmly convinced that his death was due to his having seen the turtle many years before.

Although the forests of British Columbia abound with supernatural animals of enormous power, the attitude of the Bella Coola hunter who penetrates into lonely places is not one of constant fear. It is true that he may meet danger at any turn, but danger is part and parcel of human life, and he is by no means defenseless. He dreads the powers possessed by creatures of another place, but they for their part dread certain human objects. Clothing which has been worn for so long that it has become steeped with the emanations of its human weaver belongs to a sphere differing from that of supernatural animals and is dangerous to them. Consequently, if worn clothing be thrown on a fire it repels unpleasant visitors. Other powerful protections are false bolsters, and smoked salmon roe. A wise hunter always carries these and if he sees a dangerous creature such as a yong he throws the two together and spits them towards the peril. Needless to say, if a kindly animal is seen, the hunter does not drive it away by these methods. Why false bolsters should be so effective is a matter of wonder to the Bella Coola themselves, for as a rule it is the human manner attached to objects which gives them their strength over the supernatural. Thus the most powerful of all charms are pads that have been used by women during their menses. If a woman crawls on the snow she is careful to carry some of them with her ready to repel any danger from the supernatural water beings.*

The manner in which the Bella Coola regard mythical animals and other evidences of the supernatural is illustrated by the following practice. Hunters always seem to know the direction of the wind, and when the breeze is too slight to be discernible they blow upwards a small amount of eagle down, which is so light that the faintest breath of air will bear it down wind. What the logical white man considers a natural phenomenon, appears to the Bella Coola as miraculous; eagle down, stripped from the dead bird by human hands and stored for some time within a house, has become so humanized that it can compare supernatural powers to indicate the direction of the wind.

The mythical monsters already described are not the only animals regarded as supernatural by the Bella Coola. They believe that in the beginning Alquntam created men and beasts at the same time and in the same place, giving the former the greater share of power, but not ranking the latter as a different place of existence. In these early days, the semi-supernatural

* Other matter will be described more fully in connection with Magic, see vol. 2, chap. xx.

* 776 825 [773] forefathers of the Bella Coola had the ability to talk with animals and birds. The men of today, who realize that such intercourse is not now possible, assume that they have degenerated from the golden age of their first ancestors. On the other hand, they are no more to believe that beasts have undergone a similar change, and take it for granted that they have continued in the supernatural, or semi-supernatural state in which they were created by Hamatsa. It is true that man is stronger than most animals, but that does not affect the attitude with which the latter are regarded, for supernatural and powerful are not synonymous terms. Hamatsa decreed that they should serve as food for mankind, and they have since obeyed his command, but the Bella Coola do not consider themselves undisputed lords of creation. They fear snaq, sisnaq and other creatures of great power, but they know how to avoid them; similarly, deer and mountain goats fear man, but they are not entirely defenceless, because their speed and agility give them advantages corresponding to those of man in contact with beasts stronger than themselves. All living creatures use the weapons with which they are equipped. For example, when a mountain goat eludes a hunter by scaling a precipice too steep for its pursuer, the latter considers it has escaped through supernatural climbing ability, whereas the goat has merely used the power granted by Hamatsa. Likewise, when a snaq or a sisnaq is overcome by the use of soiled clothing or smoked salmon roe, the means, unusual to us, are natural to the human being employing them. Man and animals alike regard each other's weapons as supernatural.

[719] In consequence of these beliefs, the attitude of the Bella Coola towards animals is fundamentally different from that of white men. They regard them as possessing human sensibility, and even the ability to assume human form if they so desire. In fact, they believe that animals merely appear to them in the shape of beasts, but can change to human, or other form and behave accordingly whenever they wish to do so. The degeneration of mankind has made it impossible for men to see these transformed beings habitually, but even now, [776] or at any rate until a few years ago, shamans were able to lift [825] the intervening veil. From accounts given by those who have had such experience, the Bella Coola believe that Alpaxwim [756] gave to birds and animals, as well as to humans, the boon of [773] fire, and it is only the unworthiness of men that makes them unable to see the smoke rising from the houses of different creatures. In former times, fortunate hunters were able to do so, and consequently had phenomenal success. The smoke that ascends from the fires of different animals corresponds in colour to that of its owner; a mountain goat's is white, a beaver's, black, a squirrel's, red, a wolf's, grey, and so on.

NEA Bellacoola NEA

When a goat cramps the earth on a mountain, it rings hollow, [823] so indeed it is to those animals, for their home is within; and when a hunter loses his quarry entirely, it is because the latter has entered its house. Shamans are sometimes able to hear [756] the gatherings of animals under the peaks. Like human beings, they dance to the accompaniment of music, and in all respects behave like them. They have their times of joy and sorrow, of success and failure. When ill they are cured by their own shamans, grizzly bear, ceeup, and wolverine; these three also dance to welcome the dead. All animals and birds are like brothers, able to converse with each other and living harmoniously together in that other part of their life which only shamans have seen. Porcupine is the oldest, and a hunter [224] always tries to kill one before passing to more important prey.
The animals know about the actions of human beings and [784] show their aversion to certain habits by refusing to allow themselves to be seen by anyone practising them. For example, they do not like people to drink water in which dog salmon have been soaked, and no hunter would dream of partaking of [224] that food. Bella Coola mythology is full of accounts of human beings who, with supernatural aid, were able to penetrate to [773] the homes of animals. Tales of this type would be unintelli- [538] gible without understanding the attitude of the people to the animal and bird kingdoms.

Fish, too, are regarded in the same light. Indeed, there is a particularly close affinity between men and salmon, for twins are born through the instrumentality of the latter. Just how this occurs no Bella Coola knows, but a twin and salmon are regarded almost as brothers. In days when men were more powerful than now, a twin was especially liked by animals. Through his connection with salmon, a ke'le (the term applied to a twin associated with a salmon) could understand the speech of birds, animals, and fish. In many instances he could also assume salmon form at will.

In view of beliefs of this kind it is not surprising that the Bella Coola attribute great powers even to beasts well known to them. In the story recorded in vol. I, p. 55, the War-Party of the Tides was summoned by the speaking of a dog. A belief persists that danger is always present when a dog acts in an unusual way, though this can be avoided by killing it at once. In July, 1922, a visit was made to an elderly Bella Coola early one morning. The man was in a state of absolute terror. The preceding night he had locked his pet dog outside his house to give warning if anyone approached, but when he awoke in the morning, it was curled up asleep as usual at the foot of his bed. There was no possible hole through which it could have entered, so it seemed to the owner that his dog must have transformed itself into some minute animal and made its way beneath the door. The only other explanation was that its master, hearing in his sleep the whimpering of his pet, had got out of bed to let it in, without remembering that he had done so. To the writer this seemed the probable explanation, especially when the old man admitted that he had been in the habit of walking in his sleep in his younger days, but the Bella Coola was not satisfied. He could not decide whether or not to kill the dog, a great favourite, but finally decided not to do so. The incident was mentioned to another informant, who was greatly worried and assumed it to be an omen of death to the dog's master. His only comfort lay in the fact that the animal had not spoken, a sure intimation of insanity and death unless it is killed immediately. 776* 787

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

A few years ago a dog gave warning to its master by placing its paws on his shoulders as he sat on the ground, and howling over his head. Such unusual behaviour should have convinced him of the necessity of killing his pet to avert some calamity, but he paid no attention to it. A few days later, it seemed to him that he saw the face of a friend appear at an uncurtained upper window where no human being could be. The next morning he found an axe, which he had long lost and supposed stolen, imbedded far up in a tree near his house. These three incidents all presaged disaster, and a few days later he shot and killed himself when crazed by drink. 825 [962]

The actions of wild animals are considered even more important. Not many years ago a famous Kimsquit hunter saw a bear and attempted to shoot it. He raised his musket and took careful aim, but was prevented from pulling the trigger. This should have warned him of the potency of the animal, and of the wisdom of avoiding the spot in future. The bear moved away without molesting him, but exactly one year later he was killed by a mountain goat at precisely the same place. No one knows which supernatural being had chosen to assume two forms in that locality.

The Bella Coola believe that animals, being supernatural, have powers and abilities which they conceal from the white man. Wolves do not kill their prey with their fangs, but with bird arrows which shamans alone can see; beaver do not cut with their teeth, but with crook-handled adzes. Even more striking is the virility of yearling mountain goats. An old Bella Coola described how he and another man were once hunting goats. His partner killed a fat yearling, which they laid on its back and skinned. The killer was about to dismember it, when the animal began to kick. First it shook one hind leg, then the other, then in succession each fore-leg, and lastly its head. Then the goat stood up and gave itself a shake, which caused the skin to return to its proper position, 776* 825

* 996 and leaps away apparently uninjured. The Bella Coola say 825 that yearling goats have very strong spirits (I, p. 29) which [774] make possible such actions.

Though generally callous with regard to the sufferings of animals, the Bella Coola are usually careful not to kill more than they need; and knowledge of the supernatural power [224] possessed by animals sometimes leads men to treat them with [226] great consideration. For example, if a bull-head is caught in an elachan net in the river, the fisherman throws it back into the water, saying:

"I have saved you; please do the same for me."

The following incident, believed without question by the Bella Coola, shows the manner in which bull-heads help those who have often befriended them. About 1880 a Kimsquit fisherman, Mukkin-i, fell into a rapids where he was in great danger of drowning. A bull-head, seeing his plight and mindful of former help, increased his size and showed Mukkin-i ashore with its nose.

"I have saved you, normal," said the bull-head, as he did so.

The ability to increase in size is not restricted to fish, but is shared by small mammals and reptiles. Lizards, for instance, four feet in length, are said to live permanently in a pond about seven miles below Kimsquit; they are normal people.

Toads, too, are old normals. If a man see a snake devouring one of them he will, if he is wise, kill the snake and say to the toad:

"Please help me when I am in difficulties."

A toad never forgets its obligations and if that man should fall into a river when the toad is near, the latter will grow large enough to drag him forth.

534 Snakes are regarded with aversion and disgust. This may
* 996 be in part due to the belief that they cook for Mlle-ialal
825 (I, p. 43), but more because these reptiles enter the stomachs 955 of human beings. The Bella Coola believe that snakes are the [955] offspring of a supernatural Mother of Snakes, a mythical being of dread powers. The following story illustrates their beliefs concerning the danger of over approach to this creature.

Earlier was a man of mixed lineage, Kinnapit and Bay, was Nuerter. With several companions he was gathering herbs when he stepped into a hole and his numerous tiny centaurs crawling over his legs. Looking down, he saw that they were small snakes, that had just been hatched from a Shelter of Sodom. He fled, terrified, pursued by the reptiles, which he managed to keep off in some sense by breathing behind him a breath of spicy sweet geraniums, a known deterrent. When he had succeeded the snakes he called his companions, told them of his adventure, and returned home. There he repeated the tale. Though Earlier did not know it, some of the snakes had succeeded in crossing his stomach. Presently he began to swell, his body became larger and larger until he was in danger of bursting. The reptiles within were breeding rapidly. Luckily, one of his fellow villagers knew the proper remedy. A raised hut was made for the sufferer about five feet from the ground where Earlier stretched himself on a number of thorny branches, while his friends built a fire of devil's dirt and sweet geraniums over which he was hung head to the smoke. Then, to give greater privacy, they cast on the flames soiled clothing and poured [illegible] which Earlier drank. This killed the snakes. The patient began to vomit, emitting a mass of struggling serpents, and at once began to grow thinner, soon regaining his normal condition. Had he not been able to spare the reptiles, he would have died.

Earlier was not the only one to have this unpleasant experience. Many others have suffered in the same way, but in no case has anyone been able to feel the snakes or the actual place or cause of entry.

The beliefs of the Bulla Caste concerning the power possessed by animals are clearly shown by their attitude with regard to killing them. Man is immortal, so are animals. Apuntim decreed that bears and birds should serve as food for mankind, but it is only their clothing, their worthless "blanket of flesh," as the Bulla Caste express it, which they give to humans. In the autumn bears appear to die, but every spring they are reborn. Similarly, when an animal is slain, it merely discards its mortal self while its spirit[9] ascends [9] [illegible], see vol. 1, p. 96.

[illegible] to the land above whence, in course of time, it comes down to earth again to reanimate a new body.[illegible] Consequently, the [illegible] of a hunter does not indicate his mastery over an animal as much as the latter's good will in allowing itself to be slain by one who has planned him by ceremonial chastity (1, p. [illegible]), or by one who has been endowed with skill by some other supernatural being. Men are accordingly careful to obey the wishes of their quarry. Long ago, a mountain goat told a shaman that he and his friends liked men, so a hunter who has killed one always smears two lands of white arrows to face from the right eye to the left side of the mouth. Another shaman was told by a bear never to use unfeathered arrows since those of his fellows killed with such would return. Phases of other birds have since been used, preferably those of mallard ducks. Sometimes the wishes of an animal require considerable ritual. For example, when a bear is killed, the carcass is stretched upon newly arranged evergreen boughs and dressed. The hunter removes the pelt so that the red bear rests the earth, with the whole hanging loosely over the body. He puts it four times, as if pressing the skin back into place, and says:

'Please don't linger. Go home and return,' or,

'Please come to me tomorrow. Tell your brothers, your sisters, your uncles, your aunts and your other relatives to come to me.'

Should this be omitted, the animal is likely to stand up, shiver, shake itself, causing the pelt to return to its place, and run away. Trapping mountain goats are especially prone to do this, as already mentioned. Even if an animal does not show its displeasure by escaping in this way, it often refuses to return to earth unless the proper rites have been performed over its carcass.

Bears have another aversion: they do not like to be eaten by men. So the hunter leaves the skinned body for nothing and angles where he invites us devour it. In an hiding he does not address them by their usual names, but calls them, [illegible] animals, "The Devourer of Men Which He Does Not Kill," that is, "The Biting Scavenger"; and Eagle, [illegible] animal, "The Common Eater," that is, "The One Who Eats before He Is Hungry." Then morning the Bull has been devoured and the Scarab believes the gods have come to Heliopolis and birds, being [illegible], can have the souls of animals and read their thoughts. The significance of these spellings is that animals have the power to conceal themselves, so a human must pale that Seven before he can hope to conceal. Belief in the efficacy of such incantations as these is equally telling into Heaven and have meant to more often cases, but that doubt is carefully placed in an overgrown tree near which the animal is slain, so that it may come back to life.

Fish, Shrimps, are immortal. In summer the canals are choked with dead and dying salmon, but the Bulls Eagle knows that they are not really dead, they have merely shed their mortal bodies in accordance with Hypostasis's decree. In that season of the year he causes the river to rise so that they will sweep away their bodies and survivors double.

Although the salmon, from the trickleness of their bones, often human beings to feed on their bodies, yet they have survived. Dies and shallow which are carefully observed. From the time the first spring salmon appear (I. ps. 194-195) until the rising of the Bull moon, women are not allowed to wet their or to go near the river. When men see the Bull, but instead of throwing the bones to dogs, they carefully return them to the river saying:

"Whom water hath nourished."

If this is inconvenient, bones can be thrown into the moats with impunity.

Salmon, the sun and animals live in heaven (the salmon is their home for beneath the surface of the water. They hold and desire earthly objects, especially powerful water-bulls (see Hypostasis 5) to use as sponges for their children, as the Bulls [illegible] of it [illegible] on the [illegible].

Cuala then grieve of it and sight down on the water.

Before leaving the subject of supernatural animals, a word must be said concerning the animals of the Bella Coola to those forms their first ancestors came to earth. If, for example, a man's first ancestor descended as a raven, this inventiblg is a valuable possession of himself and his family. Indeed, in most venerated possessions of a Bella Coola are not the material objects collected by him through life, but the intangible rights wrapped up in his ancestral history. These are referred to under four names:

(1) Nutsem, "Preserved Story"; the myth describing the coming to earth of a man's first ancestors in the beginning of time.

(2) Gnalu, "What Was Sent Down"; the names and other possessions given by Alquntlm to a man's first ancestors in the beginning of time.

(3) Tamalt, "Whence We Came"; the place to which a man's first ancestors came in the beginning of time, and the one from which they have since spread.

(4) Snalkum.

Native constructs are recorded in vol. I, chap. vi, and the second and third terms are really part of the first, although to the Bella Coola they are psychologically distinct. Snalkum is the word used for both the birds or animals chosen as totems in the first section, and also for creatures with which the well-people came in contact. The nearest transparent equivalent is, "Crest." When a Bella Coola whose first ancestor came to earth as a raven perceives that bird, it serves as a visible mark of his intangible possession. In former days, if a man carved an image so that his work and his name would come to forgetness, it was a snalkum, a constant reminder of his previous to generations than others. A snalkum, therefore, combines the concept of ancestral with that of crest, so that Bella Coola speak of the white man's ancestrals as snalkum. In brief, a man regards the form assumed by his ancestor when coming to this earth as an emblem of the ancient history and fame of his family. It is a matter connected with the past, a matter of the mind, a source of pride to him to have such a possession, but a matter that does not affect his daily life.

So far as could be learned, the Bella Coola totem consists of the following birds and animals: raven, bald eagle, grizzly bear, black bear, wolf, whale, blackfish, sturgeon, bear, alderwit, possibly deer, and the mythical double-headed snake, serpent. To these must be added the sun, because some of the original people came to earth in human form by sliding down his sun-beams, and salmon, the years which ascended from earth to the land above, down which a number of the first ancestors of mankind descended to human form.
The Bella Coola believe that these years are particularly common numerals among the tribes of the same name. According to some accounts it was these years which supported the first sky until it fell.

A crest is connected almost exclusively with the dances pays no attention to the crests of the present time. The matter was approached from every possible angle and not the slightest sign of respect toward living specimens of a man's crest could be noticed. A query as to whether or not a man refrained from eating his crest was regarded as highly humorous. Nor is there any trace of friendship between men hold families even if they happen to have the same crest. The subject was broached repeatedly, until at last one informant smiled broadly and said:

"I know now what you want to find out, I can tell you all about it."

He remarked how the Kitlacla are, in his opinion, stupid enough to regard as brothers all those who have the same crest even if they are members of different tribes. He said that when he was a young man at Victoria, where Indians from all parts of the coast used to meet, a Kitlacla had once asked him what was his crest. He was puzzled, but as the [illegible] (socially), that a man given to resemble the ancestral shade. If, for example, one man's to the right, the left eyes white only, whereas that of another with eyes over long preserve its blackness. Where dolmen is the sun as a signal for attack, or a whistle imitating the cry of the leader's bird or animal. Finally, when a man whose eyes is the seven hours one of these birds calling, he cries out:

"Hide, gentlemen (the receive fans), it is as you say."

This custom is probably due to a belief in the ability of eyes to fear eyes.

On the whole the attitude of the Bella Coola towards living examples of their ancestors does not differ from that of straight eyes and superiority with which they regard other birds and animals.

THE SOUL

The beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning Souls differ so fundamentally from those regarding other birds and animals, that the subject must be treated separately. In the beginning of time, when Hyamlis sent down the ancestors of the Bella Coola to this earth, he dispatched Souls to be their guide and teacher. For this purpose Souls was given greater power than that granted to any other animal. He came to earth in seven forms, then changed to a man, but he dwelt not thus back to the land above as did those of the other forerunners. So, even, it remained to the world before where he could remain to an end. Hyamlis had instructed him to travel to all parts of the world, meaning the coast of British Columbia, in order to study the ways and wants of the inhabitants and bring back to Bella Coola those which seemed desirable. On these occasions he used to assume seven forms and go off to his canoe, Tsilaxtl, which travelled without visible motive power at phenomenal speed. Owing to the power that Hyamlis had given him, he could talk to the trees and the mountains, the birds, the animals, and the insects, as well as to the human beings he encountered on the coast.

[illegible]

Raven, perhaps made conscious by this power, did not always use it for good purposes. He learnt many new inventions which he taught to the Bella Coola, but sometimes he indulged in adventures of an obscene nature. In fact he was often an "ass-ass." The Bella Coola relate many tales concerning his exploits. These are all more stories, such as can be told by anyone, and they fall into two classes. The complete humorous narrative, describing how Raven tried to drive off a certain other bird and animals, and his consequent discomfiture. These belong to the cycle of mythology and are recorded in vol. II, chap. v. In addition, there are stories describing his inventions and how obtained by Raven. These are given in detail here as the only satisfactory means of illustrating the attitude of the Bella Coola towards Raven.

The two Ravens, to whom Alqunta granted such power, is not regarded as a bird, but essentially as a supernatural, with the usually characteristics of a human being, and the weakness of a conceited individual who is always trying to display his powers. The ordinary word used for a raven is qaus, but the two Ravens is properly referred to by the titles as Alqunta, Yemaklis, Sisemaklis, "The Light-Bringer"; Kitkatsa, "The Wise One"; Yerwaklaxmen, "The Widower"; Sqamaxen-ulkilt-ayas, "The Unknown-of-age"; the usually used Qa, and Qaus. The Bella Coola do not explain what happened to this two Yemaklis, he appears to have dropped out of existence, and his power has not been transferred to the descendants, the raven of today. They are regarded as birds, with but the slightest trace of their ancestor's greatness. The Bella Coola know of the beliefs of the Kitkatla concerning Raven, and say that in the world he is considered only a bird but that the supreme deity himself. But in Bella Coola the exploits of Raven are always considered to be due to the power given him by Alqunta, whose servant he may, although he indulged in abuse his own position by exercising his mother-

The most spectacular of Raven's exploits was the theft of the sun to enable us to provide light for the world (1, p. 198). In this case, a valuable object was required for mankind, but often Raven involved with the daily lives of Haanaw, a point illustrated in the following account of the origin of death.[1]

Where the whole dread he was doomed. Where people on the floor watched the struggle. Then Hyacinthe dispatched another [illegible], Pumpernickel, "He Who Carries One," who is able to carry one of anything. Pumpernickel Gloriette grasped the whole with his claws and succeeded in raising it slightly before his wings stuck to the gum and he, too, fell back and was doomed. Then Hyacinthe sent down Pumpernickel, "He Who Carries Three," the [illegible] able to lift three of anything. Pumpernickel grasped the whole as his predecessors had done, and lifted it about ten feet in the air before his wings became stuck like those of the others, and he, too, fell back and was doomed. Hyacinthe, much worried, called to him Pumpernickel, "He Who Carries Four," the [illegible] able to carry four of anything, and dispatched him after telling him how the three brothers had been overcome in their efforts to carry the monster away. Pumpernickel swooped down with a powerful rush, grasped the whole firmly on the back of its neck, and carried it far aloft into the sky. Unfortunately the gum interfered with his wing-beats, they became more rapid and strained, until finally he began to fall, still struggling. All the while his wings were being more and more hampered, till finally he, too, was powerless, and with a resounding splash fell with the whole into the water where he, likewise, was drowned. When no more [illegible] appeared, the followers inside guided the wounds back to the beach, where he exhibited his prey to the spectators. The story does not record how he was able to disengage them from the gum and take them, too, the whole. All the people were amazed at the deed [illegible], for their large heavy wings resembled nothing ever seen before.

Karen was not satisfied with his success, however, though he had slain the [illegible], he had not rescued Fraulein. He went to his home still weeping at the loss of his bride. Hyacinthe and Fraulein had seen Karen's success, and the former sent the boy back. When Fraulein neared the house he said to Karen:

"Don't cry. There I am. I am your girl and have returned."

Karen looked at the speaker and replied: "No. You are not my one. He had beautiful flowing locks."

Fraulein had indeed appeared without any hair on her head, but he explained the loss by saying:

"Dear I am your own, Fraulein. I have been up to Pluvia's where there was such a gale that my hair was blown away."

Raven, blinded by his grief, did not believe him, and responded angrily:

"Why, reason not my son. What do you be to me? Go out of this house."

Disgusted at this response, Crocodile departed. Just as he was passing through the doorway, Raven noticed the cotton matter on his lips and realized that, in spite of the change in his appearance, his father was really his son. He called on him to return, but Crocodile paid no attention to his father's entreaties and went his way. Raven's grief was beyond expression, but he could do nothing to repair the damage he had done. It is said we have to Raven's amazed, all secrets would return to life two days after death.

The above myth is widely known among the Bella Coola, and is supposed to be historically accurate. At the same time, few people allow it to influence their thoughts with regard to death or its causes. It is a fact, but one that belongs to the realm of ancient history rather than to everyday experience. When a Bella Coola dies, his relatives, though they know that his death is due to the folly of Raven, mildly reproach him, and do not feel literally towards Raven. Bella Coola beliefs and theology are not systematized, hence it is quite possible for a person to realize a certain fact, such as the cause of death, and yet disregard it entirely. Considering that absolute contradictions can be believed simultaneously, it is not difficult to picture the mental attitude of people who believe, and at the same time disregard their belief.

One of Raven's speculations, and at the same time, hypothetical exploits was the bringing of salmon salmon to the Bella Coola River.[1]

In the beginning of time, no salmon salmon inhabited the rivers, and Raven determined to supply them. Over the river making wooden fish and throwing them into the water, he thought he could scatter them. Any always that after jumping a few times. The reason for the failure, though he did not know it, was because he had carried the small bone a friend. Raven determined to supply this water for the benefit of the Kimsquit people. Accordingly he used a natural stone depression near the village as his chamber-pot, and the liquid collected here clearly. Ever since, any liquid, ordinarily waste, placed in that depression acts as a collector. The place is called Bellhamin, "Where People Go," and it has been used as a retreat by the Kimsquit people and their guests for many generations. In this way, the renown of Raven spread to foreigners visiting Kimsquit. Another survival of this construction is the name Nuquiddi-a, "Chamber-Pot," commonly applied as a nickname to the small daughters of Kimsquit chiefs.

[1] This is an example of conflicting beliefs. In addition to assuming the whole salmon salmon bone to Raven, a certain fish to salmon, and the Raven number then in the beginning of time, the Bella Coola also believe that the salmon salmon was sent to Alexander Mackenzie.

One of Raven's inventions was the making of north-flow clachan nets, as are which he taught spiders as well as men. In the beginning of time, Raven told two men to make a net according to a pattern which he showed them, and gave them some flax. It was not sufficient, and when the workers asked for more, Raven told them to draw it from their own intestines. This they did, and ever since spiders have had the same ability. Another story describes how Raven saw a clachan net being made in one of the distant villages which he visited during his travels, learnt the details of its manufacture, and taught the Bella Coola on his return home.

Many of Raven's exploits are well known, although not embedded in elaborate myths. For example, it is believed that in the beginning of time the ocean was to the east of Bella Coola and the land to the west. Drownings were frequent, as Raven altered the relative positions of land and sea. Most ocean dwellers followed the sea to its new home, but a number of animals remained near their human friends. They are still to be found in the upper valley of Bella Coola River. These shell-fish, which are probably freshwater mussels, are said to be identical with those of the ocean, and are called by the same name. This is always mentioned as proof of the former presence of salt water in the upper Bella Coola valley. The occurrence of the shell-fish may be the origin of this theory. It might also be mentioned that the Bella Coola believe that a few years

> In the beginning of time, the organs of women were on the forehead, those of men on the palm of the hand, and intercourse was effected by a man rubbing his hand across a woman's brow. Raven found that children would not result from this practice and accordingly altered the organs of both sexes to their present positions. In order to teach mankind the sexual act he then chose a woman and held intercourse with her, telling her that if the practice were carried out secretly and vigorously a child would be born. And one months later the woman gave birth to an infant. Raven told the free inhabitants of the world that he wished them to have more; they consequently held intercourse frequently and began many children until they discovered that the Bella Coola valley.

The attitude of the Bella Coola towards this story is identical with their beliefs concerning Raven as the cause of death.

"Yes," they say, as they repeat the above story in answer to a question, "Raven taught our ancestors how to have children."

[773] [195] One side of their nature implicitly believes any story handed down from the distant past, but few today are sufficiently naïve actually to credit it. The more sophisticated frankly disbelieve, or pretend to do so. Doubts also arise with regard to [129] Raven as originator of linguistic differences. The Bella Coola state that Algonkin intended only one language for the whole world, but Raven thought that this would lead to confusion and used his power to teach the ancestors of every tribe their special speech.

Many inventions and beliefs are attributed to Raven without any accompanying myth. It is said that almost all geographical names are those bestowed by him on places reached in his travels. It was Raven who taught man how to hair [103] [224] hooks on long lines to catch black cod; it was Raven who first instructed people about the significance of death; it was Raven who showed them the use of clings; and it was Raven who constructed artificial caves and lodges to serve as meeting-places for chiefs.

In brief, the Bella Coola regard Raven as an explorer, teacher, and inventor, whose power, obtained from Hamatsa, enabled him to construct and correct his maker, but not to create. Much of his work was for the good of mankind, but much was evil and malicious, an aspect which belongs to mythology. Essentially human, Raven could have been included among anthropomorphic, as well as among zoomorphic beings. He differs from most of the supernatural ones in belonging entirely to the past, as his descendants have none of the first Raven's power. It is doubtful whether he will return, but in any case he has long since ceased to take any interest in the affairs of the Bella Coola, who consider him only as a figure of mythology and ancient history.

SUPERNATURAL BEINGS OF THE THOUGHT AND WORKS [illegible]

Bella Coola beliefs concerning anthropomorphic and zoomorphic beings are relatively clear and exact; their appearance is known, their powers and functions recognized. The supernatural attributes of trees and plants are less definite. Hamatsa created the human in the beginning of time, and they were consequently able to talk and act like human beings at that distant period. Owing to the degeneration of man, mortals are no longer able to converse with trees, although the latter can still understand our remarks. In a vague way, the Bella Coola continue to think of trees as having human personalities, but so little is known of their powers, and they enter so seldom into contact or conflict with mortals, that they are practically ignored.

In an equally vague manner, Nature is regarded as a Mother, giving birth to the trees and plants. One of the Bacha dances portrays this birth of the flowers every spring (E., p. [illegible]).

(II, p. 198). In this way the belief is kept before the eyes of the Bella Coola, but it is not a matter of prime importance in their lives. Rather contradictory is the concept that though each plant lack individual life, there is a supernatural mother of each species, corresponding in general terms to the Mother of Snakes described in the last section. As one informant expressed it:

"If there is no mother, how can a plant grow?"

These mothers are assumed to live beneath the ground. Occasionally, one of them has been discovered. Not many years ago, a number of women were collecting bracken roots when one which had been gathered began to turn into a snake. The women were alarmed and puzzled at this strange phenomenon. As they stood watching, the ground in front of them fell away as if there had been an earthquake, and they realized that the snake-root had been the mother of the plant. Without further fear they cooked and ate it.

Stones, too, and mountains were made by Alquntim; consequently they have supernatural abilities and can understand the words and actions of mortals. When a wise man passes close beneath a precipitous mountain he always says to it:

"Please make yourself firm."

Most mountains, when requested politely, refrain from sliding and killing those passing beneath.

In former days mountains in many cases rose to meet hunters, and sometimes turned completely over. The Bella Coola are not sure whether this was caused by the mountain itself, or by a cmmq within. Wise hunters carry ropes with them when they penetrate into deep valleys, and when they feel the first tipping of a mountain they leap for a convenient tree, grasp it with their legs, heads downwards, and tie themselves in that position. Slowly the mountain rises and turns over, but, if the ropes do not break, the hunters suffer no ill effects. After a varying interval the mountain returns to its normal position. This reversal can be hastened if a man bites his left cheek until the blood flows, takes also a mouthful of his own urine, and spits out the mixture. 776 823

The following instance of this belief was recorded. [789]

A Bella Coola chief and a number of followers were once at Kwatna where they had been gambling for stakes of mountain goat grease. Two of the men had lost their supply, so they went into the mountains between Kwatna and Restoration Bay to replenish it. They saw two goats, killed them, and at once two more appeared in the same place; these they also slew. When a fifth and sixth goat appeared and were likewise dispatched, one of the hunters tried to restrain his comrade, saying that such phenomenal success must be due to supernatural power which they should not abuse. They stopped firing, cut the grease from their quarry, and started on the return journey. Presently the mountain began to tilt upwards before their feet. They had no ropes, and almost in despair concealed themselves in a small rock shelter. Their dogs too felt the movement and barked in terror. Fortunately, the mountain did not rise more than a few feet and soon subsided, so that the men escaped. [525]

The attitude of the Bella Coola to supernatural powers of all kinds may be termed a doctrine of Opportunism. Supernatural beings abound and constantly play a part in the affairs of mortals. An alert and bold man can take advantage of these opportunities and obtain assistance, but he who hesitates is indeed lost. Certain types of assistance are most commonly granted to orphans and other unfortunates; accounts of these belong to the realm of mythology and will be described in a later chapter. On the whole the supernatural ones do not show discrimination in conferring boons, and the man who is quick to take advantage of them is the one to whom success comes. 776 [736]

Supernatural Elements in Human Beings

The Bella Coola believe that in the human body itself there are certain supernatural elements. Neither sticks nor stones can move, because they lack these attributes possessed by men and animals. Considering the firm belief of the Bella Coola in the omnipresence of the supernatural, it is not surprising that they should ascribe the phenomena of health and sickness, 774 974 of thought, of success and failure and of life itself, to powers of another sphere. Their ideas are not clearly crystallized on this subject, but in the following section an attempt has been made to give a fair picture, gleaned from many informants, of the supernatural parts of the human body.

THE SPIRIT

The most important part of the human body is the xamānoḷs, spirit. This is small, but of great power, since it belongs to the world of the supernatural; in fact, the spirit of a man is not mortal, but sisut. Everyone, man or woman, rich or poor, chief or slave, has one; without it, life would be impossible. When a child is born, his parents supply him with food and care, and Alqantām provides the even more necessary invisible elements, including the spirit. It resides in the back of the neck and resembles a thin bone shaped like a maple-leaf. Salmon have similar ones, but with them the bone is visible, [756] whereas only shamans can see it in human beings. The spirit in a new-born infant is weak and powerless, but it increases in strength with the body. If a man prospers in his ventures and has success in life, it is due, not to his own efforts, but to the activity of his spirit. When a man acquires wealth with little [556] labour, he knows that his spirit has been constantly trembling at the back of his neck; when he is unfortunate, that it has [787] become inert or sluggish. It is the cause of dreams, which are desired as means of foretelling the future. Some Bella Coola believe that in sleep it leaves the body and travels, unrestrained by any barrier, to the scene of the dreams; others, that it causes the images to appear. During waking hours the spirit [828] formulates every thought, no matter how trifling. When a man remembers that he left his fire with insufficient fuel and hurries home to rectify the omission, it is this element which has brought the need to his mind; when he thinks of a distant place, his spirit is responsible for the thought and some men even believe that it has travelled there. Sometimes an active one can give warning, as in the following instance. A few years ago a chief, when hunting, sat down to rest. While he 774

sat a slide plunged down the mountain-side and swept away the ground where he would have been if he had not stopped. The Bella Coola know that such a fortunate escape is no accident, as foolish white men believe, but is the result of an active spirit. Sometimes it can convey only symbolic hints of what is to happen. An old Kimsquit man told how his lower eyelids once became sore and his stomach began to heave. This [827] occurs with sobbing, so he knew that ill-fortune was before [787] him and was not surprised at the death of his son. A thoughtful person pays great attention to indications such as these, knowing that his spirit is always striving to pierce the future and obtain information for him, however indefinite. The importance of the supernatural to the Bella Coola can be judged from the fact that they attribute every action and thought to an element of this nature.

Mentality, nil, though caused by the spirit, is somewhat 774 vaguely regarded as a separate entity. It comprises two parts, 828 one constantly urging to good deeds, particularly to activity in ritual matters, the other to evil. No one knows the appearance, if any, of human mentality. Some of the thoughtful older men hazard the opinion that every tree has mentality, whereas others say that it has a spirit. In former times especially, as one was falling, the cutters could occasionally see a dark object somewhat resembling an otter flash away and disappear. Not until then was the tree actually dead. Even the old people do not profess to know anything definite about mentality, which is important only as an attribute of the spirit. In indefinite 774 association with it, too, is breath, sinimits, provided by Al- [961] quntám for everyone at birth. The word signifies more than [827] the material act of breathing, it denotes the actual physical state of being alive, a condition "lent" by Alquntám to mortals. The connection of these two elements with the spirit is unequivocal, though their exact relationship is indefinite.

If the spirit moves far from its proper position at the back [753] of the neck, the owner falls ill; if it leaves him, his condition [755]

774 becomes critical. Only a shaman (I, p. 139) can return one, and 755 if he fails death always results. In some cases a spirit leaves [759] its owner without apparent reason; he becomes insane, tries to eat dirt, and his relations realize at once what is the matter.
[756] They summon a shaman who takes off his cape, hangs it like a pouch on his stick, and points it in all directions as he sings his shaman's song. Finally he learns what is missing, and traps it in his cloak, which he places around the sick man.
This restores the element and the sufferer recovers immediately. Another method is for the shaman to press the back of the patient's neck, and by blowing and spitting cause the wandering spirit to return. Either cure must be performed by a shaman because of the supernatural power required.

774 Spirits can be extracted in various ways. Shamans can draw one forth by sucking at the back of the neck between their cupped hands; in former times, some were so powerful that they could extract them by their mere presence. During 774 Sacred dances (II, chap. i), the uninitiated are told that if they 575 enter the house where a ceremony is taking place, or even pass
[535] on the sidewalk outside the door, their spirits will be drawn from them by the power within and attracted to the dancer or to the sacred platform on which he is concealed. Many [178] stories are told of this, which were firmly believed by the uninitiated until the last few years. Members of the society claim that their great power acts as a magnet to the spirits of all but their associates, except children in arms; the latter can be taken by their mothers into the house, because their supernatural elements have not developed sufficient strength to 774 leave their bodies. A person may also lose his spirit through a sudden shock. If two people meet unexpectedly in the forest and one of them shouts loudly at the other, even if only in fun, the spasmodic contraction of the muscles is enough to expel it.
[761] The person to whom this happens falls down as if dead, and [756] though he soon recovers, his spirit has left him, and if it is not brought back by a shaman he dies a lingering death.

775 At death, the spirit permanently leaves the body. In some

[illegible] 115

[illegible] is [illegible] over the corpse for four days, as it may [illegible] [illegible] on its travels. Thereon means nothing to it, nor does time; once disembodied it goes back on the path of its late owner's ancestors from generation to generation, until it reaches the spot where his first forebears came to this earth. Thus it uncovers the bird or animal form used on their occasion and goes up to Nawabi-a. It is uncertain whether or not the spirit can take on, simultaneously, the different shapes used by various ancestors of the deceased. Its existence in the land above is similar to that on earth, but to an advanced degree. A good carpenter, for example, is a better carpenter after death; a chief is a greater chief; and one of the explanations for death is that Alpantiw has called a man to continue his work in another sphere. Nawabi-a is so huge that it is never crowded, though the spirits are numerous. They can see what is taking place on earth and sometimes return in bird or animal form to visit and comfort their grieving relatives. Powerful chiefs delight to display this, by means of a wooden figure, as the central feature of a potlatch. Apart from this ceremonial usage, disembodied spirits play no part in the lives of the Bella Coola. They take no interest in human beings and accordingly are neither supplicated nor feared.

THE LIFE

Closely associated with the spirit is the ooomkwah kit[], life.[] As in the previous case, Alpantiw provides every human being and every animal with this at birth. It is an ethereal substance, having the form of the body which it animates; without it there can be neither strength nor growth; without life the body is an inert mass of flesh. As a person becomes older, so does this element grow, always taking the exact shape and form of the body. Alone, it can neither move nor think, its motive power being the spirit. It is the life that suffers whenever the skin is broken. They would may prove dangerous, but particularly one that runs either of the invisible lines along which vitality flows from the little finger to the little toe. An injury to one of these channels spreads rapidly and is to many cases fatal.

It is generally considered that a person dies if his life leaves his body. In contradiction to this, though the discrepancy seems of slight importance to the Bella Coola, is the belief that it ascends at the moment relative to the gathering of the supernatural beings in Nuxalk to greet Mountain. It is common knowledge that some part of the human body does this, but there is diversity of opinion regarding which it may be. Some say it is the spirit, but the consensus of opinion is that it is the life. If it is successful and receives promises to the land above, its owner will prosper on earth; if it is unfortunate, he will be the same; if it fails to the crush as the guests hurry forth to salute the bear of Mountain's entry, he will die. By dreams a man learns the fortune of his supernatural representative, and from them he can judge what is in store for him during the coming year and receive intimations concerning birth and death, secret society matters and, in fact, every phase of human activity, since all are decided at the meeting of Mountain and his associates. Dreams are considered to be especially important at this season of the year (3, p. 6ff) and information obtained from them may, perhaps, be the origin of the present firm conviction that some portion of the body actually ascends. Bella Coola beliefs have so broken down in recent years that lack of unanimity concerning the specific part is not surprising, nor does it alter the importance of this conviction. No attempt is made to explain how an individual can remain alive during the actual absence of his life.

Although the life is so ethereal, it really consists of four intangible elements which unite to form the immaterial whole. One of these parts, including the voice, is located in the throat, another in the trunk, a third in the legs, and a fourth in the feet; the body is thus divided into four quarters. The con-union of them with one another and with the spirit, the central division of the life, is a matter of advanced Bulu Caste theology on which opinions differ. Only men of philosophical temperament ever hazard an opinion on such matters, which are beyond the ruler of daily routine. 761

travel in an intangible wraith, having the form and appearance of its dead owner. It visits all the places where he had been in the habit of going during life, irrespective of their distance from the scene of death. Sometimes it journeys to the locality where, in a dream, the mother of the deceased received her first intimation of pregnancy (I, p. 615). It wants to see former friends and sometimes makes its presence known to them by whistling. A person who hears this sound is saddened by the realization that one of his associates has passed away to some distant place. At other times, a man merely senses its presence and feels frightened without hearing or seeing anything to account for it. Very rarely, a dead person's life speaks to a dearly loved friend to inform him of his loss. During the [774] existence of the body, spirit and life are closely associated, and the former sometimes accompanies the latter on its round of farewell visits before ascending to Nzambi-a.

After four days the life descends to the land below where it lives forever as a ghost. Some believe that it is the shadow which assumes this form, but the seeming contradiction is relatively unimportant since the life is essentially shadow-like. Ghosts have already been described in connection with supernatural bodies, and further information will be found in vol. I, chap. xxx.

At death, when the life as a whole becomes a ghost, its constituent parts likewise undergo transformation. The one situated in the feet remains with the corpse and disintegrates; that located in the legs enters a wolf and nothing more is known [827] of its fate; no one knows what happens to the one situated in [825] the body. The part in the throat, including the voice, enters [539]

961 an owl, possibly one of those which normally roost on the tree
775 behind Nuxmalit-a. This element of a dead person occasionally [illegible] communicates with a living relative, as evidenced by the fol[illegible] lowing story.

[illegible] A number of years ago a party of men and women camped for the night beside one of the rivers flowing into South Bentinck Arm. After supper, as they were resting by their fire, an owl kept hooting from a neighboring tree. One of the men turned to a friend who had been making obscene remarks and, half in jest, warned him to be careful in case one of his relatives was hooting. The Indian fellow looked at the owl and asked:

"Are you a relative of mine?"

There was no answer, but when he had repeated the question four times, the owl spoke:

"I am [illegible]," he said, naming the deceased grandfather of his questioner.

Consequent upon the belief that the voice of a dead person enters an owl, the bird is treated with considerable respect. It is improper to make fun of one, or to ask who it was when alive. Should a person do so, the owl answers with the interrogator's own name and he soon dies.

961 On the whole, the life does not affect the daily existence of the Bella Coola as profoundly as does the spirit. When they stop to ponder on the reason for some event, they readily admit the importance of the life with its constituent elements, but they are not always considering its activities and seeking to strengthen it. It is essentially a religious attribute, of greater moment to a man of imaginative and suggestible temperament than to one who carries on the daily routine without asking why and wherefore.

THE TALLY POST

773 In the beginning of time, when Alquntam sent the first 777 people down to earth, he erected in Nuxmalit-a posts emblazoned with the bird or animal crest taken by each to serve as a memorial, or reminder, to him of the number of individuals existing below. There are several tally posts.* Each remained upright as long as the individual to whom it referred was alive, but fell at his death. Since that time, whenever Mpumbu lands to a mortal mumbi, the unidentified power that causes life, his supernatural actions erect in the land above a tally post for the new-born infant, marked with the bird or animal used by its ancestor. As long as this remains upright and straight, firmly fixed to the ground, its owner continues to be strong and prosperous, and has success in all his undertakings; if it becomes loose, or is crooked, he ceases to succeed. Prosperity does not depend upon the activities of an individual, but upon his supernatural possessions, spirit, tally post, and a third to be described here. If the tally post sits far from the perpendicular, its owner becomes ill, and can be cured only by straightening it. In some cases Mpumbu is kind enough to do this if pleased by prayer and ceremonial chastity (I, p. 100), and in olden days, diviners were occasionally able to penetrate to the land above for this purpose. Even when a post was erected, they were sometimes unable to set it upright, though they could always estimate the length of a man's life from its angle of inclination. In one of the kacior dances, the performer pretends to have the ability to go aloft and the uninitiated are deceived by the erection of a tall ladder up which he climbs and disappears (II, p. 102). On his return, he reports the condition of the tally posts of various people. This performance serves to remind both members of the society and uninitiated of the existence of these supernatural elements, and of the dependence of individuals on them for success in life. In spite of this ritual, actual knowledge of the powers and functions of tally posts has been derived only from the first Bella Coola who, created in the land above, were acquainted with the mysteries of life and transmitted such lore to their descendants. One old man expressed the opinion that tally posts have necessity, and suggested that it might be those which avoid the gathering of the supernatural beings at the winter solstice instead of an element from the human body itself.

*Kwakiutl. One of the names of Nunsa'a, Nuqkwakiutlem, refers to them, meaning, "The Place of the Tally Posts." Kwakiutl and Nuqkwakiutl are closely [illegible]; sometimes the latter is pronounced Kwakiutl, although this may be an error in recording.

One elderly Bella Coola, of philosophical temperament, described pentlaxa in terms for removal from the accounts of tally posts. According to him, every individual receives this supernatural possession at birth, and it remains with him, in close association with his body, throughout life. It exists in front of his face, invisible, yet having substance, and constantly shifting from side to side. If a man fails to receive a present at a potlatch, it is because his pentlaxa has caused it to move. When stationary it is not transparent, and not only hides its owner from the donor's sight, but acts as a barrier to his thoughts. The same man stated that this element can leave the body, can be seen by dancers, and that it is the one which accords at the winter solstice to Nuxalk-a. At death it is believed to accompany the spirit and the life to the land above.

There seems no reason to doubt that the concept of tally posts is an ancient belief. Nor does the application of the term pentlaxa to another immaterial possession of quite another type destroy this probability. It must be remembered that within the last eighty years the Bella Coola have suffered not only from the tremendous upheaval caused by the coming of the white man, but have been reduced to a mere fraction of their former numerical strength by various epidemics. These factors have led to the partial forgetting of ancient beliefs, with consequent confusion. It is probable that the use of the same term for the tally post, intimately connected with an individual's life although situated in the land above, and for an invisible and intangible possession which goes in front of him, is due to this recent decay of ancient convictions. If this be true, it merely means that in former times the Bella Coola had yet another supernatural element to govern and influence their lives.

A third supernatural element which must be in good condition if a Bolia Cooly is to prosper in life, is a medicine wash-basin. In the land above, Mpumbe has a large one filled with water which, having been consecrated by himself, is replete with power. When a child is born, a small part of this wash-basin, with its contents, is reserved for him; the supernatural artisans choose the actual metal, but it is Mpumbe who gives them the ability to do so. A fortunate man, whose ventures are successful and to whom goods are attracted, is said to have a good wash-basin; whereas the ill-luck of an unfortunate person is attributed, among other causes, to the small size of his supernatural vessel. The Bolia Cooly have no clear ideas about the connection between an individual and his wash-basin. Some state that it remains in the land above; others believe that an intangible essence comes to a child at birth and grows up with him, always near his body, as if it were the offspring of the basin in the land above. So long as it remains in motion the owner continues in good health and prosperity, but if it becomes sluggish he falls ill. Long ago, shamans knew how to manipulate a wash-basin, but since the time of the first people, when supernatural ability was common, this has been a lost art. Basin decay is attributed to [illegible] of this possession.

River water, being a creation of Mpumbe, is akin to the water in his basin above. Boys are always advised to bathe in the river at dawn; the act is termed kulukuna, a word connected with ewulukuna. A prayer is uttered while washing. The combination of verbal appeal and the application of water strengthens the petitioner's wash-basin and so increases his chances for prosperity. Until a few years ago, this practice was almost universal. Water is always considered a strange substance, obviously a supernatural creation, and believed to be the chief means of sustenance for a child after being weaned.*

*This may be a mere misunderstanding.

[illegible] Shamans believed much of their success through their ability [illegible] to get their souls (souls, hearts, [illegible] souls), to come with Alquntám's [illegible] tangible (I, p. 360) and invo- [illegible] the land above. One method [illegible] of curing a patient is by making [illegible] ing, with the idea that the water [illegible] and wand and have patients [illegible] through association with those [illegible] in the upper world. It is believed that in the distant past, [illegible] shamans were even able to carry their patients to the land [illegible] above and wash them in Alquntám's own basin. Such feats [illegible] have perpetuated in certain shamans' names, such as Mpálpa-[illegible] ikáitam.

[illegible] It may be said in conclusion that although the Bella Coola [illegible] have indefinite ideas concerning the exact form and functions [illegible] of this last element, there is a firm belief that an individual's [illegible] fortune in life depends upon the activity of spirit, tally post, [illegible] and wash basin. With regard to supernatural elements as a [illegible] whole, it is clear that in spite of somewhat conflicting beliefs [illegible] concerning the precise functions of each, they play an impor- [illegible] tant part in the life of every Bella Coola.

Means of propitiation

[illegible] Some of the methods employed by the Bella Coola to gain [illegible] the favour of the supernatural have already been mentioned, [illegible] but the subject is sufficiently important to warrant a separate [illegible] section. In view of the omnipresence of supernatural beings [illegible] and powers, and their influence on the lives of mortals, it is [illegible] not surprising that the propitiation of them is a vital factor [illegible] in human life. The chief means are prayer, sacrifice, and the [illegible] observance of ceremonial chastity.

Prayer

[illegible] Prayers are regularly addressed to Alquntám who, in this [illegible] connection, is known as Mina-kais or Táti, both meaning, [illegible] "Father." A wise man or woman desiring success in hunting, [illegible] in love affairs, in the acquisition of wealth, or in any activity [illegible] whatsoever, is accustomed to ask Minakais to grant his desire. [illegible] No ritual is required. The petitioner merely seeks a lonely place where he is not likely to be disturbed, and addresses the supreme god in a loud tone of voice, repeating his statement. [782]

Although prayers can be said at any time of the day, or at any season of the year, there are occasions when they are more potent than at other times. At dawn, for example, a wise young man is accustomed to go alone to the river to wash and pray. He scrubs the icy water, blows warm over his hands, and rubs his body vigorously* either with a smooth pebble, or, if it can be obtained, with a stone taken from the stomach of a sea-lion.* As he scrubs himself, he asks Monakais to grant him long life, power, success, and strength. On coming from the water, he repeats his request, and then washes himself again. This process is repeated four times, making eight prayers in all. A young man who does this habitually, and in other ways practices the supreme deity, is likely to have success, and may even be given supernatural assistance by one of the many anthropomorphic or zoomorphic creatures. The underlying belief is that Mysoukw actually hears the words spoken and, pleased thereby, aids the petitioner either directly, or by strengthening the supernatural elements in his body. [783]

Monakais has power over both rain and dry weather, and is petitioned for whichever is desired. When the sun is obscured by rain clouds, the Bella Coola pray: [821]

"Please clean your face, Monakais," or,

"Please show us your face, we need you."

Before a man starts on a journey, either by canoe or on foot, he always asks help for his undertaking. [484]

"Monakais," he prays, "Be with me," or "Go before me," or, "Give me what I want."

Corresponding to the importance of the occasion, prayers are always made before the departure of a hunting or war [824] [826] [785] [515] [296] [823] [825]

*Urine was formerly used for washing both the body and clothing. It was followed by the application of clean water, and undoubtedly had a religious significance; indeed, washing purely for cleanliness was not habitual until recently.

*The Bella Coola state that stones are often found in the stomachs of sea-lions. One specimen, considered of great value, was seen; it was indistinguishable from a water-smoothed river pebble.

party. Canoes always must move slow down, and each member of the expedition is careful to pray before leaving, and also to avoid using in case food should in any way interfere with the success of the venture. Before reaching their destination, a chief in such canoe dipping from a pouch some eagle down brought for the purpose, holds it before his mouth, and blows a little towards each of the four cardinal points, at the same time asking Mendoki to smile on the enterprise and grant a safe return. This does not guarantee success, but it is felt that any disaster which may occur would have been more serious if assistance had not been thus requested.

Although Mendoki, under the name of Mendoki, is the one to whom prayers are most often addressed, petitions are sometimes made to other beings. In the beginning of time, when Raven had superabundant power, mortals frequently sought his assistance. At the present time, he is sometimes asked for aid, in the belief that he may still have some shreds of his former power, or he is a better position than man to intercede with Mendoki. If rivers crack when it is raining, people may ask them to request the supreme being to stop the rain; in such cases, a petitioner is careful to address a raven as Newakila, his title as chief, rather than as Raven. In cold winter weather, a raven is sometimes caught alive, its head smeared with grease, and as it is released, the captor says:

"Please end the cold wind, Newakila."

Prayers are also said half humorously, half seriously, on many occasions. When, for example, clothing has become too ragged for further use, it is thrown on a fire with the remark:

"Please come to me again, new."

The thrower does not actually believe that in so doing he is asking help from his clothing, but it gives him a certain sense of satisfaction thus to have expressed his desires.

The prayers above described can be said by anyone, at any time; they are means of propitiation known to the whole community. In addition, information was obtained about two prayers, each of which is the jealously guarded prerogative of a single family. Either is considered an almost certain means of stopping rain, but no one, even though aware of the method, can practice it with success unless he is a member of the family to which the method belongs.

One of these prayers, the property of a Kwanquin family, is addressed to Kwanaddatin. If the petitioner wishes to stop heavy rain, he goes to a quiet place in the woods and calls in a loud voice:

*Ho, Kwanaddatin!	napaddatin	ilak	di ang'nadin
Hail, Kwanaddatin,	upon	the latter	of your heaven
dangwanadin	di dawanjaw		ang ninadjo
so that you look down	the cherished one		your child.

That is, "Expose the upper heaven so that your cherished child may look down."

It will be remembered that Kwanaddatin is the being who takes care of Tingmd-ko in the upper skyland. It is said that this prayer was learned by the ancestors of an informant in the beginning of time and that a repetition of the exact words is enough to drive away the rain clouds between earth and the upper heaven. For many generations care was taken to teach some intelligent member of the family the correct formula, and the person so instructed was expected to use his knowledge for the benefit of any of his relatives desiring fine weather.

Another prayer prerogative of similar type was recorded from an old man who related what he had seen his grandfather do many years before. The two were once hunting when heavy rain threatened their success and drove them to the shelter of a projecting ledge. The grandfather, not having any underbrush with him, cut and dried some evergreen boughs which he gave to his grandson, telling him to light them and wave them over his, the grandfather's, head. When this had been done, the old man rushed out into the rain and in a loud voice asked some supernatural being, whose name was forgotten, to throw his eyes upon the rain clouds in order to dispel them. That night the petitioner neither drank water nor urinated, and the

[182, 424, 521, 785, 770] sent day the weather was fine. This particular method of praying had been learnt by one of his ancestors in the beginning of time, and was afterwards transmitted to his family. With the coming of the white man and consequent decay of customs, it has not been exercised since the death of the grandfather of the man from whom the information was obtained.

[782] It might be supposed that a clear division should be made between the subjects of prayer and sacrifice, but in practice they merge into one another. A mountain goat hunter, when camped near a glacier which he knows to be the home of some deceased supernatural being, asks help from him. He wears dyed and undyed cedar-bark decorations to make his request more conspicuous, and after the prayer throws them into the fire, saying:

[824] "Please accept these, supernatural one," thus making an offering to supplement his verbal petition.

If he is even more cautious, or anger not to offend any supernatural being in the vicinity, he throws on the fire tufts of cedar-bark, eagle down, and scraps of food as well. Whether or not the objects thus destroyed by the flames reach the being to whom the request has been made, is a matter upon which the Bella Coola do not theorize; but the generosity and self-denial of the donor is appreciated, and a favour is often granted in return. A man who frequently hears in his dreams the voice of some supernatural being, knows that it is taking an interest in his doings and endeavours to propitiate it, by placing on a fire tribute of any food he has obtained, saying at the same time:

[824, 824, 824] "Wai, wai, wai," "More, more, more," that is, "May I receive more of the same."

A foolish person fails to show his appreciation of favours received, but a wise man never forgets to do so.

[502, 133, 756] Likewise a person is careful to propitiate supernatural powers when in peril. Both at Kwatna and at Masaiche Nose, the point between Lakeachem Channel and Bacinski Inn, there is danger from treacherous currents, so, when a dancer passes either of these places, he lays some food on the water and pulls eagle down into the air as he sides for help. If no dancer is in the canoe, this is done by the captain. 782 793 502 756

The being to whom offerings are most commonly made is Tlo-qulitto-a, the supernatural woman who cures the sick and gives power to dancers. Whenever a hunter tells an addition 776 to the forest, he cuts off four pieces of fish and throws them into his fire to gain her goodwill. Long, long ago, Tlo-qulitto-a appeared to a hunter, seized some of his gums, and told him of her wishes with regard to presents; these have since been obeyed by wise people. Similarly, the relatives of a man absent in the mountains or on the three scraps of food on the fire and ask the protection of Tlo-qulitto-a for the man in danger. In this case, it is clear that objects thrown into fances are received and appreciated by Tlo-qulitto-a. 224 779

Mountain, although usually propitiated by prayer, is also given presents. Frequently, when a man is praying, he accompanies his words by blowing up into the air small particles of eagle down. Prayers in connection with the departure of war or hunting expeditions have already been mentioned, but before starting on any journey by canoe, the captain is careful to pray and to throw upon the water four pieces of red, and four of yellow cedar-bark. The blowing upwards of eagle down is a common accompaniment to all kinds of prayers, but, if none is available, cedar-bark can be used equally satisfactorily. If possible, this is cast on the surface of water, otherwise into a fire, as a request is being made. The Bella Coola do not believe that such presents are actually used and considered valuable by Alqemiks, but they emphasize and accompany the vocal prayer, and demonstrate the petitioner's sincerity. 776 484 824 825

Ghosts, on the other hand, depend almost entirely on presents given them by mortals, since food is not abundant in the land below. The relatives of a dead person always throw 775 782

776 small particles of food on a fire; these become large when they 782 reach the land below and nourish the ghosts. An individual making an offering of this kind says:

"Awakilimat kwlen," "This is to make straight your road, beloved one."

[952] The needs and desires of ghosts have been made known to mortals through visits paid by shamans to the land below, and by the coming of ghosts to this world. It is, therefore, realized that food placed on the ground does not reach the [372] land below, but that morsels thrown on a fire sink through into the abode of ghosts. Offerings to the dead are not made [953] with the hope of receiving favours from them, but rather to provide beloved relatives with necessary food and to prevent them from showing displeasure by causing stomach-aches and other ailments.

782 Other instances, both of prayer and of sacrifice, will be recorded in connection with various myths. The salient feature is that the Bella Coola are able to gain, by such means, the favour of supernatural beings, a factor which plays an important part in their daily life. In addition, they have a [919] large number of practices based on sympathetic magic. No absolutely rigid boundary line can be drawn between the latter and religion proper, but there is a fairly clear division between rites such as those just described, in which propitiation is the important element, and others in which the desired end follows the mere performance of a certain act. Customs of this last type will be reserved for later consideration (vol. I, chap. xi).

THE OBSERVANCE OF CEREMONIAL CHASTITY

831 In addition to prayer and sacrifice, the Bella Coola have 785 yet another means of obtaining the goodwill of supernatural beings, and at the same time of strengthening their own supernatural attributes so that good fortune is likely to occur. This is by the practice of sustsa, ceremonial chastity, of which the basis is that a man must not hold intercourse except after certain periods of continence. To understand this, it is necessary to understand the attitude of the Bella Coola to the sexual act itself. Although it is a normal part of life (for no one would voluntarily abstain from all contact) yet the union of man and woman does not lack import, since its very humanness distinguishes those who practise it in the eyes of supernatural beings, both anthropomorphic and zoomorphic. Those who indulge excessively become so over-charged with this characteristic that their undertakings are certain to fail, whereas those who remain continent for a considerable period are so freed from the contagion of mankind that they become almost supernatural themselves and always succeed in their ventures. If, after a period of restraint, a man holds intercourse, this essentially human act adds typical human strength to that accumulated by chastity. Chastity alone gives power; but chastity consummated by intercourse at the proper period increases that power enormously. This somewhat complicated [184] belief is accepted without question by every Bella Coola, playing an important part in their lives, even in their present degraded condition. The following story illustrates the point rather clearly:

A party of Kingcome Inlet people had been present at a ceremonial at Smith Inlet. While returning home, one canoe, containing a chief, his wife, and eighteen or twenty commoners, was caught by an unexpected south wind and driven on the rocky islet, Ewe-ahdzlz, where the lighthouse now stands. The occupants managed to reach shore and to save their canoe. The islet was barren, but they made a rude shelter of boughs in which they lived while the storm continued. Every day the chief sent out the young men to hunt seals, and every day they returned empty-handed. The little food they had with them on landing was now exhausted and they were starving. One night, when they were almost famished, the chief said to his wife:

"The youths have done their best. Now that death is before us I want to create a kindly feeling. I am going out, probably to die during the night, and I want you to allow each young man to sleep with you. [187] It is a strange request but our condition is unusual, and the story of your shame will never be known, because we shall soon all be dead."

The wife acquiesced. The chief then told one of the young commoners to lie with her, and afterwards to tell a comrade to do likewise, 539 831 785 [837] [622] who, in turn, would pass on the request so that it might reach each member of the party. Not only is it contrary to custom for a commoner to hold intercourse with a chief's wife, but it is unknown for a man to ask another to sleep with his wife, so the youth was surprised and rather frightened. However, he acceded to the request, passed on the instructions, and washed. As he was bathing, a seal appeared in the surf beside him, and he was able to kill it easily. Each in turn behaved in the same manner, washed, and then killed a seal. Next morning, when the chief returned he was delighted that all had turned out in accordance with his hopes. At the same time the wind dropped so that the party was able to return home.

831 785 The power which had brought the seals within reach of the men had been engendered in their own bodies by these ritual acts after a rather lengthy period of continence. The Bella Coola believe that such a procedure always increases their strength and ability, therefore giving them a better chance to gain favour from supernatural beings, and to take advantage of opportunities offered. Hunters in particular are careful with [224] [825] [789] regard to their marital life since animals know their acts and thoughts, and hide from one who has not made himself "clean" by continence, its termination, and bathing. Sootoo consists of these three elements, but since continence is the most prominent feature, the term may be translated as "ceremonial chastity."

In its simplest form this comprises merely the three elements already mentioned. The longer the continence, the greater the power engendered by its termination. A man who has practised abstinence for a year has such strength within himself that almost any good fortune may occur, and cases are known in which it has been carried out for even longer periods. More often, an individual practises ceremonial chas- [184] tity in accordance with a family tradition. One old man gave the following recipe and was most emphatic that it always 204 brought success in hunting and fishing; he added that on the 785 two occasions he had tried it, he had brought back a phenomenal number of skins.

A person planning to set out on an expedition for any purpose should remain continent for several nights to increase his generative powers. He then selects a time for beginning the rite and on the second and fourth nights from that date sleeps with his wife, holding intercourse repeatedly and vigorously until he is utterly exhausted. Before dawn on the third and fifth days he must wash in the river or in some quiet stream. Then follow four nights of restraint, a further intercourse, and washing before dawn. The period is next increased to eight nights, then twelve, and finally sixteen, each with a similar contact and bathing. The nights of abstinence are thus forty in all, a lucky number. An unmarried man can obtain power in the same manner with the assistance of a female friend; it is the act itself that is vital, not the union of husband and wife.

At the present time, only two Bella Coola are said to know this particular type of ceremonial chastity, which they conceal carefully, even refusing offers to buy their knowledge. It is potent at any time, but especially if the periods of continence have been so arranged that they terminate at one of the solstices. Then, indeed, can a hunter set off with every prospect of success, knowing that the human taint disliked by animals has been removed, and been replaced by a ceremonial cleanliness pleasing to them. If the time terminates at the winter solstice, the hunter should set out immediately; if it ends in June, he must remain away from women after his final intercourse. In September or October, when ready to leave for the hunt, he must sleep beside his wife for the last four nights; each night he must place his leg between hers, and each morning the two must wash together. The best fortune of all is obtained by a man who observes this forty-night period for four successive years.

Another, and more common, count* is to observe continence for four nights, followed by intercourse. Immediately afterwards, the man should eat as much devil's club as pos-

*The record of nights is kept by notches cut in a stick or by knots on a cord.

Or false hellebore. This latter plant is thought to be so poisonous that the cutting of even a twig on both is taboo; a very small amount, however, all that is ever taken, acts as a powerful emetic.

224 785 able, selecting small twigs from which the bark and spines have been rubbed off. This acts as an emetic, so that before washing in the morning he has vomited from his stomach all [824] polluting matter, especially any human hair which animals [278] consider particularly unclean. Before dawn he goes to the [785] river and remains beneath the surface as long as possible, irrespective of the coldness of the water. Then he returns slowly to his house. Four nights later the same acts are repeated. These eight nights of continence are followed by two further periods, each of four nights, making a total of sixteen. Thus fortified, a hunter anticipates great success.

785 A person practising ceremonial chastity is in a condition peculiarly susceptible to disaster, and must observe certain restrictions. If, for example, anyone sees him as he returns from washing in the morning, the power which he has been accumulating so laboriously is lost. Owing to this belief, it is customary for a man to wash long before dawn and to come creeping into his house through a hole in the floor. He must always be the last to retire at night, the first to rise in the morning; and he must say nothing about what he is doing. Intercourse is, of course, absolutely forbidden except on the proper nights, and at other times he must not even put his arm around his wife. Failure to obey these restrictions destroys any advantage from [887] ceremonial chastity, while actual disaster follows should a man's wife misconduct herself with anyone else when he is using her for this purpose. If she is unfaithful, her husband is certain to be slain by an animal when hunting, or to slip and be killed on a mountain trail. Animals know all that human beings do [825] or think, and they punish anyone who is unable to perform ceremonial chastity fittingly. Behind these restrictions there 841 is undoubtedly the sentiment that intercourse, held duly and 785 properly at the right time, is not a mere desire of the flesh, but a ceremonial act. Indeed, when the Bella Coola speak of it in [853] connection with ceremonial chastity, they do not use the [195] common term, e-m, which has a coarse implication, but sulfiut which has a polite and almost sacred implication.

Ceremonial chastity is considered almost a necessity to hunters, and in former years a man would rarely, if ever, set out to seek game without fortifying himself by at least several days of continence followed by washing. In the few cases known of a female assuming the clothing and activities of a male, she has been forced to hire a man to sleep with her on the proper nights before starting to hunt. But hunters are by no means the only ones to observe ceremonial chastity. If a man wants to build a salmon-weir, it is by this means that he makes himself strong enough to succeed; if he plays cards, good fortune is sought in the same fashion. The guests at a potlatch observe ceremonial chastity so that their host may not forget them in his distribution of presents, the host, that his guests may arrive on time. The hamat dancer thus fortifies himself for the performance of a dangerous ritual. In this way a man experiences dreams foretelling the future. In every desire or activity of life, ceremonial chastity is a potent means of success, not infallible, usually combined with prayer and in many cases with sacrifice, but a background and accompaniment to every means of propitiation. If a man has conspicuous ill-luck, it is because he has failed to observe ceremonial chastity; if he succeeds, it is because he has done so. At the present time there is living in the Bella Coola valley an old white man who for years has ranged the mountains in search of gold; he has been unsuccessful, and the Bella Coola believe that he will never succeed until he observes ceremonial chastity.

The strength which a man may acquire through the practice of this rite is almost limitless. A man may be ailing on account of the leaning of his tally post, but, if he energetically and faithfully observes chastity, it will become straightened, whether automatically or through the agency of Alqaxiów is uncertain. After the termination of a long period of continence, a man's spirit is so strong that his friends place their hands on the back of his neck in order to absorb some of the power radiating from his spirit. Ancient myths record how the more force engendered in a man's body by lengthy abstin-once was enough to kill an enemy, as if his spirit had been driven from his body by a sudden start. Even in recent times it is said that individuals who have observed ceremonial chastity have been able to perform miraculous feats. A few years ago a Bella Bella man lost two sons and was trying to get enough money to buy a tombstone for them. With this in view, he observed chastity for almost a year. Then he went seal hunting, and had killed a large number of the animals when, standing up in his boat, the sail blew against him so that he was thrown overboard. But he was so strong that he simply walked on the surface of the water and re-entered his boat, none the worse for his mishap. The men who cited this instance stated that a number of Bella Bella had seen the occurrence and could vouch for it.

Ceremonial chastity is not a matter about which the Bella Coola are willing to talk. It concerns both their religious and family life, in neither of which are strangers welcome. But when an investigator becomes on friendly terms, and gains some understanding of the inner lives of the people, he begins to realize its importance. Ceremonial chastity is not only potent in itself, but it is also the favourite means by which a man can cleanse himself of the impurities of human existence so that he finds favour with the supernatural.

CHAPTER III

SOCIAL ORGANIZATION

Ancestral Family—The Village Community—The Family—Kinship Terms—Slaves

As in other communities, the social, religious, and economic aspects of Bella Coola life are interdependent, but there is an added complexity in the influence of mythological concepts. This not only complicates investigation in the field, but it also renders a logical description of their customs difficult. Some reference to practices recorded in detail in later chapters is unavoidable. 128 182

In many communities, ethnologists have been able to begin with the social organization of the people. Among the Bella Coola, this is impossible, since their religious beliefs colour every aspect of their life, and these must be understood by anyone who wishes to comprehend their culture as a whole. In this chapter, too, it is necessary to commence with a description of that aspect of mythology which serves as the cohesive bond to one of the social units, the ancestral family.

Ancestral Family

As recorded in the last chapter, it is believed that in the beginning of time Alquntām caused the first men and women to be created in his house above and sent them down to populate the earth. They came in groups of two, three, four, or more, brothers and sisters, or more rarely man and wife, to different parts of the Bella Coola valley. They brought with them tools, houses, clothing, even sustenance in the shape of fish and animals. More important, from the point of view of social organization, they brought with them names and ceremonial prerogatives. In fact, the Bella Coola believe that their culture was created by Alquntām in the distant past, and has not been the result of slow growth. It is true that there 773 [829]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

773 have been many changes. Raven, the culture hero, taught 829 the early settlers many useful arts, and they were themselves so powerful that they were able to create ceremonial and other prerogatives in a manner impossible to their descendants. Moreover, the people realize that they have been influenced by neighbouring tribes since that time, but in spite of these additions, they believe that their life is patterned on that of their earliest forbears.

[181] As a group, the Bella Coola are philosophers. They demand a reason for everything, though once a reason has been given, and accepted, they think no more about the matter. The elaboration of Bella Coola mythology may be due in part to their desire to explain their social organization; but without question these myths, now accepted as facts, have had a great influence on the lives of the people. In fact the social structure of the tribe has tended to conform to the myths.

621 It is believed that each group of first people formed a village 773 community, and pre-empted hunting-grounds in the vicinity. These usually consisted of small valleys opening from the main [361] Bella Coola River, tracts which could thus be easily defined.
[226] Each group also took possession of a suitable part of the river for a salmon-weir, or, if located on the coast, a convenient place for an ocean fish-trap. In course of time the first people married, of necessity with members of other villages. According [591] to mythology, and equally according to modern practice, the women usually moved to the villages of their husbands. When 773 a child was born, it naturally grew up to share in the hunting-grounds of its father's village. Moreover, the father was able to bestow on his child various ceremonial dances; the concepts of some he had brought with him from above, others he had formulated on this earth. It is assumed that all the first people were mighty chiefs, able to initiate rites in a way that few modern men have been able to equal. But the mothers of these children, the first born on this earth, did not surrender the privileges of their own villages at marriage. Consequently, their children were of almost as much interest to the brothers

NE5 Bellacoola NE5

and other relatives of their mothers as to their fathers. It was taken as a matter of course that a child had full rights in the village of his mother, and from her, as from her relatives, he likewise received various prerogatives. Thus each child was a member of a bilateral social group. From actual residence in his father's village he tended to be more intimately associated with him and his brothers than with his mother's relatives, but this did not prevent him from visiting at the home of the latter, where he was received as a member of that village. Through the bestowal of prerogatives by his mother and the members of her family, his relationship with them was further emphasized. Such a child was, in fact, a full member of two groups. 773

When the members of the second generation married and begot children, each of these could have been a member of four groups; that of his father's father, father's mother, mother's father, and mother's mother. The Bella Coola believe that there were approximately forty-five groups of first settlers, corresponding to the forty-five towns, and it is obvious that if the system of intermarriage had continued for a few generations, a man would have been a member of each of these first groups. They assume that their first ancestors came to this earth far more than a few generations ago, and yet at the [614] present time no one claims to be a descendant of more than eight of these first groups, and most claim descent from only two or three. In part this can be explained by forgetfulness, [611] though a Bella Coola would regard this statement as heresy. The residence of a man in the village of his father has tended to emphasize relationship with the ancestral group that first populated that village, and there is no doubt that actual relationship, through the mother, with the members of other groups must in many cases have been forgotten in the course of generations. The term ancestral family, mumuts, is used [614] in this monograph to designate those individuals who believe themselves to be descended from one of the first groups that [104] populated this earth.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

614 773 A man may claim descent from as many as eight of these groups, that is, he may be a member of eight ancestral families. Some restrictive means must have been employed to limit the choice of marriage partners, otherwise a man's membership in ancestral families would have been far greater than it is. The explanation lies in the high regard with which the members of an ancestral family esteem the prerogatives they have received from their forbears. With the marriage of the first women, their brothers were called upon to share their rights, both practical in regard to hunting territory, and ceremonial with regard to dance prerogatives, with their sisters' children. Bella Coola mythology contains no references to unwillingness on the part of the first men to do this; in fact, their own children benefited equally from the marriages of their fathers with other women. But, say the Bella Coola, after these first marriages, necessarily exogamic, men realized that it would be foolish to allow their children to marry far afield and so diffuse valuable prerogatives. It was far wiser for a man to seek as future son-in-law a youth belonging to the same ancestral family as himself or his wife. Then any resultant children would come into this world provided by both parents with common relatives, so that the child would be, as they express it, "Held close and supported by a close circle of ancestors."

582 614 [773] Bella Coola logic does not explain how marriages could have been arranged in the early generations without violating the laws of incest. The endogamic principle displayed at that time, however, has been carried out until the present day, so that a man endeavours to arrange marriages for his children with members of the same ancestral family. One of the strongest Bella Coola desires is to "make good the path" for his offspring, and this can best be done when they are born amply provided with relatives of common ancestry. There is [769] no belief in the active participation of distant ancestors in the affairs of men, yet, though incapable of clear expression, the Bella Coola feel strongly that a child is born into the companionship of its deceased relatives back to the beginning of time.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

This endogamic principle will be described in greater detail in vol. I, chap. VII, but mention of it here has been necessary to explain the composition of the ancestral family. 582 [614]

In recent years there has been a tendency for some men to marry foreign women in order that they, or their children, might obtain new prerogatives. Thus a trend towards exogamy has arisen from the same reason which is supposed to have caused endogamy. The offspring of such marriages cannot enjoy the feeling of strength and comfort that comes from the membership of both parents in the same ancestral family, but some individuals have felt that this was offset by the gain of highly desirable foreign prerogatives. It is said that this practice was initiated by a certain Pooks, father of a man about sixty years old in 1923. White influence probably had nothing to do with this radical innovation, although its wide adoption has been made more easy by the establishment of peaceful conditions on the coast. [554] [177]

Strong as is the belief in a common ancestry, it is unlikely that this would have sufficed to hold together the members of the ancestral family, without some definite prerogatives. These are of two kinds: names and land. 614 554

NAMES

The fundamental principle governing Bella Coola nomenclature is that each name must have originated in connection with some event of comparative importance. It is unthinkable to apply a casual designation to a child. At a person's death his name, or names, may be transmitted to a relative, and it is proper that the owner of a name should know when, by whom, and for what reason, it was first created. Tradition affirms that, before coming to this earth, the first people were all given designations by Alquntám; these have been carefully handed down and are still in use. One name cannot be given to two individuals; instances occur of two people having the same one, but in such cases they have different origins. One person may have several names of different kinds, each carrying 551 [768] [553] [773] [428]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

551 with it some definite prerogative of a dance or other function, 428 but all are transmissible, and at the owner's death these may fall to different relatives. A name may pass from man to woman, or vice versa, in some cases with a minor alteration. [756] The only non-inheritable appellations are those obtained by shamans as a result of their supernatural experiences.

551 Not only did each group of first settlers bring with them a 773 number of designations from above, but they also created a number on this earth and bestowed them on their children, 553 and on the children of their sisters or brothers, in whom they felt an almost parental interest. To mark the dignity of the names, all present at the ceremony of bestowal received gifts from the creator of the name, the person who called them together for the rite. The importance of the individual depended largely upon the value of the goods distributed with respect to his name, a concept which will be elaborated in the following chapter. The descendants of these first people likewise created new designations and established their dignity by distributing presents, a practice which still continues. It follows that any complete origin myth should include a large number of names, those brought down from the land above[1] and also those created by the powerful first people on this earth itself.[2] Both types of cognomen will be referred to henceforth as "ancestral names," no distinction being made between those actually brought from above and those made on earth. This is in accordance with Bella Coola usage.

553 Soon after the birth of a child his father, uncle, or other near relative,[3] either on the paternal or maternal side, calls the members of the village together to bestow a name on the infant. The one selected must be embodied in the origin myth of one or other of the parents, and must be one not then in use by any other member of the ancestral family. A relative may give the child one of his own names, in which case the donor surrenders all claim to it. This designation is the obvious mark of the position of the child in the ancestral family. Without such a formal conferring of an ancestral name an infant would be without status in the community, but, as children are always welcome, some relative is invariably ready to confirm the bestowal by the necessary distribution of goods, a feature that is present in every Bella Coola ceremonial. On such occasions the guests are called by their ancestral names. An effort was made to learn what would happen if the number of children born into an ancestral family exceeded the number of ancestral names embodied in its origin myth, but no answer was forthcoming. Established custom demands that a name be provided for every child, and one is always provided. Without question designations must be invented, usually from some event in the origin myth, but it is always claimed that such were used by a long-deceased ancestor. In fact, the social custom agrees with the requirements of the mythological concept. Since bestowal of names is a matter of pride, it follows that a child often receives several from the ancestral families of which he is a member; the possession of these is a source of gratification to the owner.

An ancestral name given to a child is spoken of as an ätsǫtutl name, and the recipient as an ätsǫtutl, which may be translated, "commoner." He may be given several names from one origin myth, or ones from diverse origin myths if his parents are members of different ancestral families. These designations may either be those brought down from above by the first people, those made on this earth by them, or those made at some important event by later persons. Irrespective of what combination of these possibilities a child may have, he is still a commoner, and his ability to rise to the position of chief depends on his own, or his parents', ability to give potlatches, as will be described in the next chapter. In such a case his ätsǫtutl name is said to have been elevated to that of a stälkmq (chief's) name.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

614 553 [773] The ancestral family may, therefore, be defined as those whose ätsqiutl names are embodied in the same origin myth.

What is the stability of this group?

In consequence of the large number of names theoretically embodied in every myth, and of the necessity for validating the bestowal of any one of these by means of presents, it follows that there is always a large number of dormant names. The Bella Coola describe these as being, "In the burial ground." They are, in fact, dead. Any one of these may be resurrected by any member of the ancestral family. If a woman marries into a foreign tribe her relatives occasionally give her husband, outright, an ancestral name. In such a case that name is permanently alienated from the family to which it formerly belonged; this should happen only when the group is reduced to a few individuals, all of whom agree to the transaction. [583] But more often a woman takes as a wedding gift to her husband a name which it is understood cannot be transmitted to one of his relatives unless he has children. On the death of the childless husband, this designation reverts to his widow's ancestral family. If there are children, they cement the bond of friendship between the two families. The brother of a woman so married also bestows names on her children, as further mark of their incorporation into her ancestral family. [583] It is customary and proper, however, for the ancestral family into which a woman is married and bears children to reciprocate the compliment a few generations later, and by the marriage of one of their women to restore such names to the ancestral family to which they originally belonged. According to the Bella Coola, this practice of "return-marriage" has been the rule since the first exogamic marriages of the first people, with the result that names usually return to the patrilineal descendants of the first people to use them.

611 614 If a woman marries outside her ancestral family, her children will belong to at least two distinct ancestral groups. It is difficult to say how long an individual remembers the different units with which he is connected, but the following is 611 an instance of survival for several generations. Qwai-lils is an 614 orphan about ten years of age, now living in Bella Coola; he is looked upon with considerable respect as being a member of ancestral families in Bella Coola, Kimsquit, Smith Inlet, Kitkatla, and Kitlobe. His pedigree, given below, explains his powers. The symbol = marks a marriage, and the male is shown on the left in each case.

Theoretically, Qwai-lils is as much a native of Smith Inlet as he is of Bella Coola where his father made his home. If he should visit Smith Inlet and make known his pedigree, he would be received by the members of the ancestral family of his great-great-grandmother.[4] His welcome would be more assured if he were the owner of a name from their origin myth. Difficulties of communication and frequent wars made it [628] virtually impossible in the old days to keep in touch with relatives in distant tribes, except in the case of a mighty chief who was able to invite visitors from great distances to feasts. Thus names taken by women to foreign husbands were virtu- 614 ally lost to the members of her ancestral family. In the 553 course of a few generations, such designations carried afield 178 would be revived as if dormant by some member of the family, and all recollection of the foreign marriage forgotten.

[4] As the Bella Coola are now living in a single village, it was impossible to obtain a modern instance of the ownership by one individual of rights in a number of localities within the tribal area. It appears certain, however, that the sentiments expressed with regard to Qwai-lils at Smith Inlet are identical with those formerly held for possessions in ancestral families located in different Bella Coola villages. [628]

NEb Bellacoola NEb

614 553 178 773 The converse of this process of loss is the assimilation to an origin myth of names originally brought into the ancestral family by a woman from abroad. Unless intercourse and friendly relations were maintained by "return marriages," in a few generations no tradition would be remembered to account for the name, and this, if used at all, would be interwoven into the well-known ancestral myth. Hence a myth is not static with regard to the names embodied in it. These change from generation to generation; it is probable that elements of the story itself suffer like additions and alterations, even though the people do not consider this to be the case.

611 614 The Bella Coola regard the ancestral family as a social unit, not only in terms of the present, but as stretching back to the first settlement of the earth. Viewed from this angle, it is in fact, though not admitted to be so by the Bella Coola, a unilateral grouping with patrilineal descent, which may, in both the most recent and most ancient generations, be marked by matrilineal descent instead. A man frequently uses prerogatives obtained through his mother, her mother, or even her mother's mother, but it is tacitly assumed that for many previous generations such rights passed in the patrilineal line. Sometimes this succession extended back to the beginning of time; in other cases, prerogatives were transmitted matrilineally for a considerable period after the settlement of the earth, before gradually becoming patrilineal.

614 424 551 It has been thus far assumed that the only prerogative wrapped up in an ancestral name is a knowledge of the myth in which it is embodied. But there are others. For example, several of the first inhabitants of the world are said to have erected totem-poles, each of which was displayed by its owner at the gathering when he took for himself a name. Thence-[532] forth, the only person entitled to use that particular totem-pole design was the person with the legal right to the name in [535] question. The same principle governs all dance names; each entitles its owner to perform a certain ceremonial. Thus it is possible to enlarge the previous definition by saying that:

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

The ancestral family consists of those whose ancestral names, embodying definite prerogatives, are embodied in a single origin myth. 614 424 551

A stranger finds it easier to understand why names are so carefully maintained within the ancestral family by thinking of them as symbols of prerogatives, but it must be emphasized that the Bella Coola preserve with equal jealousy those designations of which the only prerogative is the marking of this actual membership. [554]

If, then, the ancestral family be regarded as a group possessing a large number of name-prerogatives, it may well be asked how these are distributed among the members. The first point to be emphasized is that the ancestral family is a unit held together without definite social mechanism. There is no accepted "head" of the family, nor are there any clearly formulated laws governing the transmission of the name-prerogatives. Before death a man usually calls together his relatives and bequeaths,[4] according to his desire, his personal property in slaves and canoes, and his intangible property in names. Such a designation does not become the property of the new owner unless he is able to validate his ownership by a distribution of presents; meanwhile the name is "dead." If, during this period, some other member of the ancestral family should desire it for a child, or for himself, he can take possession of it by the customary distribution of presents. In doing so he would anger the legatee, but the latter cannot himself use the appellation since it is already in use. Even at the present time there are bitter quarrels over the assumption of names, and such have certainly occurred for many generations. If a man can validate fairly promptly a name willed to him, it is most unusual for anyone else to try to forestall him. 514 553 428 553 131 [578]

If a man dies intestate, his sons consider themselves his normal heirs, and the most respected of them validates for himself as many names as he desires or is able to assume. Disputes are not as common as might be expected since the 428 553 [578]

[4] In case of sudden death or failure to make a will confusion sometimes occurs.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

428 influence of a chief is usually sufficient to settle claims as to 553 which of his brothers shall receive which name. Even if none [578] of them is a chief, some one of them is certain to have greater influence than the others. If a dead man has no sons, his daughters can assume his names, which they may transmit to their children. Failing both sons and daughters, a man's brothers and sisters are his heirs, as usual, the one of influence being the one who really arranges matters.[4] None the less, it [614] must be emphasized that if the members of the immediate family are slow to validate a dead man's names, they may be taken by any member of the ancestral family.

463 In former days it was customary to create a "remem-869 brancer" to preserve the ancestral myth. The older and more influential members of the ancestral family would choose an [614] intelligent young relative to whom to relate the myth in great detail. One informant described how her mother, the last official "remembrancer," had been instructed by her grandfather. The old man had been accustomed to take his granddaughter, a girl about twelve years of age, to bed with him, and whisper to her the myth, with his hand pressed over her anus to prevent escape of his words. At the conclusion of the recitation [789] he always spat in her ears to make the words stick. The members of the ancestral family, recognizing that the "remembrancer" was the person best acquainted with the myth, were wont to consult him or her about it, and, of course, about the [553] names embodied in it. A "remembrancer" had no authority to decree who should receive names, but appeals were often made to him, and a tactful individual was frequently able to settle disputes.

578 Considering the extreme fluidity of the whole system it is 428 surprising that quarrels are not more common. These are limited by the system of wills, through which a man bequeaths
614 his most valuable personal property, especially his intangible 553 property in kusiut name-prerogatives (II, p. 2). Ancestral

[4] At the present time the same principle governs the disposal of houses and gardens on the reserve.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

names are also willed, but since their value depends on the 578 goods expended to validate them, there is seldom bitterness 614 about their allotment. Indeed, a chief who is the legal owner 553 of a designation which came from above in the beginning of time, will in many cases choose to elevate his position with [428] respect to a title of comparatively recent date. But if any person who is not a member of the ancestral family should [685] dare to use an ancestral name, all the members rise to avenge the theft, for such they feel it to be. In recent years, however, [178] this practice has become comparatively common. In such cases a man, eager to share in the glories of a myth and able to give a potlatch, has validated an ancestral name to which he has no right. The presence of the white man alone restrains the injured ancestral family. Names are sometimes lent or hired to those who are not members of the group for [426] definite sums; the recipient recompenses the individual. If [427] such names are not returned for several generations quarrels are apt to arise since the recipient claims to be the real owner and not the temporary possessor. During his tenancy of the name he is entitled to any prerogative attached to it, but he is not considered a bona fide member of the ancestral family.

Instances have occurred in which an old man or woman, [428] believing himself to be the last survivor of an ancestral family, has donated his names and myth to those who have befriended him, or these have been taken by those who buried him. Some [557] individuals are constantly watching to conduct the funerals of friendless old people in the hope of so obtaining names. But in almost every case this leads to friction, since it is virtually impossible for an ancestral family to die out. Perhaps in the next generation, perhaps in the following one, some youth will claim descent from the first ancestors of the supposedly defunct family, and claim the myth and names embodied therein. This [628] leads to a feud with the person, or his descendants, who has received the names through aid given to the "last" of the family.

Such instances of an ancestral family becoming practically 614
621

614 extinct, are unusual; normally, the group is largely centred in 621 one village, but with members scattered in other localities. There is no central organization. It is generally recognized that such a unit belongs in the village where its first ancestors settled, and the leading chief of that village is, therefore, an important person in the family, though without status of [622] "head" of it. His advice may be appealed to in cases of dis-[553] putes concerning names, but he lacks judicial authority. Theoretically, the descendants of the elder of two first people are considered as "elder brothers and elder sisters" of those descended from a younger brother or sister; but this is nothing more than an accepted fact; it plays no part in the social life of the community.

552 In addition to human names, the origin myths include those 614 applied to dogs. The first ancestral group had dogs, and these 773 animals had names, or were given them by their powerful masters. Ever since that time their descendants can apply these designations to their own dogs. It is unnecessary to validate such names, but no two canines can be given the same one at the same time, according to the rule which governs the bestowal of human names. This matter was not investigated in detail, and the only dog's name collected was one for which [539] the origin myth is as follows:

When Tal'ás was first settled in the beginning of time, the houses were built in parallel rows, one above the other, up the side of a steep knoll. At the very top was a toilet-house, built over such a steep incline [514] that excrement rolled down the hillside. In consequence, one of the early chiefs living there gave to his dog the name, Nulápumal'ál mual', "Rolling excrement," which has since been preserved in the ancestral family of his descendants.

LAND

124 Great difficulty was experienced in obtaining information 423 about land tenure. The Bella Coola resent keenly the way in 177 which their land has been occupied by white settlers without, according to their standpoint, proper compensation. Questions on this subject always excited them, but every effort was 423 made to verify the following statements. [177]

As with names, the easiest way to understand the rights of 423 the ancestral family in land is by first considering the mytho- 614 logical explanation, which mirrors conditions as they existed 773 at the coming of white men. On reaching this earth the first people are believed to have prospected for suitable settlement [361] sites, places where salmon and olachen could be caught, and if possible, near side valleys where berries were abundant.
Here they released the animals and plants which they had brought with them, on which they thenceforth subsisted, in accordance with the supreme deity's instructions. The members of the group pre-empted these areas for themselves. Waste land, far from any village was, and still is, free to anyone. A few years after the first settlements had been made, according to the myths, the supreme god sent down to Kimsquit a certain Alquntăm who allotted and marked the territory which was the property of each community; at that time a village consisted merely of a group of the first settlers. No similar myth was recounted for either Bella Coola or Tăl-ie, although their concepts with regard to land are identical with those of the Kimsquit. This really gave a sacred sanction to the possession of land, an important matter to a people so religiously inclined as the Bella Coola.

The system of land tenure follows the same somewhat 423 abstruse principles that govern the possession of names in an 614 ancestral family. Hunting and collecting grounds appropriated by the first people, or by their immediate descendants, are the property of their offspring, the ancestral family. The Bella Coola term for such an area is sal'lcam, also called, sasmmata, which means "Food Supply."

It will thus be seen that a hunting-area is not the property of any single individual, but belongs to a group of persons, most of whom live in a single town. The relatives of a man [224] who intends to give a potlatch usually give him, temporarily, [431] exclusive rights to the hunting-ground. As with names, there

423 is no doubt that a man tends to lose those rights in property
614 which are strictly his, if they are located at a distance. Thus several men claim that they are legally entitled to hunt at Kitlobe, but from mere difficulty of access neither they nor their fathers have exercised the right, and it would have been lost in the course of a few generations, even without the utter decay of custom which has followed the advent of the white man. Practically, a man hunts only in the grounds of those ancestral families in whose origin myths he has names, though, theoretically, he is entitled to hunt on any hunting-ground of any ancestral family of which he is a member whether or not he holds a duly validated name from its origin myth. It is not necessary to confirm the right to property as with a name, though a validated ancestral name is the usual mark of a man's right to that area of the ancestral family to which that designation belongs. Although the ownership of land in distant regions is of little practical importance, it is, none the less, a [554] matter of great pride to a man to feel that he has rights in many places. The efforts of an individual to make good those [721] claims has often led to bloodshed; in fact, one intelligent old man stated that property disputes were the principal cause for [554] war in British Columbia. A person who lacks hunting-grounds is little better than a slave, whereas one who has much land is important.

The Bella Coola regard land as almost inalienable. Though a man does not own the land of his wife's ancestral family, he can use it and his children have full rights to it. Conversely, a wife can gather berries on her husband's land, though it is not hers. A guest at a village may be allowed to use the [574] territory of his hosts, but it does not become his. In the old 727 days wars between the coastal tribes were common, but though slaves were taken freely, land was never seized; such is un-
423 thinkable to a Bella Coola. In fact, several of the older people [567] inquired how it had been possible, in the first world war, for the allies, whose cause they believed to be righteous, to annex territory from Germany. If the victors had killed or enslaved

1:56:Howeith E-5 (1922-1924)948

the Germans it would have been moral and proper according to Bella Coola ethics, but to take land was unheard of. 423 [727]

Since land is only valued for hunting or collecting purposes, it is not divided into small areas. Any man can build his house at will near the village. It is said that at Kitlobe the crab-apple trees are the property of different ancestral families, themselves members of different tribes, but this is unknown in Bella Coola. It may be mentioned that the Bella Coola [829] somewhat naively assume that all other coastal tribes have ancestral families similar to their own, although they recognize that some of them also have a clan system which has no counterpart in their social organization. Since the concentration of the tribe on a small reserve and the beginning of [177] agriculture, a system of individual ownership of cultivated land has sprung up. It is realized that if a man clears and [428] cultivates a field, the produce is his own, and he can will this land to whomsoever he pleases. Likewise a man who rings a tree to kill it for firewood is the sole owner. The Bella Coola regard uncultivated land in the reserve as being at the disposal of anyone, a concept which appears not to have been taught them by any white administrator. Its origin seems rather to lie in the old belief that any unpeedmpend land, far removed from a village, can be used by anyone. It is recognized that the reserve cannot be considered as a xal'olam belonging to any ancestral group, hence it is free to all. One corner of it, however, includes the lower part of a side-valley formerly used by the people of Tcumat. An old man, whose ancestral family [614] lived in that village for generations, has set his bear-traps in this corner of the reserve for a number of years without interference from other hunters, who go far afield with their traps. Even within the limits of the reserve it is felt that this man has the prime right to that area for the use of himself and his family.

Theoretically an ancestral family may die out. Several 614 accounts were received of old men who, believing themselves 428 to be the sole survivors of their family, bequeathed their names 921 and hunting-grounds to those who had helped them in their old age. But in every case the gift turned out to be of doubtful value, since young men grew up who claimed membership in the supposedly defunct ancestral family and combatted the right of those to whom it had been given. This always led to war.

The following is an instance of a feud which arose from the bestowal of a hunting-area.

It is said that about 1850 the people of Tsawat (probably Bute Inlet) captured a Bella Bella woman as a slave. She escaped and fled up the Tsawat River, hoping to come in contact with the Bella Coola, who often hunted in that area. The woman was found by the mother's father of an informant who carefully looked after her while he was hunting beaver and brought her back to Bella Coola, thence sending her to Bella Bella. In gratitude her father, a Bella Bella chief, gave her rescuer the hunting-area known as Nalaw, near Kwatna Inlet, with the consent of the members of his ancestral family. The land so alienated should have remained permanently in possession of the Bella Coola ancestral family, but was too far removed from Bella Coola to be used regularly by the new owners. After the death of the Bella Bella chief, a number of individuals who claimed membership in his ancestral family asserted their rights to it. Many years later, after white traders had made their appearance on the coast, a Bella Coola went to Nalaw and killed a large number of beaver. As he was leaving with their pelts he was murdered by some Bella Bella, ostensibly as a trespasser. But for the restraining influence of the white man this incident would undoubtedly have led to war. The informant still feels that he is entitled to hunt at Nalaw, and did so several times when he was a young man; but his sons have never exercised the right, and it has practically lapsed.

It is unfortunate that the above incident is drawn from Bella Bella, where the power of chiefs is much greater than among the Bella Coola. Consequently it is impossible to say exactly what right the Bella Bella chief had to dispose of the land. The informant assumed that he must have been powerful enough to dictate to his followers, an unknown possibility in Bella Coola. However, the informant regards the case as typical of what would likely happen should a Bella Coola try to give away land. Out of generosity or gratitude old men have sometimes done so, but always they have forgotten someone, perhaps a mere infant, who on growing up lays claim to the xel'olam.

Hunting-grounds are not the only valuable parts of the country. Even more important are stretches of river suitable for salmon-weirs. Of the same type are good places for olachen-nets, and rocks from which these fish can be caught with scoop-nets. Like hunting-grounds, these are said to have been pre-empted by the first people[1] and have passed into the ownership of the ancestral families descended from them. It is needless to repeat the gradual lapsing of rights to property of this kind in distant areas, since the principle is the same as that already described for land.

In one respect, salmon-weirs differ from hunting-areas, since the latter can be used by any number of individuals, whereas the number of salmon-traps possible at any one weir is limited. Again the mythological origin must be given to explain the customary usage. If, for example, a salmon-weir supposedly built by one of the first groups of people was fully manned in the third generation by ten individuals, it is as-

[1]Several Bella Coola myths describe how the first owners brought with them from above some hammers for the construction of fish-dams, and how others were provided with miniature dams which grew larger when placed in position. Mr. H. I. Smith kindly gave the writer the following summary, received from an elderly Bella Coola:

Long, long ago a certain Tsmakus lived with his father, the Sun, who decided to send his child to earth. He came down to Dean, carrying a stone hammer, his sea-pie, and accompanied by a Wolf. Tsmakus made the stone into a pile-driver with a face sculptured upon it, and with this tool drove piles to make a fish-weir. After a while a number of human beings came paddling up the Bella Coola River. In course of time the Wolf returned above, but Tsmakus remained on earth catching salmon, and teaching the people the method which was in use until the last few years.

423 sumed that ten is the largest number of traps possible at that 614 weir. Those who have the right to that weir are the members of the ancestral family with the names of those first users. At [773] this point the logic of the Bella Coola fails to uphold the mytho-[224] logical pattern. No salmon-weir has remained in existence since the beginning of time; when one broke, owners were sometimes infants, and those who repaired the break became regarded as the rightful possessors. The system of ownership prevailing at the time of abandoning the weirs, was that indi- [428] viduals, not groups, had rights to certain sections of the weir which were willable like other personal property. In most [431] cases this right was transmitted with a name, marking the section of weir, which had to be duly validated by presents.
[428] In other cases, the intangible ownership was willed without any mark whatever.[8] Unless bequeathed in this way, disputes were frequent. Rights of this kind were never sold although [427] an owner often leased his section for a night, or longer period, receiving goods in return, and not forfeiting his ownership 431 thereby. This was particularly common when the renter was planning to give a potlatch. No case was heard of in which the right to a certain section of salmon-weir was given to a non-member of the ancestral family. Theoretically, this was possible, but practically it would be so inconvenient that it is most unlikely ever to have occurred, since the Bella Coola is [671] never such a slave to legal privileges that he fails to be guided by common sense.

826 Although individual ownership is thus recognized with [423] regard to sections of salmon-weirs and suitable places for olachen-nets, the owner is bound to share his haul. When he [579] catches a large number of fish, anyone, whether related to him 626 or not, can demand some. He cannot refuse, since to do so would brand him as selfish. The effective check on this system

[128] [8] Great difficulty was experienced in learning about the distribution of rights to sections of salmon-weirs. The evidence is conflicting, and though every effort was made to verify and check the above, there may be further regulations which were not learnt.

lies in public opinion which expresses contempt for a lazy man 626 who is constantly begging.

To anyone familiar with the definite social groupings of a 614 tribe divided into clans or land-owning families, the ancestral family of the Bella Coola must appear as a vague and unreal unit, only distinguished by its intangibility. So it was found when investigating in the field. When information began to accumulate, it seemed as if there must be some definite obligations incumbent upon all members of the ancestral family, but none could be found. Without asking a direct question, the point was raised whether, if a man were killed, the members [627] of his ancestral family would unite to avenge him. Conversely, were they liable for the deeds of any member? In each case the reply was in the negative; these matters concern only the immediate family. In regulating marriage the ancestral family [582] is important, since it is wise for a man or woman to seek his mate within the members of that group, though it is not compulsory. Theoretically, the terms of kinship applied to members of the immediate family may be extended to members of [601] the ancestral family, but in practice this is rarely the case, [178] and, if so, is functionless. It might be argued that this somewhat wide application of kinship terms, verging on the classificatory usage, is a relic of an earlier, and now broken-down, clan system. It is impossible to prove or to deny such a contention. When trying to discover whether the members 614 of an ancestral family ever contributed to a potlatch whereby 622 one of their fellows established himself as a chief, the following 431 interesting comment was received. The previous winter the 171 informant had been in Bella Bella, and there the point was raised by a Bella Bella chief whom he quoted as follows:

"We laugh at you Bella Coola because each of you is always trying to be chief. Our system is much better; we all help our chiefs."

The man agreed with the Bella Bella man that there was an important difference between the practices of the two tribes.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

614 The recent decay of Bella Coola culture may have destroyed
[182] traces of more definite obligations with respect to the ancestral family, but all the evidence indicates that it has always been a fluid unit. Its very lack of functions makes it difficult to [128] discuss, and the above account was pieced together from scraps of information collected from many different people at various times; yet, intangible though it be, it is a very real unit to the Bella Coola and pervades their life. Each individual knows those to whom he is related. In many cases the exact kinship is lost, but it is remembered that a man from such-and-such a village married a woman from another village, and it is proved from the use by their descendants of names from the same origin myth. The concept of physical strength imparted by a closely akin ancestry is always present and gives a person the real "power" in the village founded by those first ancestors
614 of his. For the ancestral family is usually thought of in terms
621 of villages. A man belongs to the village where his first ancestor came to earth, though he is equally a member of other towns into which his ancestors may have married. A [554] man without ancestry, without sol'olam, is a miserable creature; he has no home in this world, or, theoretically, in the world to come. The ancestral family is a unit essentially held together by the ties of sentiment and pride of ancestry.

614 In addition to the above social elements of the ancestral 827 family, it is felt that all its members have certain tendencies. If one of the first ancestors had a certain physical peculiarity, or met with a particular kind of fortune, either good or bad, his descendants are more likely to experience the same than any other people. These tendencies may skip many generations, and may be inherited either through the mother or the father. In fact, Bella Coola belief on this point closely agrees with modern knowledge of heredity; the term for such an inheritable tendency is osäloxläm or uxäxsnuxdjut. Such characteristics are:

(1) Proficiency in using tools;
(2) Ability as a hunter;

(3) The bearing of exceptionally well-behaved children; 614
(4) The bearing of exceptionally naughty children; 827
(5) Disposition to steal;
(6) Uncontrollable sexual desires;
(7) Sudden death, that is, members of certain ancestral families are less apt than others to die of disease or old age;
(8) Death by drowning. One informant, in whose family this is a tendency, has twice been thrown into the water and barely escaped. He fully expects to meet his fate in this manner;
(9) Insanity (not a common malady); [158]
(10) Dribbling at the mouth with increasing age;
(11) Liability to contract the skin disease known as loqalx. 614 With regard to the transmission of this disease the surprising information was received that if a relative of a sufferer should 827 drink from the same bucket or use the same spoon as the 753 patient, he is likely to contract the disease, whereas another 177 person can use them with impunity. This statement may be based on a knowledge of germs learnt from the white man, and warped by a belief in inheritable tendencies, although it is amazing that the theory of germs could have reached the elderly Bella Coola. Possibly this statement is a relic of an old belief in the transmissability of disease through contact, but it is more reasonable to ascribe it to white influence.

In a later chapter an account is given of certain occupational abilities, including that of carpentry, which must be 614 confirmed and validated by presents. The above are quite 827 different; they are either present or absent without any action on the part of the individual.

The Village Community

The village community referred to in the preceding section 614 consists, fundamentally, of the descendants, traced in the 621 patrilineal line, of the reputed first settlers to occupy a site. Since a Bella Coola always describes himself as a native of such-and-such a town, it follows that the village community

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

614 621 is a more obvious social grouping than the ancestral family, though it is of the latter that a man is most proud. The member of a small, unimportant village often describes himself as a native of a neighbouring, larger one when at a distance from his home, simply as a matter of convenience.

Even before the coming of the white man, village sites were abandoned and people took up their residence with friends or relatives elsewhere. In fact, mythology contains instances of [973] such migrations at the very beginning of time. In cases of this [361] kind, memory of the earlier home has been preserved for many generations, and may perhaps be the explanation of the many villages which are described as two, and which have two names. In the early days immigrants seem always to have been welcome; they added to the numerical strength of the village, and the original inhabitants enjoyed boasting to the newcomers of their descent from the first settlers. Since any group forced to abandon their own homes naturally moved to those of relatives, there is no difficulty in understanding the process by [582] which they continued to intermarry with their new neighbours. Thus two, or even more ancestral families, inhabiting one village tended to form a closely inter-related stock. In rare instances, two unrelated ancestral families may have become inhabitants of the same village, which would unquestionably lead to intermarriage.

In most cases the endogamic tendencies already described cause the village community to be largely members of one ancestral family. In addition there are always other occu- [563] pants; strangers who have fled from their homes and sought refuge among the Bella Coola; the offspring of illicit intercourse [567] with slaves; guests; foreigners, especially Carriers temporarily [554] resident in Bella Coola; and finally slaves, without status in the community. The real inhabitants, those whose power is firmly planted in the village, are the reputed descendants of the first group of settlers, and accordingly a relative coming to [553] dwell in a village usually endeavours to obtain a name from the origin myth of the ancestral family occupying it, and thus establish himself with the traditions of his new home. This is another illustration of the patrilineal tendency of the whole organization. 621 614 553

Politically, the village is the most important Bella Coola unit. Usually, though not always related to one another, the inhabitants are always friends. If an attack is made on a village by a hostile war-party, all the inhabitants suffer equally. On the other hand, if the residents decide to attack another settlement, there is no compulsion for anyone to share the burden. Each individual, with the exception of slaves, follows his own inclination. In the case of murder or other wrong inflicted by an individual, the responsibility rests on his immediate family, not the village. Factions within the village seem to have been unimportant; individual jealousies were common, and often led to murder, but if a family became unpopular or considered itself aggrieved, it usually moved to another village. Neighbouring settlements were generally on friendly terms and often assisted each other in war, but this was not compulsory. Indeed, cases are known in which a war-party from the outer coast, about to attack Sinxl, passed within a quarter of a mile of Qomqo·ts without its inhabitants even warning their threatened neighbours. 628 682 578 627 628

As far as internal organization is concerned, the village is as fluid a unit as are most Bella Coola groupings. If one individual has attained a position of eminence through the potlatch system (vol. I, chap. IV), he is "chief" of the village, and his advice is generally followed. If several men have approximately the same importance, there is no dominating figure. In any case, a chief lacks executive authority, and such obedience as he receives is due to his personal influence. Some slight deference is paid to the man who uses the name of the eldest of the first group of settlers, the first chief, but this is not sufficient to warrant the title of "chief" with the significance usually attached to the term. The important members of the village are accustomed to meet for the discussion of ceremonial mat- 622 554 536 621 623 535 796

621 623 ters, and the village constitutes a unit for all dances; in fact [535] this ceremonial unity is its most important function.

[796] With the exception of a few villages built on the seashore, each Bella Coola settlement consists of a row of houses on the 361 river bank. These are of the usual rectangular, plank-built [184] type typical of the North-West Coast. In front of them [342] stretches a sidewalk, usually supported by piles on the side [171] nearest the river to make it level. The houses, too, in many cases have piles beneath their front ends, made necessary by the steep slope of the bank. In large villages there may be two rows of houses, behind and above one another. Usually there [487] is a rough path parallel to the row of houses at the very edge of the river. The number of houses varies; before the smallpox [164] epidemic some villages contained as many as thirty or forty, others, only two or three. There is no definite arrangement of the houses; anyone may build where there is a vacant space. [433] Much the same arrangement occurs in the sea-coast villages, each of which depends for its main sustenance on an ocean fish-trap, as the river villages depend on a salmon-weir.

342 The central part of each house is occupied by a large fire, [354] often sunk a considerable distance below the level of the floor, and around this is an open space free to all. Toward the side-walls are raised the partitions, forming bedrooms for the different families, or for different members of one. In many cases the flooring is removed in three or four parts of the house for small fires on which different groups cook, the central fire being used for heating and for more important meals. The [592] number of families occupying a house depends on its size; an [622] important chief, with many relatives, often builds an enormous house which is occupied by ten or more families; smaller houses contain only two or three. Life in the larger houses is free and open; people are constantly passing in and out, and any-[261] one present when food is being distributed is given a share as a matter of course. Most of the houses are decorated with [353] carved upright posts and paintings on the beams and back-wall. [535] A door through the latter leads to the back-room, so important in dances.

in dances. In front of most houses rises a short totem-pole,* either pierced for the doorway, or standing on the opposite side of the sidewalk. [211] [778]

The Family

It is probably no exaggeration to say that in every part of the world the most important social unit is the family. It certainly is among the Bella Coola, yet its lack of definite social obligations makes it difficult to define. Reduced to minimum size, the family consists of a man, his wife, or wives, and his children. Such a unit occupies one of the bedrooms of a large house, and it is to such a family that an infant automatically belongs at birth. Disregarding for the moment ceremonial obligations, which are shared by others, it is the father and mother who are responsible largely for the upbringing of the child. Such education as he receives comes from them, with the assistance of members of the ancestral family. This is chiefly imitative; a boy, as he increases in strength, follows his father on hunting expeditions or fishing. The mother teaches her daughters how to make baskets, and they follow her when she gathers berries, or when she cooks and performs household duties. The Bella Coola are fond of children, in many cases to the extent of over-indulging them, and they grow up amid the open life of the large houses, absorbing information of all kinds without being aware of so doing.

594 [851] 594 868 855 861

Only two kinds of functional training need be mentioned. A wise father carefully trains his sons to remember their debts (I, p. 369), and the method of teaching ancient myths has already been described; otherwise there is little direct instruction. On the other hand, parents devote great care to furnishing their children with every possible means of strengthening their supernatural elements on which success depends. These can

*Since the Bella Coola believe that totem-poles were used by their ancestors in early times, they are included in this description of a village, without reference to their development in post-European times. This account is compiled from descriptions given by elderly informants; it is inevitable, therefore, that changes due to European contact may be included. [177]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

594 be made more powerful by magical means or the ritual acts of 869 relatives. Although these often entail great labour and expense, parents seldom neglect their duty; in fact, care for their children is one of the strongest Bella Coola characteristics, though the methods used are so foreign to the white man that he has difficulty in realizing their meaning. The hope of both [847] parents is to have children to carry on their names; infanticide is unknown and the death of an infant is mourned almost as [586] much as that of an adult. Sterility and impotency are frequent causes for divorce.

163 At the present time there is a high birth-rate in Bella [165] Coola, although the heavy infant mortality prevents any appreciable increase in the population. In the old days, it is said, there were always large families, though much confidence cannot be placed in this statement. In families where there are 593 several children, the first-born, whether boy or girl, assumes an important position. His or her influence, as eldest, is naturally considerable, and the parents foster this through the vague feeling that it is proper for the eldest to be the most important in the family. In adult years, and after marriage, the influence of the eldest of a family continues to have considerable weight with younger brothers and sisters.

592 If a man is poor he cannot hope to have more than one wife, 556 and his family circle will be limited to their children, and perhaps to elderly parents. On the other hand, a wealthy and [595] powerful man usually has a larger family. Not only may he have several wives, but his aged relatives, and those of his wife, [602] look to him for support and assistance. Such are usually welcome to live in his house; they lend what aid they can in collecting food, and it gratifies a man's pride and sense of power to be closely surrounded by a large family. The Bella
[888] Coola are, on the whole, considerate to their aged relatives.[10]

[178] [10]This is not true of the present. During the winter of 1923-4 a feeble old man, living alone, was often in actual want of food. Disliked and degraded, of a mean disposition himself, none of his surviving relatives, of whom the nearest were nephews, would take him into their houses. Commenting on this man's fate, several informants pointed out how, in the old days, such a one could have found

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

The married sons of a chief usually live in his house, and if he is very powerful the husbands of his daughters may also reside with him. Such a man is at the zenith of power, surrounded by a close group, formed of elderly relatives, of children and grandchildren. Connections by marriage are also added to the family group. At the present time, for example, one Bella Coola man is looking after his brother's widow, and it is felt that she is a member of his family. 592 556 622 602

Another way in which a rich man can increase the size of his family is by adoption. Parents who have lost an infant may adopt the child of some member of the ancestral family of either father or mother. The matter is usually arranged soon after birth, and the transfer takes place immediately after weaning. The real parents are willing since they know that the adopting parents will be able to validate valuable prerogatives and names for the child, which they themselves are unable to do. This desire for their child's welfare overrules parental love. In such cases the real father or mother can likewise bestow names and other prerogatives on the child, who really becomes a member of two families. This is often done by an old couple whose own children have married and moved away, and who thus find themselves lonely. It is considered disgraceful for parents to allow their children to be adopted by anyone not a member of their ancestral family, since that would be an admission of inability to bring up a child in the path of his ancestors. 556 597 614 [888]

"Your father was not strong," could be said to such a child as a reproach.

In the case of an orphan some wealthy relative is almost always ready to adopt him. Consequently, as he grows up, he receives his full share of the ancestral origin myth, and the names embodied therein, so that the loss of his own parents is of little consequence in the course of life. Occasionally a child is not adopted by relatives, and then his fate is indeed hard. 736 597 shelter in the house of any chief, and shared in the food which was being distributed at the almost continuous ceremonial feasts. Now, each family lives alone and no one feels any responsibility for this old man. [178]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

597 736 Ignorant of his ancestral names, and lacking the means to validate them even if someone should tell them to him, owning no hunting-grounds, the unfortunate infant is little better than a slave. This is almost unthinkable except in the extremely rare contingency of a child being left without relatives.

Although public opinion does not impel kindly treatment to orphans left without kindred, yet many Bella Coola have charitable dispositions and it is not unknown for a family to adopt and tend an infant without reason or hope of reward. One old man mentioned how his mother and a Chilkotin child had been born on the same day when a party of the latter had been encamped near Nusqalst. A few days later they left for the interior, abandoning the infant. The grandfather of the old man chanced to pass their camp while the ashes of their fire were still warm and found the baby, whom he brought back, to be a brother to his own daughter. His wife suckled the two, giving each a breast, and treating the foundling as her own. When the boy grew into manhood, he went back to his own people, but never forgot his adopted parents. Forty years later he visited Bella Coola, bringing with him his own wife and family. The old man who related this incident recalled the manner in which the Chilkotin had instructed his children to regard him as their brother.

597 [768] Children are not the only persons to be adopted. On the death of an adult his relatives may "adopt to replace" someone who has a striking facial resemblance to the deceased. Thus, some time after the death of his sister, a certain man was in Bella Bella and saw a Bella Bella woman who closely resembled her. He desired to adopt her, and since he was a man of importance, his wish was granted. To legalize the transaction [431] he distributed valuable presents among the Bella Bella. A person so adopted does not usually change his abode, nor does [601] he lose membership in his own family; instead, he becomes a [835] member of two, with full rights to names and prerogatives in both, is addressed with the same kinship terms as if related by blood, and is likewise considered a member of the family as far as incest rules are concerned as far as incest rules are concerned. In this particular instance 577 the woman did not show any interest in her new relatives, failed to visit them, or to take part in their ceremonies, so that the adoption, though still legal, has practically lapsed. When [428] this man dies his children will not consider the claims of their father's "sister" to inherit any of his possessions, as they would have done if she had showed herself appreciative of her adoption.

It will thus be seen that the size and composition of the 592 family vary according to the wealth and influence of the father. The duties of the members are difficult to define since they concern almost entirely the routine of life. The father, head of the family, directs the gathering of firewood, repair of the house, obtaining of food supplies, and other matters of the same sort. If he gives a potlatch his children must help him, [431] 2 which they do willingly since they gain from the ceremony. If a father is too autocratic, his older, especially his married children, simply move away. Nor is his power over his younger [602] children unbounded, since their mother's relatives take great interest in their welfare and would resent any ill-treatment.

If a person is killed or wounded, revenge is the affair of his 593 family. Just how many individuals are involved depends on 627 the composition of the family. In the case of the killing of a 682 child, living with his parents alone, none but the father would feel it incumbent to retaliate. If an adult person is murdered, his or her brothers feel and avenge the insult. But should an important member of the community be slain, an old man surrounded by a numerous family, it is the affair of all. Every effort is made to slay the murderer, but if he should escape from the country, the injured group is satisfied by killing one of his family. Here again the same inexact composition is found. A man's son, brother, or father are the only persons strictly liable, and even here the common sense of the Bella [671] Coola outweighs their theoretical laws. A murderer's brother, living in another village, would not be held liable; but more distant relatives living with the offender and considered as his family are liable

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

593 family are liable. It is very rare for a woman to be killed in 627 a blood feud. A death is answered by a death; if two persons 682 should be slain for one murder the family which has suffered the double loss endeavours to kill another of their enemies. In [562] case of wounding, an effort is made to wound the offender, but [683] if he should be killed his family would try to avenge him.
More often, one of the offender's family takes the initiative of offering goods to the injured family, "to cure the wound." If the offer is accepted, and the goods delivered properly, the matter is at an end. If a murder be committed within the ranks of the immediate family, for instance, if a brother kill a brother, revenge, if exacted, must be meted out to the actual [622] offender. If requested to do so, the leading chief of a village may offer his advice, but it is always considered that revenge concerns only the immediate family.

612 Revenge is a topic which shows clearly the essential fluidity 614 of the family. There are no well-defined degrees of relationship within which responsibility rests. Instead, everyone [627] knows, in the open life of the community, how many persons [682] share the family life of the individual, and they alone are held to account, or they alone demand compensation. From its very nature, the family must be a bilateral unit which, when powerful, stretches out to absorb members of the ancestral families of both mother and father.

Not only does the family thus appear constantly to be attracting to itself members of the ancestral family of either parent, but these relatives themselves are deeply interested in the affairs of the family. This is most clearly shown in the case of children who, of course, are members of the ancestral family of both their mother and father. A few days after 553 birth some relative is expected to call together the people of the village where the child is born for the bestowal and valida-612 tion of an ancestral name. It is considered an evidence of 614 poverty if this is done by the father, as if his child were only [558] supported by his parents, not by a larger circle of relatives.
It is immaterial whether this gathering be called by a relative of the father or the mother. In June, 1922, a Bella Coola girl had reached the age of about six months without having received a name. There was much adverse criticism about the parsimony of her father's father and her mother's father, who were held equally to blame, but who had really been deterred by fear of the law prohibiting the potlatch. 612 614 553

As a child grows older he is helped in the performance of ceremonial rites by his parents and by their brothers and sisters. In this, too, it is considered a mark of poverty if only the parents take part. If a man's own children do not appear likely to carry on the traditions of his ancestral family, he has no hesitation in favouring the children of either a brother or sister, since, like his own, they are all members of the same ancestral family. Especially in Kimsquit* it is customary for a man to help his sisters' children; not that there is any lack of knowledge of the real father, but rather as a mark of respect and family feeling displayed by a man to his sister. Moreover, in both Bella Coola proper and in Kimsquit, it is most improper for a name which a man has raised to a position of dignity by the expenditure of much goods to be passed to his own son; it should go to a distant relative. When a father validates a name for his child it should be one long dormant. 593 604 852 [558] [614] [553]

One aspect of the manner in which the family merges imperceptibly into the ancestral family can be seen in the inheritance of names. When a man calls his relatives together to make his will he is guided in the choice of recipients by the characteristics of his children. An able son receives much from his father, but lazy children are slighted without hesitation. This is particularly true of names with which are bound up valuable dance prerogatives, whereas, as previously mentioned, ancestral names of which the importance depends 593 614 428 553

*According to an intelligent Bella Coola informant, a Bella Bella pays greater attention to the children of his brothers and sisters than to his own offspring, and the same man expressed the opinion that the Kimsquit practice was due to Bella Bella influence. Kimsquit informants denied this, though emphasizing the important part taken by an uncle in obtaining prerogatives for his sisters' children, in some cases to the detriment of his own, which is rare in Bella Coola. [184] [177]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

593 on the value of the goods distributed in connection with them, 614 usually revert to the ancestral family and can be revived by 553 any member of it. It seems needless to publish lengthy pedi-
428 grees, illustrating the transmission of ancestral names; it will suffice to say that such sometimes pass from father to son, from a man to his brother's son, his sister's son, his sister, his daughter, or to other relatives belonging to the immediate family. On the other hand, with equal frequency, names pass from a man to distant relatives of the same ancestral family.

59 Thus the Bella Coola family, important though it is in the life of the individual, cannot be defined with exactitude either as regards composition or functions; it varies according to the importance of its head, and tends to merge in the ancestral families of the parents.

Kinship Terms

601 In Bella Coola, as in so many parts of the world, kinship terms mirror the social life of the community. The Bella Coola system of nomenclature is not as clear-cut in its application as in other regions, and requires considerable explanation concerning the uses of many of the terms. It will be seen that the system, although fundamentally founded on the family, presents many classificatory features. Whether or not these are to be ascribed to an ancient clan system is most doubtful; a short discussion of that point will be found at the end of this section.

The terms are arranged in the following order: first, an individual's relatives of the preceding generation, then those of the next preceding, with their parents; then those of the present generation, followed by terms for men of the generations following. Finally come relations by marriage.

These terms, though properly reserved for brother and sister, are usually used for all cousins in direct address when an individual's name is not employed. The choice between ḡaulim and xayinas depends on the relative ages of the parents, not on the ages of the speakers. Theoretically, this should be traced back to the first settlement of the earth, so that, for example, an old man claiming descent from the younger of two brothers who first came to this earth, addresses a young girl descended from the elder, as ḡaulim. In consequence, there is often a choice in terminology. Thus a man calls his mother's father's elder brother's son either ḡaulim or xiai. Daughter, until twelve or thirteen years of age	Pai, a term of endearment used for any small girl, or by name. Use of the personal name becomes more frequent with increasing age.
Daughter, when adult	By name; infantile form of endearment is also sometimes used.	By name.
Stepchild	Same as for own child.
Brother's child or Sister's child	Usually by same terms as own children, mainly as a mark of endearment, also own. Corresponding to the use of [illegible] where [illegible] is usually applicable, [illegible] is used in same sense instead of own.	own. Depending on the composition of the family, this term is in many cases applied to the children of an own if they form part of the family group.
Son's child or Daughter's child	Usually as for own child, or by name, or [illegible]. The last is merely the term for indirect address, with the endearing suffix, [illegible].	[illegible]
Descendants		[illegible] Terms used [illegible] to describe a man with many [illegible]. The latter term means "[illegible]."
[614] Family		[illegible] the ancestral family, those who claim descent from one group of ancestors, even though their exact relationship has been forgotten.

In case of adoption, the same kinship terms are used as if the adopted person were a member of the family by birth. A more complicated situation arises when a child who is regarded as the reincarnation (I, p. 616) of a recently deceased elderly relative, is given the latter's name. In such a case the child is addressed by the kinship terms applicable to his namesake. In recent years, at any rate, this application is without social significance, and, as far as could be learned, this has always been the case. Bella Coola sentiment is that it is fitting for a child to receive the name of one of its ancestors. When a parent sees the child, and thinks of his name, he thinks of the late deceased, hence it is natural to use kinship terms accordingly. This is more obvious when the child is regarded as a reincarnation, though even in such a case he does not receive any of the marks of respect paid to his namesake; the reincarnation is physical, not social. In course of time this is forgotten and the child takes his place among others of his own generation, though it may be remembered in rhetorical speeches on ceremonial occasions.

The kinship terminology of the Bella Coola combines features of the family and classificatory systems. The reciprocal terms for parents- and children-in-law, brothers- and sisters-in-law, lack of sex differentiation for brothers and sisters, and the importance of age in the designations applied to persons of the same generation, are all features of the classificatory system. On the other hand, bilateralism, failure to differentiate between cross- and ortho-cousins, and the unsystematic groupings of nephews and nieces show "family," as opposed to classificatory, principles. Finally, rhetorical terms for the ancestral family, for many ancestors, and many descendants, correspond to the importance of a large number of relatives in Bella Coola thought. 601 [602]

1:McDowalth E-5 (1922-1924)948

In many parts of the world the classificatory system of relationship occurs where the community is divided into clans. The occurrence of some of these features among the Bella Coola raises the question of whether or not they should be regarded as survivals from an earlier clan form of social organization. The Bella Coola may once have had clans, but their relationship system does not furnish any real evidence to this effect. The reciprocal terms really have the significance, "Relation by marriage of the same generation," or "of a generation once removed," a form of address which does not require explanation in any ancient form of social organization. Moreover, the importance of the eldest child, as potential transmitter of the glories of the ancestral family, is sufficient reason for differentiating brothers and sisters in terms of their relative ages. This feature suggests that in former times this was more important than it has been in the recent past. It is not implied that the Bella Coola never had a clan system, as such may have been the case many generations ago, but their kinship terminology can be explained without that hypothesis. The somewhat wide application to cousins of terms which are properly limited to brothers and sisters may easily have been derived from a process of copying. The Bella Coola are well acquainted with the clan system of the northern coastal tribes, so that it is by no means impossible, or unlikely, that they should have adopted the principle of applying the same kinship term to many individuals, and hence to members of their own ancestral families. Finally, the somewhat vague and unsystematic application of terms to relatives according to whether or not they are members of the immediate family, is a feature not at all surprising in view of the essential fluidity of Bella 601 614 178 [561] [179] 601

601 Coola social organization, and of the absence of standardized obligations based upon specific relationships.

Slaves

567 Since a slave was[11] without status in the Bella Coola community, it is perhaps incorrect to include a description of [554] slavery in a chapter on social organization; but as slaves lived in the Bella Coola villages, it seems reasonable to include them when dealing with the different units of the tribe. It was 162 impossible to obtain an accurate estimate of their number in 567 Bella Coola; slavery has been so long abandoned that the present natives could only hazard vague guesses. Judging from conversational remarks by elderly men, it seems probable that in the old days there was a considerable slave population in every Bella Coola village, comprising at times as much as thirty to forty per cent of the total population.

567 When a party raided a village most of the inhabitants were 727 slain, but some, especially children, young adults, or famous chiefs were captured. As far as could be learned, once a captive had reached Bella Coola he was in little danger, since torture or systematic slaying after the heat of battle had subsided was not a Bella Coola characteristic. The leader of the expedition retained many of the captives as his own slaves, and distributed others among his followers. Anyone, chief [422] or commoner, could own slaves in the same way that he could own any other type of goods.

567 Like any other commodity, slaves were bought and sold. 437 The Bella Coola were usually so well provided with salmon that they were able to exchange these fish with the members [622] of other tribes for slaves. Lack of strong chieftainship among [726] the Bella Coola hindered their success in war, so that most of [431] their slaves were obtained by trade. To the same category [773] belong those obtained as presents at potlatches. If, however, a member of one of the tribes on the lower Fraser River was given as a slave to a Bella Coola, he was treated as a guest.[11] Slaves were bartered between Bella Coola individuals as a matter of course. Their value depended on sex, ability, and industriousness, as well as on supply and demand. When there was an over-supply, the value of a slave fell to twenty or thirty salmon, but whenever an owner found that someone wished to purchase a particular slave he endeavoured to raise the price. If a foreigner borrowed goods in Bella Coola he usually had to leave a relative as pledge. Thus, not many years ago, a Xixais Indian, from near Ootsa Lake, borrowed goods from a Kimsquit man and left his son as pledge. The goods were not returned, so the son was sold as a slave to the people of Kitimat.

It was not uncommon for a Bella Coola to lose his freedom by gambling. At lehql especially, a player who had exhausted his goods not infrequently wagered his children, or in extreme cases, himself. If he lost, his children, or himself, became the property of the winner. Unless speedily repurchased by some relative, such slaves were usually sold or given away at the first opportunity to a member of a foreign tribe, since it was considered improper for a man to hold a member of his own tribe in servitude. The same course of action was taken on those rare occasions when one Bella Coola village fought against its neighbour and prisoners were taken.

To the Bella Coola, who still consider a man's "power" in the land as dependent to a considerable extent on his ancestral myth, a slave's greatest misfortune lay in the fact that he had no ancestral home, and hence no rights.

"No slaves came to earth with the first people," they say.

A slave was a stranger in a strange land, unsupported by a chain of ancestors reaching back to the beginning of time. On the whole, captives taken in war were better treated than other slaves since it was felt that such a misfortune might occur to anyone at any time. They were frequently ransomed by their [11] This is said to be an ancient practice, due to the fact that several of the forefathers of the Bella Coola came to earth in that region and were on friendly terms with the inhabitants. It is conceivable that this tradition may have reference to the breaking away of the Bella Coola from the main Salish stock.

567 friends, a further cause for their preferential treatment. A [727] Bella Coola who had been enslaved and ransomed had to undergo a cleansing ceremony to remove the taint of slavery [783] before he could take part in the ceremonies of the community.
It was impossible to learn the details of this rite.

[626] A master had complete power over a slave, unaffected by the force of public opinion, since the affairs of a slave, being without relatives, were of no consequence to anyone. Accordingly, the lot of a slave depended on the character of his master, and on his own ability and industry. An industrious slave was valued; such an one would not be traded or sold except through dire necessity, and in course of years he became, as far as actual treatment was concerned, one of the
rogatives, expending large sums for the purpose. In such a [431] case the slave might become an influential member of the community, though the fact that he was not free was never forgotten. On the other hand, a master had not the slightest compunction about beating a lazy slave, and could kill him if he so desired. None of the present Bella Coola has heard of such a case; it was considered more sensible to sell or give away an unsatisfactory slave. It was accepted as a matter of course that a master should provide his slaves with food and clothing, since anything produced or obtained by one belonged to him. A slave-owner had full rights to his female slaves, [837] and unquestionably exercised them. The only restraints were the jealousy of his own wife, or wives, and the feeling that it was undignified for a free man to demean himself. It was impossible to learn with even approximate accuracy to what extent intercourse took place between masters and slaves. Probably not a great deal, though there was considerable freedom of relations between slave women and the young men of the community, unrestrained by the pride of chieftainship. When a slave had been faithful for a number of years and had [582] become almost a member of the family, his master would try

[14] Kusiut privileges (I, p. 180) were more rarely given.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

to arrange his marriage with some female slave; once this had 567 taken place, the actual treatment meted out to him differed 582 only slightly from that shown to a member of the family. In former times it would probably have been difficult for a stranger to tell married slaves from the members of the Bella Coola community until he had been long enough in the country to understand more than appeared on the surface.

Marriages between Bella Coola men and slave women were not infrequent, while like partnerships between slave men and even the daughters of chiefs were not unknown. In such cases the status of the children depended on the performance of 431 ceremonies to wash from them the stain of their slave blood. 567
While the mother was still pregnant her husband would call guests, not only from his own village, but from foreign tribes as well. Presents were given, according to the wealth of the donor, often aided by his immediate family, to "wash the child." Such ceremonies would be repeated several times before birth, and again at that time. Bella Coola sentiment was that such presents gagged the recipients; they knew of the dishonourable ancestry of the child, but the receipt of gifts on his account had wiped away the disgrace. Such a child was [428] able to inherit prerogatives from his mother's old home, duly validated in Bella Coola by valuables, and by his own lavish presents he could silence those who remembered the blot on his ancestry. Similar procedure was carried out if a free woman married a slave. Unless her husband were already owned by one of her family, the woman's father or brother would arrange to purchase him. Then, aided by him, they would give the same type of presents to clear the children from the taint of slavery. If this were not done, the children had only the status of slaves, though, born and brought up in Bella Coola and associating from infancy with their master's children, they were virtually considered members of the family.

"Washing the child," during pregnancy and at birth, sufficed to cover the taint on its history, but in later years if such [537] a person failed to continue to give ceremonies, people would [578] again talk of his short-comings. So, too, for the child or grand-

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

431 child of a mixed Bella Coola and slave marriage. As long as 567 such an one maintained a position of importance in the com-
578 munity by the distribution of presents, nothing was said, but [554] if he should fail to do so, he could be, and frequently was, insulted by having references made to his ancestry. In case of dispute or rivalry it was always a temptation to refer to such a blot, but if he had atoned for it with presents, references were considered improper. Unquestionably, memory of slave 554 ancestry was forgotten in course of time if the line was influ-
567 ential, although recollections of the stigma were always carried for at least two or three generations. At the present time the most influential woman in Bella Coola, the one who has given most presents, is the granddaughter of a Smith Inlet slave. This man had lived in Bella Coola for many years and had married another slave, by whom he had a son. The latter became the husband of an influential Stuix woman. When she became pregnant, her family secured the liberation of her husband, and gave many presents to "wash the child." One daughter was born to this couple, the woman just mentioned. Her mother's relatives were influential, and her father was [555] such an expert canoe-maker that he was able to win an honourable position for his daughter by presents of his handicraft. The woman, possessed of considerable ability herself, has been able to give many ceremonies and so reach a position of eminence. No one dares insult her by mentioning her ancestry, but everyone knows about it and if her children should fail to hold their position, they would be open to insult on this score. The woman has validated names and myths derived both from her mother and father, without explaining how the Smith Inlet traditions came to Bella Coola.

To sum up, it may be said that the position of slaves in Bella Coola was not particularly onerous, though it depended entirely on the will of their masters. Without status in the [182] community, a slave could have been abused by a cruel owner, though the public life of the village, where all lived and ate together, tended to break down the unsystematically enforced differences of rank.

CHAPTER IV

RANK

Chieftainship—Sisaok Society—The Potlatch

CHIEFTAINSHIP

IN the previous chapter have been described the beliefs of the Bella Coola concerning the origin of names, and the attitude of pride with which they regard those embodied in ancestral myths, which carry with them prized prerogatives. But the unsystematic method by which ancestral names are inherited is sufficient to show that their possession, though valued for sentimental reasons, is not enough to make the owner a chief. On what, then, is Bella Coola chieftainship based? Expressed briefly, it depends on the number and value of presents distributed at any kind of ceremonial. To the Bella Coola, every rite, whether it be a marriage, the bestowal of a name, a dance, a type of funeral, or admission into a secret society, is a prerogative intimately associated with the myth by which the performance is authorized. Accordingly, the host is really displaying the glories of his ancestors before the eyes of guests present at the ceremony. To the Bella Coola it is unthinkable for such to be performed without the giving of presents to all; failure to do so would destroy the value of the prerogative. The potlatch is the ceremonial at which the most lavish generosity is displayed, but the principle of the acquisition of prestige by the giving of presents is the same for all other rites; the only difference is that at a potlatch a man is able to display his generosity to a larger number of recipients. In consequence, the aim of every ambitious man is to hold potlatches, since his status in the community virtually rests on his ability in this respect. The ritual of a potlatch will be given in detail in the latter part of this chapter, but its complications will be intelligible only after a description of the

622
* 556 broader principles of chieftainship. The first essential is to 431 consider the principles of present-giving.

PRESENTS

* 556 Consider, for example, a man who wishes to take for him-431 self one of his ancestral names, and at the same time to display certain features of his ancestral myth—a particular type of 424 house, totem-pole, or dance used by one of his forefathers.
He invites guests to his house, displays the feature of his myth, and must give a present to each to show the value of his prerogative and to demonstrate that he has not merely casually usurped the function in question. In giving a present of, for instance, $20, it is as if he said to the recipient:

"See! These are the glories of my ancestors of whom I am the descendant. I have a part in their fame. To make this valid I give you from my wealth a mere trifle, a matter of no consequence to me, who am so firmly established in the path of my ancestors."

* 556 The guest receives the money with mixed feelings. On the one hand he has received $20 as a "present." But if he wishes 431 to elevate his own position and his own prestige, together with that of his ancestors, it is incumbent on him to repay this sum with interest. Contrary to the practice among some other [171] coastal tribes, there is no fixed rate of interest among the Bella Coola. An ambitious man who seeks to become a chief will strive to the utmost to pay back with heavy interest when he himself gives a ceremony so that his fame will be carried far [558] and near. If he should repay only the principal, he would be regarded as having done all that was obligatory, but should he fail to do even so much, he would soon sink to a position of little consequence, no matter how lofty and distinguished his ancestral name might be.

171 In this respect there is a parallel between the Bella
* 556 Coola and ourselves. A man invited to a dinner party is not 558 compelled to return the compliment, but if, in the course of time, he fails in any way to reciprocate the hospitality, he loses his place among his special associates. So, likewise, the Bella Coola who receives present after present, but fails to give any in return gradually receives smaller and smaller gifts and in time loses his social position and influence entirely. As with ourselves, too, there is a disguised feeling of contempt for the parvenu, the man who, lacking the traditional dignity attached to one of the names which came from above at the beginning of time, has elevated the fame of a more recent name by ostentatious giving. But in Bella Coola, as with ourselves, success is the great criterion, and the donor finds his influence little impaired by the lack of one of the ancient origin myths. It is dangerous to cite similarities between the social practices of divergent peoples, and this one must not be stretched too far. The pride of a man in being able to incorporate himself in the traditions of his ancestors is lacking with the host at a dinner party, nor does the latter, to any extent, attain the status of chief through his hospitality. Further, a Bella Coola will sometimes endeavour to shame the poverty of a guest by giving him a large present. Unless the recipient is willing to admit his inferiority he must repay this with a still larger gift. The original donor will then vindicate himself by increasing the value of his next gift until a fierce competition ensues. This feature of rivalry in generosity is rare in Bella Coola, and never reached the same proportions that it did among the Kwakiutl.

1: McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

558

The following is a good instance of the manner in which a haughty man regards the acceptance of gifts. A Rivers Inlet man married a Calvert Island woman who went to live with her husband. The man's mother, to show her amiable feelings towards the marriage, frequently gave thick slices of boned spring salmon, a great delicacy, to the family of her daughter-in-law. The Calvert Island chief considered these presents an insult to him, as if the Rivers Inlet people thought that he and his people were so poverty-stricken they lived on skin and bones. To avenge this slight he made war on the Rivers Inlet Indians and slew many of them. This attitude of the Calvert

*556 578 Island chief was felt by the Bella Coola to be quite natural; one of their own chiefs might have resented the insult in the same manner. This account may have no historical basis, but it is a clear example of Bella Coola sentiment.

*556 648 558 [765] Further examples may help to clarify this point. A few years ago a number of Kwakiutl Indians visited Bella Coola to perform a mourning ceremony in honour of a deceased Bella Coola who had a Kwakiutl name from his grandfather, a member of that tribe. All the natives were invited to a large house, where the visitors gave a dance according to their own ancestral myths; the songs which were used recounted the history of the Kwakiutl name of the dead man. After thus displaying their prerogatives, they felt themselves obliged, and proud, as hosts, to give presents as validation. The sum of $546 was distributed among the guests. Realizing that it would be impossible to return such a sum by holding ceremonials in Fort Rupert, the home of the Kwakiutl, the leading Bella Coola decided to return the compliment immediately. The amount to be given was discussed at great length. Appreciating the courtesy of the foreigners in thus coming to pay honour to the deceased, it was not wished to insult them by giving a larger present, which would have had the effect of intimating that the recipients considered the $546 a trifling amount. Accordingly it was finally agreed to give the visitors about $300, which was done as validation of a Bella Coola ceremony at which the strangers were present. Thus the hosts allowed themselves to be shamed as a mark of courtesy. Not to be outdone in politeness, the Kwakiutl chief made a speech, expressing his willingness to allow the Bella Coola to drive him (this occurred in the days of horses and carts) to the wharf to take the steamer. In other words, he allowed the Bella Coola to put him in their debt, as they had allowed him and his party to do with respect to the distribution of money. The visit terminated with friendly relations maintained on both sides.

123 533 556 424 The need of validating every ceremonial act by presents can be further illustrated by the following instance. When the writer was in Bella Coola, a non-ceremonial entertainment was given one evening at which several men sang and performed. The writer was asked to sing a Bella Coola song, which he did in the belief that it was not one that was incorporated in the ancestral myth of anyone. Unfortunately, his teacher had erred, and as soon as the song was completed an old woman arose and stated that it belonged to her ancestral family. She avoided the difficulty of its singing by immediately announcing that the singer was her "son." Thus the writer was adopted into a Bella Coola family, a circumstance which aided him considerably in collecting information. This did not alter the fact that a ceremonial song had been sung. Accordingly, the woman gave presents to the guests, thereby legalizing the adoption, and saving herself from the disgrace of having one of her songs used as if it were a matter of no consequence, free to anyone. 123 533 556 424 [597]

SEATING

Presents are also a means of obtaining seats. Every Bella Coola has at least one name embodied in an ancient myth. A man who wishes to become a chief can do so only by giving lavish presents to make his designation "strong," "firm," or "bright," to use Bella Coola expressions. Such gifts increase the importance of the owner's name, and they obtain for him the right to a seat, more or less definitely located, in the house. Since all Bella Coola habitations are built on similar lines, a man can occupy his wonted position when summoned to a ceremony in any house. The validating of ancestral names and the acquisition of seats are among the important features which occur at potlatches. 554 556* [622] [424] [553]

In the beginning of time, when the first people were sent down to populate the earth, it is assumed that each who established a village, consisting of a single house, seated himself in the best spot within the dwelling, namely the central position behind the fire; his younger relatives ranged either beside him [773]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEb Bellacoola NEb

554 or sat in two rows, facing one another, on opposite sides of the 556 central fire, parallel to the side walls of the house. When these [773] first ancestors died, the name of each was passed on to some [551] descendant. The Bella Coola feel that he who bears the name
[171] of the first settler in a village should have his ancestor's seat. Comparison with the practices of other coastal tribes suggests that formerly the Bella Coola must have had a definite series of seats in their houses; either according to the rank of the occupant, or according to the rank of the ancestor whose name he bore. The most careful investigation, however, failed to show such a system of ranked seating. The only indications that such may once have been customary, are found in the feeling today that the bearer of the first chief's name ought to occupy the central seat behind the fire, and in the expression, "He seats himself where his ancestor sat," when a youth is given his place in the house.

[551] A seat can be claimed and an ancestral name assumed at any age. Goods must be given away which are said to be "covering" for the young man, to have "flowed away," or to have "become nothing" for the name. These validate the official assumption of the designation. With it is given a place in the house. A seat is chosen at the side of the fire, and the goods mark that spot as his in conjunction with the name.
[424] The seat itself is not material, though the general location on which a person shall sit is indicated. His "seat" is the goods that have been expended. Several men may have positions at practically the same spot, but when all are seated they merely move slightly so that all have room. There is no thought of one person infringing on the location of another. A parent who gives ample wealth at successive potlatches may seek for his son a seat behind the fire. Such is entirely his own affair and if sufficient goods are distributed the son may seat himself in that place, but if the gifts are of little value the occupant is secretly held in derision, as having a seat that is unsound, or unfirm. In later years the man may expend large sums in strengthening his seat; by so doing he wins recognition from all that he sits in an enviable spot, irrespective of its location in the house. 554 556 *

In precisely the same manner a man may take for himself a seat in the central part of the row behind the fire, but he is laughed at for endeavouring to assume a dignity, unworthily, unless he can validate his position by lavish presents. The Bella Coola are always ready to make fun of a person who fails to maintain his seat. On the death of the occupant of the central position it is taken for granted that whoever inherits his name will assume that location and give the essential presents, but it is not incumbent upon him to do so. He may choose to establish his new name at his old station, beside, instead of behind, the fire. Thus it has come to pass that the seat of the most important chief of a village is often at the side of the house. When all are seated the chiefs may be widely separated, and a parent may have obtained for his son a seat in a better part of the house than his own. But as a rule the chiefs sit in a row at the back of the fire, the most influential one in the middle. There must have been feuds when two men desired to seat themselves in the central position at the same time, but disputes about this were uncommon, because a man's seat was, and still is, primarily regarded as the intangible goods wherewith he is clothed, rather than his right to sit at any particular spot. It is these non-material coverings that enable a man to be bold and assertive in argument or suggestion, in fact to be a chief. A young man may have had conferred on him one of the noblest names, but his influence depends on the value of the goods expended on his behalf, subject of course to the universal characteristic that a man of forceful character may have more influence than his actual position warrants. [424] [428] [622] [424]

Jealous feuds are common when the man who owns the name of the first chief, first ancestor of a village, has duly validated it, but is being eclipsed in the giving of potlatches by a man whose name is of less intrinsic importance. Such a complication recently arose at Kimsquit, and the Bella Coola [578] [682]

NES Bellacoola NES

554 ascribe two murders which took place there in 1915 to jealousy 556 engendered by rivalry.

A chief who desires to have his son, or other near relative, [578] succeed to his actual seat may validate for him a position at [682] his feet. If several potlatches be given, with distribution of [622] goods for this purpose, it becomes recognized that the son shall take his father's seat. None the less, he will not have his father's influence or prestige unless he can himself continue to give away goods, because the power of a chief rests on this, not on his ancient name or the location of his seat.

553 Further evidence that a man's influence rests less on his 556 actual name than on the wealth distributed with reference to it is found in the lack of uniformity in the type of names validated. Those of highest potential importance are the ones brought to the earth by the first-comers, yet in many cases a man prefers to elevate his position with respect to a name of later origin. It is not uncommon for a man to validate several ancestral designations, and choose one of them to be his most important by valuable gifts for the seat which he occupies with respect to it; or in other cases a name of modern origin is selected and elevated. Thus, a certain Bella Coola chief who is the legal owner of the names Qoil and Xemlaic, two of the first people to settle this earth, has based his greatness on the goods expended for a seat with reference to the name Siddaelde, of more modern origin. It is accordingly clear that any Bella Coola can rise to a position of importance, even though he lacks the right to one of the most ancient names. Moreover, some chiefs prefer to validate several names rather than concentrate on one alone.

[622] Furthermore, a powerful chief can create a name. In this case the "power" of the designation rests, not in any supernatural origin, but in the actual wealth distributed. Two examples will serve to illustrate this point. Between 1880 and 1890 a chief was preparing to give a potlatch at which his nephew was to receive a name, when fire destroyed the village with the exception of his house. This added to the value of the food and goods distributed, since it was winter and the 553 people were in dire straits on account of the destruction of all 556 their stores. In consequence, the uncle decided to make a new name for his nephew, Ikûmi, "Charred Wood." By virtue of the goods expended this name became an honourable title, and was maintained by lavish presents. Any similar incident connected with a potlatch can be made the origin of a designation. Another example of a manufactured name is one derived from a peculiarity of the man giving the potlatch. A number of years ago a chief was jeered at by his associates on account of the frequency with which he had to visit the toilet. When next he gave a potlatch he created the name Ałpnl-a, "The Toilet One," and gave great dignity to the designation by presents.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Since a seat is valuable only on account of the goods ex- 554 pended in obtaining it with respect to a certain name, it is 556 obvious that names and seats are closely associated. A man who wishes his son to succeed to his own location in the house seats the youth, as has been described, at his feet. It may be a matter of years before he actually takes his father's position, but during that time he is treated with respect; he is still a commoner, but it is recognized that his parent considers him likely to "make good" and become a true chief by ability to give presents. Should he fail to do so, inexorably his influence wanes, in spite of his name and duly validated seat. He keeps the latter, but it is no longer considered one of importance. Thus, too, the course of names from generation to generation [551] is a series of curves; sometimes one is on a pinnacle of glory when "made strong" by a powerful chief, but in the next generation it may fall to the dust through ownership by a [195] weakling. As the Bella Coola express it: It has become hermaphroditized.

A woman is rarely established in a seat, and usually only [562] when a chief has no sons or other near male descendants. In such a case she receives an ancestral name and has the same status as a male chief. At the present time one important

554 chief had thus obtained a seat for his daughter, as well as ones
* 556 for his two sons. But usually a woman continues to use the 562 ancestral name given to her in infancy until she is able to [553] assist her husband in a potlatch, when a name is validated for her (see I, p. 410). The ancestral names of the first women to occupy this earth are reserved for women and, like men's names, vary in prestige according to the prowess of their owners. Most names given to children, though embodied in [551] origin myths, are applicable to either sex; and these are the common designations of women. Cases are known in which a woman has assumed an ancestral name if her brother has allowed it to fall into ill-repute through failure to give potlatches.

554 With such a fluid system, no fixed line can be drawn be-
* 556 tween chief and commoner. But after his fourth potlatch a 622 man's influence in the community has become so great that [352] he will usually feel justified in having the carpenters make for him a material seat. There is nothing to prevent a person having one made for him before he has given the requisite number of potlatches, but too rapid assumption may render him liable to the scorn of the community through his failure to show himself sufficiently "strong." The contempt shown [624] to anyone attempting to usurp too lofty a place is a strong deterrent to a proud young man.

[532] On the material seat are carved the man's ancestral crests, [352] in other words the forms in which his first ancestors came to earth, or some of the beings with whom they came in contact. To show these is a matter of pride, but unless the display is fittingly validated, the man's own dignity will be lowered, as well as that of his ancestors. Construction of a seat is particularly common when a man is establishing himself in the central position behind the fire, and claims this to be where his first ancestor sat. Others among the first people may have chosen seats in other parts of the house, and in these, likewise, a man who is taking his ancestral name may have a material seat constructed. Establishment in such a position increases a chief's feeling of mental superiority, as if strengthened by the age-long power of his ancestor. Finally, in old age a powerful chief is careless where he seats himself; his fame is so great that he can afford to disregard all conventions. 554 556* 622 [183]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

POWER OF CHIEFS

It will be seen from the foregoing that chieftainship among the Bella Coola does not depend on hereditary rank, still less on an elective principle, but on the individual's prestige as displayed, especially in his ability to acquire for himself a firm seat by the giving of presents. As he continues to do so his influence becomes ever greater. Consequently, it is impossible to state clearly what are the powers of a chief; such depend upon his prestige and influence. For a Bella Coola chief has no executive or judicial authority; what deference is shown to him depends on his success as a man, a factor which is constantly rising or falling.

The coming of the white man has enabled the Bella Coola to earn comparatively large sums of money by trapping and fishing. This in turn has enabled nearly everyone to give at least one potlatch, a very different state of affairs from that which prevailed in the last century when it required years of toil for a man to amass the necessary food and skins. Consequently, in many towns there were no men who had given potlatches, so that a man's prestige was estimated by the presents he had given at smaller ceremonies. Sometimes, moreover, a man preferred to increase his fame by giving rites of a different nature, such as kusiut dances, and the presents then distributed might elevate him in the eyes of the community, to a position above that of a man who had given a potlatch. This, however, was unusual. [431] [535]

After a fourth potlatch a man is accorded a position of eminence, and is termed a namitl chief. Namitl is an untranslatable word, with the significance of "passage," an allusion to the amount of goods which have passed through his hands. Jealous and vulgar-minded persons pun on the word, applying [578]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

554 it to the digestive tract. After a man has given four potlatches 556 he feels superior to those who have been unable to do likewise.
622 His name is "bright," "clean," "heavy," "firm," or "upright" in Bella Coola terms, and so, likewise, his seat. He feels independent and proud. Such a chief will fearlessly enter the back-[578] room where ceremonial rites are taking place, even if not entitled to do so.

"He is so strong, he can go where he will," say the Bella Coola.

The advice of such a man is taken because of his ability and prestige, especially by the members of his own family. A few years ago, for example, when a certain Bella Coola died, his brother wished a kaxiut name-prerogative of the deceased to pass to the dead man's daughter. The girl's mother's father, a numitl chief, objected, and his desires were followed, although the name in question was not connected in any way with his family. In small matters, too, people gladly carry out the [592] wishes of a chief. Work around the house is done for him without thought of disobedience. An old man was asked whether, when he was young, chiefs gave many orders and acted as masters in their households.

"You bet," the old man answered emphatically with a dry chuckle.

231 It is difficult nowto form an accurate estimate, from obser-552 vation, of the influence of chiefs solely through virtue of the 622 goods they have expended. But the following is a concrete example. In November, 1923, the writer, while walking through the Bella Coola village, was bitten by a dog. He was told that the animal belonged to a certain old woman. When next he saw the owner he asked her whether she knew that her dog attacked passers-by.

"Yes," she answered, in a matter-of-fact tone, "He is a chief and can do what he likes."

Further questioning elicited the information that the old [766] woman and her husband, the childless last survivors of an ancestral family, had transmitted some of their ancestral name to their dog, and had distributed presents to validate the bestowal. Consequently, the animal is a chief (see Plate 11)[1] and can do as he likes. When it dies it will be mourned as a chief. Moreover, a number of people have returned the presents which they received at the time the dog was made a chief, and this money is kept by the women and her husband, to be used when they perform the rite of mourning for the dog at death.

When this is possible, in the present degenerate days, it is not difficult to understand how, formerly, a great chief felt himself above the restraints that hindered lesser men. The last great Bella Coola chief was Pudoc, who died between 1870 and 1880. His influence and power were so great that he was a virtual ruler, daring anything. If he requested a young man to take his food box home and the youth was slow to obey, Pudoc had no hesitation in killing him on the spot. Such great power, though unusual, is intelligible to the Bella Coola, since Pudoc gave far more potlatches than any of his contemporaries. Other chiefs have been known to attempt a similar arbitrary use of power, but have failed, since their prestige was not great enough to justify it. The fame of a mighty chief spreads up and down the coast, and protects him and the members of his family from being ambushed and slain in any sporadic forray. During an actual fight, however, a chief had to take his chances with the rest, but the comparative immunity was a great advantage.

The Bella Coola recognize the fundamental differences between their own concepts about chieftainship and those of other coastal tribes with whom they come in contact. This point was mentioned in the course of conversation by several men. The most powerful chief known to them was Tsakoa, who, they say, was virtual monarch of the Kitkatla. None of his subjects could go hunting without his permission, and he had rights to a certain share of their bounty. At any ceremony presents had first to be given to him, and if he were slighted in this respect, he would kill the offender. It is be-found that all the Kitkatla chiefs were powerful, but Tsilx̂a was the greatest of all. It is said that one of his prerogatives was to exercise jus primae noctis whenever a Kitkatla was married. Without question, some of this chief's prowess have become exaggerated in transmission, none the less they show that the Bella Coola realize the great importance of the northern chiefs. Concerning their nearer neighbours, the Bella Bella, the Bella Coola understand the way in which the members of a family combine to help their chief in the giving of presents.[1] They say that the Bella Bella consider the Bella Coola practice of each one endeavouring to make himself a chief to be foolish in the extreme. Such is also said to be the opinion among the Kwakiutl, who support their contention that in Bella Coola all are chiefs, from the fact that flowing crests under the seats of all, whereas in Fort Rupert, their home, such occur only beneath the seats of chiefs.

Corresponding to the extreme paucity of functional possessed by Bella Coola chiefs, their prerogatives are likewise scanty. Indeed, they take their exclusive seats only during certain dances of the secret society connected with chiefs, at potlatches, and at ceremonial meals. These last occur whenever a deer or seal is killed; the latter is considered a great delicacy.[2] Anyone can kill a seal, but it would be unthinkable for a Bella Coola to share its flesh with his immediate family only. The animal is cleaned, the hole made by bullet or spear carefully plugged, and the carcass boiled whole in a large box. Meanwhile a herald (3, p. 344) summons the chiefs to the house where the successful hunter lives. If the meal is to consist merely of one small seal, only a few chiefs are invited, those of greatest influence through their possession of "strong" seats. When several seals have been killed, the number invited is correspondingly larger, but no woman may partake unless she ranks

[1] This is said to have been a personal prerogative, not shared by all chiefs, and requiring validation by valuable presents.

[2] Early issues of the city described in this paragraph were at the present time, in fact, the conservation of seal meat for chiefs alone was discontinued towards the close of the last century.

as a man by the daily validated ownership of a chief's name in his own right. Formerly a slave was never allowed to eat seal, unless he had been the slayer. If many seals are killed, chiefs from adjacent villages are sometimes invited. The chiefs seat themselves according to their proper positions and are first served with the blood-stained grease that floats to the top of the water as the meat is boiling. When cooked, the meat is cut into strips, measured in terms of so many finger breadths, according to the number of guests. The lots run down each fore-flipper, so that each receives a narrow strip including one of the toes. The head is always given to the herald.[1]

Wealthy chiefs frequently invite their fellows to ordinary meals even when no seal or deer has been killed. On these occasions, as at seal feasts, the guests are designated by their ancestral names, not by those in general use.

Chiefs are also accustomed to meet for the discussion of matters connected with the winter ceremonial; on such occasions their number may be augmented by men of influence in the secret society, though they do not rank as chiefs. Such a meeting is always called when a new member is to be initiated into the hamatsa society. If there is difference of opinion the influence of even a nemiff chief is outweighed by a man of importance in the society. The matter is discussed by all present and a decision reached by general agreement. It is difficult for a white man to understand how such is possible without either a vote, or general recognition by all that the views of some individual must be accepted. The writer was present at one such meeting, and was struck by the manner in which, after considerable, and at times heated, discussion, a consensus of opinion was reached, and accepted even by those who had proposed a contrary course.

Near every village is a place where the chiefs hold such meetings. All the inhabitants know the general locality, but

[1] Every effort was made to secure the accuracy of this account, but seven men have sought to an account of the length of time which has elapsed since the ceremonial was carried out in full detail.

622 there is such dread of the supernatural powers possessed by 623 members of the hamatsa society that none would dare go there.
198 If an uninitiated person should do so, he would formerly have been either killed or initiated into the society. The meeting-[575] place of the Kwaqa-ts chiefs is on a ledge of rock jutting out over a waterfall about a quarter of a mile from the village.
The stream winds down a narrow cleft of the mountain side, screened by dense vegetation, and suddenly falls into a cauldron, so hemmed in by cliffs that no sunlight can enter. The ledge is immediately above the brink of the falls, one of the most awe-inspiring places imaginable. The meeting-places of other villages lack such natural settings, though all are at the bases of cliffs, or near some easily distinguished feature. Some 198 of them are decorated with rude carvings, pecked into the 582 stone. The meaning of the designs is not known to any of 198 the present inhabitants. Some of them were made, long ago, by chiefs when they were composing tunes; they picked out the rock in time to the music forming in their minds. Others [211] were mere memorials of certain events. If a chief gave an important ceremony, he, or one of his friends, carved a figure, perhaps that of a man, perhaps of some animal connected with the rite, to recall the occasion. No carvings have been made within the life-time of any Bella Coola, so it is probable that they had further significance, now unknown.

622 When a chief wishes to summon his fellows for a meeting 623 he visits each and notifies him by a simple pressure of the foot, in many cases unobserved even by those sitting near. The 201 person so called slips away, unconversationally, to the meeting-place.

578 The position of chief was not without disadvantages in the 622 old days. The Bella Coola are so jealous that anyone who 623 succeeded in elevating himself to a position above his fellows became an object of envy. Their mythology contains many [582] examples of the murder of some powerful chief by rivals of his own village, and informants of today state that these records are true. One intelligent man asserted that his father had thus been slain about seventy years earlier. It appears that attempts were commonly made to kill chiefs by means of sympathetic magic, and it is quite possible that such attempts, becoming known, preyed upon the minds of the victims to such an extent that death resulted.

WEALTH

556*

Since wealth is so important in chieftainship, it would be desirable at this point to consider the concepts of wealth. Unfortunately, it is impossible to give a satisfactory treatment of this subject. The coming of the white man altered the economic aspects of Bella Coola life so radically, and at such an early period, that concrete examples of economic interdependence, so useful in a thorough study, could not be obtained in the field. It is possible that greater attention to this subject might have produced more satisfactory results, but I am doubtful of this.

556*

In the old days, "wealth" was of two categories: (a) Prerogatives, tangible or intangible, which could be shown, pictorially or dramatically, or could be expounded in words; and (b) Goods which could be distributed for validating such prerogatives. Individual possessions, unsuited for distribution, were hardly considered as wealth; a sewing-machine, a bottle of whiskey, a bed, or some other luxury might give satisfaction to the owner, but did not increase his importance in the eyes of his fellows. The value of objects was only for their use in ceremonial distribution; indeed, prior to such distribution, they were only of potential value. This attitude controlled Bella Coola economics in the early days of contact, and still influences their behaviour. A native store-keeper once ruefully commented on the fact that he would gain no advantage from the goods on his shelves, since he hoped merely to sell them, not to give them away.

184 standardized. Boys and girls helped their parents, and there 476 was no definite age at which they ceased to do so. The fluidity
* 556 of the Bella Coola system was contrary to any standardization. The more important a chief became, the more did he receive from dependent relatives, but the more did they expect in the way of "return presents." It was advantageous to be generous, within the family circle as well as without, since life was so public that every transaction even of a "private" nature, was well known. Unquestionably, a greedy and strong-minded individual must frequently have taken advantage of help from his housemates, but there was no strict code of ethics in regard to this. In brief, it may be said that the acquisition of wealth was an unstandardized, individual, matter; its distribution was likewise according to individual volition, although within a rigidly defined tribal pattern.

Susook Society

551 The ancestral names that chiefs desire to raise to a position
* 556 of eminence are usually embodied in myths dealing with the 575 first settlement of this earth, names which belong, as has been 614 stated, to the ancestral family. Many of these traditions record other designations as well, each of which carries with it [535] the prerogative of performing a type of dance known as susook. These will be spoken of, henceforth, as susook names. The Bella Coola do not know the meaning of this term. These [553] names, like ancestral ones, are the potential property of members of the ancestral family, but can only be assumed when duly validated by presents. Such an assumption follows a 553 period of seclusion in the back-room of the house. Both men
* 556 and women are eligible. A person may be secluded in this way 575 a number of times, acquiring a new susook name on each occa-[562] sion, but as presents must be distributed every time, it follows that only the children or relatives of wealthy chiefs can be so favoured. It is desirable to have the bestowal of a susook name occur at a potlatch, since guests from foreign tribes are then present, and the fame of the initiate is thereby carried farther afield than would be possible if only Bella Coola were in attendance. Every individual duly secluded and given a sisaok name feels himself ceremonially allied to others who have had a similar experience, and they form a grouping which may be termed the sisaok secret society. 553 556* 575

The close connection between this society and chiefs is obvious from the presence of names of each type in the same ancestral myths. None the less, every chief, that is a person with duly validated ancestral name and seat, is not a sisaok, unless he has validated a sisaok name for himself and undergone the period of seclusion. Conversely, a man may be a duly authorized member of the sisaok although lacking a seat and the other marks of chieftainship. The relationship is, however, so close that the Bella Coola think of the sisaok society as a society of chiefs. Sisaok dances take place at potlatches and funerals, and occasionally at gatherings of less importance. Difficulties arise at the death of a chief who has failed to use some of his goods for the acquisition of a sisaok name. Such a case took place at the death of an important Bella Coola in the summer of 1923. Theoretically, he was ignorant of sisaok rites, but after much discussion these were used on account of his importance as a numitl chief, an instance of the manner in which a man's personal importance over-rules ceremonial dictates. 575 622 [553] [535] [766] [185]

The Bella Coola believe that only some of their sisaok name-prerogatives came to this earth at the beginning of time with their first ancestors, and that many more have been acquired later by supernatural experiences. These were especially common among their forbears as they ranged over this earth seeking places to settle in the beginning of time. No sisaok name can be assumed casually; each must have had a specific origin. There are few sisaok origin myths, though theoretically there should be one to account for every name. The explanation appears to lie in the undoubted fact that many sisaok prerogatives have been acquired comparatively recently 424 551 575 773 [177]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

177 from the Bella Bella, a fact emphasized by all. It is not diffi-424 cult to understand, therefore, why elaborate myths are lacking, even if such were possessed by the Bella Bella. The Bella
551 Coola possessed certain similar rites to which the Bella Bella
575 prerogatives were in the process of being grafted at the time [773] of the coming of the white man. There has since been general decay of ceremonial life, with the result that the whole situation is in a state of flux presenting great difficulties to the investigator.

428 Sisaok names are willed and inherited in the manner already described for other prerogatives. The type of dance, and the 551 time of use, will be described in the following section of this 575 chapter.

* 556 It is unfortunate that an adequate treatment of Rank
128 among the Bella Coola requires a description of the potlatch since this ceremony, or rather group of ceremonies, includes a number of features which, logically, should have been postponed until a later stage of this monograph. An effort has been made to lessen references to non-ritualistic features by the description, just given, of the basic concepts of chieftainship and the sisaok society. Other ideas will require rather lengthy digressions, a method of presentation which seems preferable to the use of many foot-notes, its only alternative.

General Observations

* 556 latch" has been applied both to the public giving of presents, [431] and to the rites at which this occurs. But among the Bella Coola, such distribution of gifts is necessary at every ceremonial; accordingly, each is essentially a potlatch. There is one, however, which the inhabitants regard as the most important of all, the goal which every ambitious man aims to reach, the rite in which his ancestral myth can be displayed. In this monograph the term "potlatch" will be limited to this, the hm. 552 * [104]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

Every Bella Coola is, or should be, able to recount how, in the beginning of time, the supreme god, Alquntăm, caused his ancestors to be created in his house in the land above, whence they were sent down to populate the earth. A creation legend of this type is a man's most treasured possession.[4] Most myths describe the adventures of these first people, how they prospered in the Bella Coola country until they were able to invite to their homes guests from far and near, to whom they showed what they had achieved, through the assistance of Alquntăm, or of some other supernatural being. In so doing they were carrying out Alquntăm's wishes. He told some of these first people that if they accumulated much wealth, in those days chiefly food, there was danger that the provisions first stored would rot, hence they should cut away the bottom of the pile and present it to other men and women. The Bella Coola term for "to cut out that which is rotten" is ldt, hence the origin, according to their belief, of the word hm, which thus has the significance of "a giving away of long accumulated goods which otherwise might rot." 556 * 773 [424] [142]

By the splendour of his gifts each of the first people able to give a potlatch (hm), spread the knowledge of his name and fame to the towns whence his guests had assembled. Further, those who had received dances from Alquntăm were able to demonstrate them. In course of time those who had first given potlatches died, but on taking their fathers' names, the sons, or other descendants, endeavoured to uphold the parental tradition by inviting guests from afar and giving them valuable presents. At such a ceremony the family history, or family myth, was recounted, so that the donor of a potlatch not only increased his own prestige, he incorporated therewith the traditions of his parent. This is the essence of the potlatch as carried out today.[5] [574]

[4]Examples of them are given in vol. I, chap. vi.

[5]It has been found convenient to use the present tense throughout, although the potlatch is not now carried out in its entirety. [104]

556 Although guests from different tribes aresometimes invited 574 to other ceremonials, it is at potlatches thatthey are essential.
Since the validity of such transactions as marriages, divorces, [205] or the assumption of professional prerogatives depends on the presence of witnesses, and since the importance of such a rite depends on the number of witnesses, a manis always eager to carry out any public performance at a potlatch when he is sure of the attention of foreigners, and the consequent wider diffusion of knowledge of what he has done. The man who has invited guests is usually willing to allow others to perform at his potlatch, since it increases the complexity and importance [184] of the affair. It follows that no two potlatches are alike; one will contain features entirely lacking in another. Moreover, the wealth of the donor determines how many rites he himself will cause to be performed. The fundamental concept of the potlatch is the inviting of guests from abroad to witness rites [769] in connection with an ancestral myth, especially the return of a recently deceased relative of the donor to visit the living.

4 556 At any important potlatch the following rites are carried 796 out, and in the account of the ritual it will be assumed that these alone are taking place. If the reader bears this summary in mind, he is less likely to be confused by the complication of rites.

(1) The return of a dead ancestor to visit the living.

[575] (2) The initiation of young men or women into the susaok [553] society. This includes the validation of a susaok name for each, and a period of seclusion in the back-room. The initiates may either be relatives of the donor of the potlatch, or young persons whose relatives are taking the opportunity to carry out the rite in the presence of foreigners. Some of the initiates may already be members of the society, undergoing a further period of seclusion in order to increase their status by a further distribution of presents.

[554] (3) The payment by the wife of the donor and her family [858] of goods to "rebuy" her from her husband. This is a legal [583] fiction, though necessary to maintain the status of the children.

(4) The strengthening of the donor's seat. 556*

(5) The strengthening, or initial establishment, of seats for a number of young relatives of the donor who may, or may not, be those who are being initiated into the sisaok society. Other youths may also be established on seats by their relatives. 796

The duration of a potlatch varies with the number of rites being performed. The preliminaries, including the beginning of seclusion for sisaok initiates, requires at least several weeks, in some cases months. There is further delay of a week or more after the arrival of the first guests, as only when the last party has arrived can the actual potlatch begin. This can then be completed in three days and nights, although if many initiates are performing their sisaok dances, a longer time is required.

What are the consequences of giving a potlatch?

In the first place the donor spreads the fame of his name far and wide, also the myth with which it is incorporated. Thus he increases the renown of his ancestors, a source of intense pride and gratification. 556*

More important even than this, it elevates the donor himself. With the proper carrying out of the complicated ritual and the knowledge that his name is now known among different tribes, a man experiences a feeling of mental superiority which enables him to take a leading part in the affairs of his community. In Bella Coola a chief (stāltimx̣) is a person whose influence is paramount owing to his success in giving potlatches.[4] If several chiefs in one village have given potlatches, he who has given most is generally of greatest importance, although often a man of forceful character who has held, for example, five potlatches will be regarded with greater respect than one of lesser weight, even if he has given six. The whole system is exceedingly fluid, as might be expected where chieftainship depends on individual prowess. In theory, the man who holds the name of the first person to occupy a village, at [156] 556* 622 [554] [182]

[4]Particularly if he has given four potlatches and can accordingly be described as a nemit chief (I, p. 173). In sisaok songs the archaic word sātkemmx̣ is also sometimes employed for "chief."

* 556 622 the time the earth was settled, ought to be chief of that village. If he has been able to give the necessary potlatches to weight his possession of that name, the fact that he is the legal descendant of the first chief will add a certain amount to his prestige, but unless he has been able to do this his influence will be slight.

* 556 622 766 [775] Thirdly, potlatches smooth the way for the giver after death. Before the corpse of a chief is removed from the house where he has died, a speaker always announces the number of potlatches he has given and the total value of goods distributed at them. These gifts in a vague way are felt to make easy the deceased's path in the next world as they have done in the present. The feature of the potlatch, though firmly believed by some of the older people, plays a less important part in the life of the Bella Coola than might be expected.

*556 What are the requisites for giving a potlatch?

[424] (1) Possession of an ancient myth, containing a name or names. Probably every Bella Coola has this requirement. A man's family may not be the proud owners of one of the ancestral myths dealing with the first settlement of this earth, but they will at least own some ancient myth which they can elevate by giving a potlatch. As has been said, the owner of one of the most ancient names in many cases chooses to elevate one of lesser antiquity, a course which must, perforce, be done by one who lacks an origin myth. The slight feeling of defer-[554] ence with which those are regarded who hold the names of the first inhabitants of the earth, the mighty chiefs of old, is subordinate to the very real feeling of respect in which is held the successful giver of potlatches. The descendant of one of the first people has the potential right to chieftainship, but unless he can give potlatches he will fail to gain that eminence.

* 556 769 (2) An occasion for giving a potlatch is never lacking. It consists of a number of closely associated rites, any one of which will serve as a reason for the ceremony. The most important feature, the return of a dead ancestor or ancestors to visit the living, is available to anyone at any time. The Bella

Coolie say that the return of the dead "washes away grief," and unquestionably it has a comforting effect on the mind of the donor of the potlatch.

(c) Wealth. Unless a man has the necessary goods with which to make presents he cannot invite guests, no matter how important may be his ancestral myths and names. Some of this wealth he may be able to secure by his own labours, but unless he is assisted by his wife's family it is virtually impossible for him to succeed. The Bella Coola believe that a man cannot become a chief except through large payments made by a woman's family when they "buy" her from her husband. In other words, no man can succeed without the support of his wife. In choosing a mate a man is guided almost entirely by the ability of her family to give him financial support. In some cases an elderly couple assist a married son to give a potlatch; this custom, though considered quite proper, is not common.

(d) Supernatural assistance. To the Bella Coola this is quite as important as the preceding. One man may work very hard but his efforts are never crowned with success, whereas another man will prosper in every venture. This is due to the supernatural assistance given by the supreme god to the latter. By prayer, ceremonial chastity, and other means, a man may increase the powers granted to him, but if these are entirely lacking, he can never hope to rise to the position of chief.

PROCEDURE

In describing the potlatch, it will be convenient to refer to the donor as X, and assume him to be a middle-aged member of the coast society, whose age and name, though fully settled, lack importance through his previous failure to give large presents.

For a number of years X has prospered. He has secured quantities of skins, blankets, coils, copper ornaments, clothing, canoes, baskets, decorative shell, shawls, and other valuables

He is especially rich in cedar-skins, used for bark covering, and goat-skins, so treasured for their wool.* He and his wife have had no children dead, and, most important of all, his wife's family is wealthy. Rumours have spread that X will soon give a potlatch and perhaps one or more foreign chiefs has given him a large cone-shaped whistle, such as is used in sound ritual (see Plate [illegible]). These whistles, called gonx, are often referred to as the "breath" or "voice" of a chief; they are also called ilqoxm, the "heart" or "soul" of a chief, a third designation to reflection. X carefully conceals a whistle in one of his boxes. Such a present expresses the kindly feeling existing between those chiefs to one another to that they have risen to a position of eminence above the common crowd. To assign upon a man to greater efforts to amass the wealth necessary for giving a potlatch by keeping before his eyes the realization of what another has done. A real chief never gives such a present. X returns such whistle secretly at the time of his potlatch.

Early in the autumn X decides that he has almost enough wealth. To complete the essential amount he will not hesitate to borrow from his friends. It is most unusual to be refused, for it is incumbent on X, either to wishes to lose the esteem of the community, to repay his borrowings with heavy interest, and when X distributes his goods at his potlatch it will be announced how he has obtained them, and the lender is proclaimed as a person of sufficient wealth to be able to spare some of it. Goods so loaned are termed "bait-goods," a reference to the manner in which a man factors up his caps with a bait before setting to work. The assumption is that X will have to labour to repay his indebtedness. Failure to repay is a serious matter, and the lender would be justified in seizing a canoe or other valuable article as security for his debt. In fact, deals are commonly caused by unpaid debts. Use of business

* Formerly, also goat-skin blankets were kept, which were now sold to the [illegible] of the Nass having the most. Among the [illegible] to [illegible] are shown in work in canoe. ability are always seeking to lend goods to those who are planning potlatches or other ones, knowing that the investment will [226] safe and lucrative.

X uses his own discretion as to how much wealth is necessary. He knows how much he owes for presents received on previous occasions, and would not dream of giving a potlatch until able to repay them. Failure to do so would hold him up to the derision of the whole countryside. But he acts upon [226] his own judgment with regard to interest. If he continues to lend goods until he is able to repay with great interest, he gains prestige from his generous owners, but meanwhile he does not enjoy the distinction which would have followed a smaller effort at an earlier period. Further, there is the uncertainty about how much his wife's family will contribute, though this can be estimated with a fair degree of accuracy. In Bella Coola every transaction is made publicly, so each man knows the wealth of his neighbour. The favourite month for a potlatch is October, before the hunt begins, when there is abundance of food. At this season there is plenty of salmon roe, berries, and crabapples, all of which might be ruined by frost. Occasionally, a potlatch takes place after the hunt period, but in that case the only foods available are chicken grouse, smoked meat, smoked fish, dried huckleberries, and dried berries. If several men in one village decide to give potlatches in the same year there may be rivalry and dispute as to which shall be first. There is no satisfactory method of settling the point.

When all is ready X sets a herald (S.p. tsa) to summon his fellow villagers to his house the following day for ceremonies. It is customary for all to assign, but no social obligation is broken should a man or woman fail to do so.

The man moving to one side in his own house, knowing that free food will be distributed. While his expected guests are adorning themselves by washing and painting, X, aided by his family and others, prepares large quantities of food, [227] [227] [227] sently the guests assemble, those who are nuxuł wearing on their heads one or more weasel skins as a mark of membership in the society. Each takes the seat to which he is entitled, the chiefs behind the fire, or on either side of it, the commoners, slaves, and foreigners in the two corners nearest the door. The heralds move to and fro between door and fire, their constant exchange of remarks adding to the general interest of the affair. It is the function of a herald to lend dignity to chiefs by the tone of his observations, but should one fail to live up to his station, the herald is privileged to comment thereon. In some respects his position approximates that of a buffoon, but as a herald always receives valuable presents, the office is sometimes occupied by ambitious young men, willing to undertake the slightly derogatory duties in return for the substantial gain.

A number of young lads, friends or relatives of X, distribute the food. It is placed in boxes; an important chief is not called upon to share with any one, whereas six or seven men of no standing may partake from one box. These receptacles, with whatever food remains in them, are taken home by the guests; otherwise the host would be insulted. Many boxes are lost in this way, a source of considerable irritation. After the first course, a second follows, consisting of a different kind of food in another box, and in some cases there is a third, and even a fourth course. A chief must never appear stingy. The more he gives, the more does his prestige increase. Also, a man who gives freely receives abundantly, so that generosity brings its reward.

Now, the father or other male relative of X's wife, or a kamx friend who speaks for him, stands up and makes a speech, extolling the fame of his own family by sketching in general outlines one of the myths of his ancestors, and announcing that X's wife is calling to her husband some portion of it. This may be the prerogative of using a spoon carved, for example, with the image of a beaver; or a carved box, or a totem-pole with certain figures on it, or the right to use a painting of a grizzly bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral crest.

bear on the wall of his house, or an ancestral name. The speaker always recounts the whole myth before announcing which portion of it is transmitted to X as a prerogative. It is understood that this transference will be duly validated by presents to X when he gives his potlatch. Such are termed dzémènemtsum and signify the repurchase of a wife from her husband. Though this is known to be a fiction it has extreme social importance. Unless dzémènemtsum is paid there is an ineradicable blot upon the children; in fact, it is one of the essentials of a legal marriage. All prerogatives thus transferred on sléetsum become the property of X and will in time pass to his children, unless recalled to the wife's family by further repurchase (dzémènemtsum) money or goods. In this fashion elements of family myths become scattered, and one of the considerations in choosing a wife is to select a woman able to bring back some missing part of the husband's myth. 556* 425 583 [581]

The usual present is an ancestral name, which X henceforth uses as potlatches as his most distinguished title, though the myth in which it is incorporated does not belong to him. As long as the name remains in X's family those who originally owned it are unable to make use of it. Such a name is said to be "dragged across" by the wife to her husband, the immense weight or importance of the designation being compared with the dragging of a heavy log. Occasionally, the father of a married woman, animated by the kindliest feelings towards his son-in-law, may give him outright a myth with all the names embodied therein. This can happen only where there are no other survivors of the family. In such a case when the myth is recounted it must always be mentioned how it has been obtained. The number and type of the prerogatives transferred depend upon the sentiments with which his wife's family regard X. If, in addition to being a worthy man, he is member of their ancestral family, or of one with which his wife's has frequently intermarried, so that in course of generations prerogatives have intermingled, there is less objection to giving him such rights than if he were an unrelated individual. NEG Bellacoola NE6

556 A man may receive so many prerogatives with regard to house 425 painting that he has to continue the designs on the sides of his [605] dwelling, or he may receive so many figures for a totem-pole [592] that he can erect one of composite pattern. X may acquire prerogatives not only from his father-in-law, but from his mother-in-law, and if he is the husband of several wives, the family of each may contribute something. If, for some inexplicable reason, X is not given any prerogative from the family of his wife, he uses one of his own ancestral myths with the names belonging thereto. A man who gives many potlatches can choose to validate numerous family names for himself, or to concentrate on one alone, elevating it to a position of great importance. But any names he validates must belong to his

782 At this, or some other suitable time, X prays for assistance in the complicated rites that are to follow. Taking four pieces of pounded and dyed cedar-bark, and four pieces of undyed bark, he places on each a small quantity of food and throws the eight into the fire. Likewise he may throw in four small pieces of any kind of goods. As he does so he appeals to the supreme god:

"Please strengthen my spirit for the many duties which are before me."

Instead of praying himself, X may ask a shaman to do so [756] for him, in the belief that the latter's supplication will be more efficacious.

618 The necessity for supernatural assistance lies in the fact that any serious error or disaster in the performance of potlatch
628 rites calls for summary punishment, since X has allowed ceremonial cosmic knowledge to reach the uninitiated. In such a case the duty of meting out a penalty falls upon the members of a foreign tribe. Nothing is said at the time, but the departing guests take away with them information of what has happened. Great latitude is allowed as to who shall be the charioteers. The guests may be related to X and the members of his village, hence they will not feel it incumbent upon them to intervene. But news travels, and in course of time the nosad members of some other tribe will decide to send a raiding party against X's village. All informants agreed most emphatically that this custom prevailed among the coast people from the Tsimshian country to Alert Bay, but specific examples could not be obtained. The Bella Coola regard such a raid as the proper course to pursue, and belligerent tribes may have used an irregularity in the potlatch rites as an excuse for an assault. It is clear, however, that this custom never attained such prominence that it could be called a law. 556* 688 628

The following is an instance of the Bella Coola outlook on the question: 556* 688

The father of an informant had had such success in giving potlatches that his neighbours were jealous. On one occasion he prepared a representation of a whale, an elaborate wooden frame, fifteen feet long, operated by men concealed within and carrying passengers; this was a figure which entered into his ancestral myth. One of the carpenters who made it, bribed by a jealous rival of the donor of the potlatch, arranged that the lower jaw of the whale should fall to the floor during the proceedings. This revealed the mechanism of the structure. White influence on the coast prevented an incursion of foreign raiders, but according to this informant, the chiefs determined that his father should die, and they employed a sorcerer for this purpose. His father and eleven other relatives died soon afterwards. This man, the sole survivor, ascribes his escape to his adoption of Christianity. [578] [542] [578] [177] [754]

Another instance of the penalty which follows errors in potlatch ritual occurred a few years ago, when a number of young men used the cone-shaped whistles openly, as if they had been toys. The presence of the white man prevented any open steps towards punishment, but before long all the youths died. No one knows what caused their deaths, though probably they were due to an expert in black magic acting on the instructions of a senior nosad. [534] [177] [754]

After the prayer, X and his family give more food to their guests, whose boxes containing what they are to carry away are increasing in number. By his largeness, X increases his prestige in the eyes of his fellow-villagers. 556*

If he can afford to build a new house embodying the form [535]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

335 of one in his ancestral myth, he will do so; if not, it will suffice
* 556 to decorate the old house; but in either case the tasks connected with the construction must be allotted. X gives to one man the work of making new beams; to another, the two front upright posts; to a third, the two rear upright posts; to another, the planks along one side of the house; to a skilled carpenter, the totem-pole bearing whatever design X has decided upon; to a painter, one of the designs for the back wall of the house; to another painter, another design near it; to still another, part of the painting of the front of the house; to another, more of the same; and so on until he has allotted work for every part of the edifice. In some cases there are 342 peculiarities of house construction dependent upon their occur-
424 rence in the builder's ancestral myth, which are jealously
* 556 guarded prerogatives. One man, for instance, enjoys the right [773] to build five peaks above the front of his house. These represent the five peaks of Mount Nuqulc where his first ancestor came to earth (see Plate 13). Another has a series of spool- or disk-like indentations in his upright posts (see Plate 14) to support the beams, a prerogative established by his ancestor Qoil in the beginning of time. Another chief's posts are carved to represent a mythical creature. Still another prerogative is that of building a sloping board, resembling a gang-plank, from the door of the house to the ground, with a representation of a mythological sea monster at the bottom. In that case the theme of the grandiloquent potlatch song is how chiefs are attracted to X's house, as canoes are irresistibly drawn to the sea monster.

Each of the above-mentioned prerogatives belongs to one family alone; whereas several have the right to build semi-subterranean houses. The artisans excavate a rectangular hole, about six feet deep, equal in size to the central part of the dwelling. A platform is then erected round the sides of this, about three feet from the bottom. The walls of the house itself are raised sufficiently far back from the central pit to allow an unencumbered passageway, off which the bedrooms are built. The central fire is laid in the bottom of the pit, a few feet above that is the platform where the guests are seated, and the ground-level is a few feet above that again. A few instances are remembered of houses having been built with two, and even three, of these tiers, or platforms. In those cases it appears certain that this type of construction was embodied in a myth derived from Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people, where, according to the Bella Coola, large houses, of five or six tiers, were not unknown. 342 424 556* [177]

X uses his own discretion in choosing his workmen, avoiding only his own relatives and those of his wife. The question of pay is never broached, but it is understood that X will recompense those who have worked for him. The scale on which he does so will depend entirely on his generosity. This is one of the ways in which a chief helps the poor people of his village. More food is distributed to "sharpen the wedges." 335 556* 465

While a man is engaged on his allotted task any food or other articles which he or his family may obtain belongs to X. If a man who hews the planks takes his wife with him and she chances to pick berries while he is at work, these must be given to X who will distribute them with his other food at the potlatch, and it will be announced from whom he has received them. If a man's friends should help him to complete his task and then all go hunting, any skins acquired will belong to X; but when he repays his indebtedness he is expected to reward the worker, not only for his carpentry, but also for the berries or pelts. As X must give lavishly to prove his chief-like generosity, the collection of foods or skins by his workmen is profitable for them.

The guests have been passing in and out of X's house all day and towards dusk all again assemble within. Suddenly the door is burst open by a number of young men carrying a large log, like a battering-ram. The majority of the bearers are armed, though they may obtain assistance from those who are not members of the society. The people within the house spring up to eject the ram, and a sham battle ensues. Back- 552* [575]

* 556 wards and forwards sway the contestants with shouting and merriment, and those who have failed to carry away their boxes of food hasten to remove them out of the danger zone. It is a time of licence, and even one of the most influential chiefs may be struck by the ram or his food scattered without consideration. The ram is driven back, but those who bear it steer the log so that instead of passing out through the door it strikes the front wall, shattering some of the boards with their old paintings. With a shout they drive forwards again until part of the wall at the back of the house is likewise destroyed. Then those within the house gain the mastery and the log is carried outside, dragging its struggling bearers with it. They drop the log and return inside as if nothing untoward had occurred. This destruction of the house walls is a necessary preparation for their replacement with new paintings on new boards. When quiet has been restored a herald stands up.

533 535 575 * 556 Then the singers[1] beat out the tune of any kusiut. He whose song it is begins to dance, using the type of which he has the prerogative, but as the supernatural being with whom he has a ceremonial affinity is not present, the dance is not considered sacred. As soon as one kusiut has finished, the tune of another is beaten, and he too dances. The singers change from kusiut to kusiut, and please themselves about the order in which they shall dance, also about how many shall perform. This continues until late in the night. Then they beat out a nusuk tune and the member of that society to whom it belongs performs his dance, a non-sacred affair, like those of the kusiut. One after another dances as his or her tune is beaten out, until dawn approaches. Meanwhile several nusuk have been sent outside with a number of the large cone-shaped whistles used for nuxnk ceremonial. Towards dawn, sounds come from these, and sometimes a dull thump is heard on the roof, as if a heavy being had landed there. At once there is great excitement within the house. The voices of supernatural people prove them to be at hand. No one is allowed to leave except a nuxnk siki[9] who is skilled in dealing with Mulakila,[10] also called Sixsinqutnam, the supernatural being closely connected with the nuxnk ritual. Those within can hear the voice of the siki raised as if he were speaking to someone at a distance.

[1] Henceforth in this monograph the term "singer" will be used as a translation of the Bella Coola word, nuxlaxl. The singers sit together behind the fire. It is their duty to remember the tune and text of every song; to beat out this tune for every dancer and to accompany him by singing the words of his song.

"Chief, you have come too early," he says. "The house is not yet ready. Please return later."

He is answered by loud whistling, which grows fainter, as if the being who made it were moving away. In reality the young men are merely blowing less forcibly into the whistles.

[9] The accounts of all informants agree that much of the nuxnk ritual was newly imported into Bella Coola from Bella Bella. According to some statements, Paulus, a Bella Coola chief who died between 1870 and 1880, married a Bella Bella wife, also one from Rivers Inlet, and it was these two women who brought with them as dower certain nuxnk prerogatives. It is said that previous to that time the Bella Coola did not understand the use of the large cone-shaped whistles, nor were they able to summon the supernatural beings to the youths secluded in the back-room, nor to dispel the beings at the conclusion of the rites. On the other hand, some Bella Coola claim that their first ancestors brought the whistles with them from the land above. It is probable that the calling in of the supernatural beings is a recent addition to the potlatch, which accounts for the contradictory accounts, but whether or not the whistles are a new feature is more doubtful. It appears certain that the prerogatives of siki has recently been obtained from the Bella Bella. Siki means "the one who cures," and the name is given to the man whose prerogative it is to send the hesiut initiates to whom supernatural powers are learned. In Bella Bella there is a similar functionary for nuxnk matters, known as a hai-ulakila. Through intermarriage several Bella Coola have recently obtained this prerogative; in each case it is frankly stated that it has been derived from the Bella Bella. The Bella Coola apply to them, as formerly, the term siki, as they do for the hesiut "nurse," though the Bella Bella name, hai-ulakila, is used with equal frequency. The present siki have endeavoured to claim for themselves certain ceremonial functions formerly carried out by any nuxnk. In this account of a potlatch it is assumed that a siki is functioning on all occasions, but in many cases any senior nuxnk is considered sufficiently close to the supernatural beings to act satisfactorily. Until about 1870 it is clear that any nuxnk was regarded as capable of doing so.

[10] Knowledge of this being is said to have been acquired by the marriage of a certain Sasanax of Kimsquit to a Bella Bella woman in the beginning of time.

* 552 The sibi returns to the house and tells the guests that Mulakila has indeed been near and has promised to return later on. Those who are not nuxul, being steeped in the belief concerning the omnipresence of supernatural beings and ignorant of the carefully concealed whistles, readily credit the tale that they have heard the voice of a denizen of the land above, whose language is intelligible to the sibi. Thus is the supernatural element of the potlatch first called forth. [575] [781]

After a final distribution of food, the guests return to their homes.

THE INITIATION OF Nuxul NEOPHYTES

* 552 At a potlatch valuable presents are given to the foreign guests, but it is unthinkable for the donor to give to his fellow-villagers. Accordingly, if X desires to display his generosity towards them, he does so at a preliminary ceremony, when he begins the initiation, or re-initiation, into the nuxul society of any number of young people. After elaborate counting and re-counting of his goods, both those actually stored in his house and those promised,[*] X decides that he has sufficient to initiate, for example, seven neophytes. His first choice will be his own children, failing those, the sons and daughters of a brother or sister, or of his wife's relatives, or, if none of these are available, those of a friend. X does not gain any pecuniary advantage from such a transaction, in fact he loses, but the prestige attached outweighs this consideration. 575 [609]

"Is it not the privilege of a chief to be generous?" say the Bella Coola.

He approaches the parents of those whom he has selected, always members of old-established families. As it is to the social advantage of a young person to be a nuxul, a father usually tells X a nuxul name, dormant in his family, which he wishes to have conferred on his son, and how much he is willing to contribute for the purpose. In many cases, a man will [553]

request X to have his son initiated, promising him financial assistance. 556* 575

These preliminaries have probably been commenced before ellatum; at any rate they are completed as soon as possible, so that a few nights later X is able to instruct a herald to invite the sumi to his house. The singers are in attendance. The father, or other relative, of one of those about to be received into the ranks of the sumi, expounds in general terms the ancestral myth containing the name to be conferred, or will ask a fluent speaker to depose for him. Another follows, until myths have been recited for all. The singers listen attentively, knowing that without further instruction they are expected to compose two songs for each person, embodying a few salient points in the myth, without exposing the details. In point of fact, the singers have probably heard the myth on previous occasions. After a distribution of food, provided by X, the people disperse. [537] 533 556* 575

For several days the singers work at the songs. The principles governing their composition are identical for all types. At night, as he walks in the forest, or at any other time, a singer constantly tries to compose a tune. Others do the same, and at intervals they meet, either in some lonely spot or in the back-room of a house. Each singer who has composed a tune hums out its time, humming as he does so; then another gives his tune, and perhaps a third. After much discussion, which in some cases becomes acrimonious, it is decided what two tunes are the best for so-and-so. Words are then supplied, a matter of less difficulty, all the singers assisting. In this way the fourteen songs required are provided. When ready, one of the singers informs X of the fact.

X decides that on a certain night two of the initiates shall begin a period of confinement in the back-room of his house. This information is passed round in secret by the sumi, and the initiate, whom it will be convenient to refer to as Y, is duly warned. At dusk a reliable sumi is sent out to the woods behind the village with one of the large cone-shaped whistles.

538 This is presently heard. T may be in his own house, but at
* 556 once any number of sanek rush in and conduct him, concealed 575 in their midst, to the back room of X's dwelling. All the sanek of the village begin to gather there; those who are not members of the society are also free to enter the main part of the house, though they cannot take any part in the proceedings.
[781] They lurk near the door, watching with intense mind with fear, and ready to flee if the danger from supernatural beings seems too acute.

After some delay, a whistle is heard at intervals, gradually becoming louder as if the supernatural being, of which it is the voice, were coming nearer. Presently it sounds immediately outside the door, and a sisi rushes forth. He returns in a moment, followed, amid the breathless excitement of the assem-[779] bled, by a figure masked as a bird or animal. The design represents T's crest, or some creature with which one of his ancestors came in contact, and which is therefore regarded as having the same sociological importance. A member of the society has carried the mask, another wears it, but this the uninitiated do not know.

[776] "It is a tsetsemm,"[18] they gasp.

The figure crouches deadness and bends down beside the singers to whom it appears to be whispering. Presently they begin, softly, to say out a song in rapid time as if the supernatural visitor had just taught it to them. It is divided into two or three parts and the theme is taken from T's ancestral myth.[19] After two or three rehearsals, the singers beat out the time more loudly and accompany it with their voices, while [535] the masked figure dances. A number of other sanek accompany the performer as he whirls around the house; it is presumed that this is necessary to shield the spectators, though the real function is to guide the dancer whose sight is hindr-capped by the mask. If the sutsiwam represents Wasp* or Grizzly Bear, he does not make a circuit and a fluent xaxa explains that to do so would be unsafe owing to the ferocity of these animals. When the song is ended, the figure passes into the back-room. After a short interval it reappears, recrosses the house, and leaves by the front door, to the accompaniment of increased whistling.

A few myths embody two sutsiwam. In this case, a second figure presently enters and the same ritual is repeated for a second song. This usually differs, musically, from the first, being in three parts and with even more rapid time. More often, the second song is merely beaten out by the singers without the appearance of a sutsiwam to supply an obvious source.

This is the normal, but not the only practice with regard to a sutsiwam. In some cases the figure does not appear until after the singing of the first song, and the uninitiated are told that it has been extracted by the music. In this case it passes into the back-room, later to reappear and leave by the front door. An announcement is made that it has brought a strange power, that Y has become peculiar, and that his name is now, for example, Qwapmacila. A herald bears this news through the village. A second song is then sung in due course.

[776]

The sutsiwam is difficult to classify among Bella Coola supernatural beings. It appears in the form of an ancestral crest, but the xaxa do not seem to have taught the uninitiated to regard it as Y's actual forefather. It remains as a supernatural embodiment of his crest, a materialization of an element of family history, and a motive for the use by Y of a mask representing the apparition. The uninitiated do not seek further; they have seen a wonderful sight and are content.

178
825]

Several of the older xaxa stated that the sutsiwam concept was not indigenous to Bella Coola; it had been recently

*Some of the first people came to earth as Wasps, but several survived as mortals; hence these insects that they are regarded as crests by the descendants of those whom they sustained.

* 556 adopted, probably as a prerogative obtained through mar-575 riage, from the Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet people. The diver-177 sity in ritual supports this view. There was not sufficient [176] time for the procedure to become stabilized between the introduction of the concept and the dislocation of Bella Coola social life through the influence of the white man. It is also possible that the initiation was added to xaxa rites from the chiw a'ult society (I, p. 272).

532 Whatever may have been the history of the initiation, it
* 556 provides Y with a mask, or with two, if two figures have ap-575 peared. He guards them jealously, though secretly, throughout his life and uses them only on rare ceremonial occasions.
[769] It is one of these masks which will be brought out if one of his family gives a dramatic representation of his return after death.
[420] A mask of this type is sometimes willed, but the legatee shows the design before using it.

* 556 A short pause follows the singing of the second, or third, 575 song, during which some chief or chiefs may make a laudatory speech concerning Y's family history. Then the singers again [537] sing the first song, and xaxa members of the audience join in.
[533] Similarly, the second song is practiced. These two are sung, time after time, until the xaxa have thoroughly mastered them. When the singers consider that this has been accomplished, they call X, who communicates with the xaxa men outside who has the whistle, and again its eerie notes are heard.
[781] Some of the uninitiated, believing that the supernatural being who gives potency to the ritual is at hand, hurriedly leave in fear. At the same time some of the xaxa conduct to the backroom the second initiate whose songs are to be sung that night.
The procedure in his case is identical with that described for Y.
Usually it is considered sufficient to include two in one night, though there may be attempted. When the songs of the last have been sung, food is distributed and the people dispersed.

A few nights later the same ritual is repeated for two more initiates, who join their predecessors in the back-room. Then they spend their time in idleness, the only essential being the preservation of an air of mystery by keeping out of sight of 555,* those who are not sacred. Food is brought to them, and mem- 556

bers of the society are free to enter the room at any time. Some of the older ones enlighten Y and his fellows with regard to the secret rites, and especially to the human origin of the whistle. Proud of his new status, an initiate never dreams of communicating this information to those who are not members of the society. As a privilege, the neophytes are sometimes allowed to go out at night, care being taken that no uninitiated person shall see them. The length of the period of confinement varies according to the number of young people to be admitted, and on the actual time of the potlatch; the minimum duration is about two weeks, the maximum, four months. Sometimes the seclusion is lightened by the arrival of companions who have chosen this secret place to work at the sacred masks. After all the initiates have been confined to the back room, X [555] continues to invite people to his house at frequent intervals to practise their songs. On each occasion food is distributed, so that the meetings are expensive to the host, but no donor grumbles about it, as thereby he establishes his prestige as a chief.

THE CEREMONY OF SACRED MASKS

The next event is the validation of the initiates' sacred masks,* a ceremony termed ni'mdilim. X, with the assis- 553 tance of his family, piles on the floor of his house the goods 554,* which he intends to use for this purpose. In the old days these 556 consisted of skins, blankets, food, baskets, boxes, slaves (symbolized by stones), canoes (symbolized by sticks), and so on. Nowadays, money is used. Towards dusk a herald summons [553] the people to X's house. For many years it has been customary to invite everyone, but it is said that long ago only [557] the sacred would have been present. When all are seated,

* Explanation of the neophytes' masks is essential at the potlatch itself, but chiefs endeavour to display their wealth and generosity to their fellow-villagers as well. Consequently, though dances are eager to perform this rite, it can be omitted entirely without affecting the potlatch.

553 without special places, X calls upon some eloquent friend to
* 556 direct the distribution of the money. This speaker states how 575 X is carrying out the rites incumbent on his noble and exalted [537] station, how all honour him for so doing, and how all should strive to follow his example. He then says that to give strength to the name Snaqnacila, for example, X will give away, say $100. He further announces who have contributed this amount: perhaps $50 from X, and the other half from various relatives of Y. If the sum in question be large it is always mentioned from whom, and how the donor has obtained the money. Thus every financial transaction becomes publicly known, and the more prominently a man figures, the greater is his prestige. Next, the amount to be used for the second initiate's name is announced, with the same details, and in the same fashion the sums decided upon for each successive initiate.

Then the total amount is distributed among the giners by the heralds, under X's supervision. He usually gives every-[569] one the same amount; men sometimes receive more than women, but in every case members of the same sex receive an equal sum. The Bella Coola are not expert mathematicians, [569] so that faulty division is the rule. If X, for example, decides to give $1.50 to each person present, it is a time of considerable anxiety while the stack of bills is being reduced, to watch whether or not there will be the exact amount. If X finds out [442] he is short he will hastily borrow some money, as it would be [576] as much to omit anyone. If the amount be too great, he will use the surplus in making presents to the more influential guests.

With the exception of this possible surplus, the money distributed is regarded as an outright present; "it has flowed away to make good the boys' names" is the Bella Coola expression. A chief will remember how much he has received, and if he wishes to uphold or to increase his own dignity, he will make a point of returning at least an equivalent to X on some future occasion. But though in effect he may make return, such is never said to be the case. "The money has flowed away."

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)2948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

Poor people, white guests, or others from whom no return can possibly be received, share equally in the distribution; the money goes to all to validate the transaction. On the other hand, X expects that the presents, if any, made to a few individuals after the general distribution, will be returned with interest. In selecting the recipients of these he has been animated, first, by the necessity of repaying old debts, and secondly by his desire to make good investments in the shape of presents to those likely to show their chiefly nature by returning with heavy interest. No request is ever made for such repayment, but as the transaction has been publicly announced, a man fears to fail to repay, since that would lower his prestige. No one may refuse a present, no matter how embarrassing it may be. 553 556* 575 [558]

After the gifts have been distributed the songs of the initiates are practised. Members of the nuxsk society join in with the singers; the other spectators listen attentively, full of interest, but take no part. X with his helpers then gives food to all, and they depart. [533]

Before the coming of the white man a potlatch was a rare event, and nuxsk members were initiated at local gatherings. The period of confinement was the same as that just described, but instead of merely practising the songs during the interval, the initiates appeared and danced to them. It will be convenient here to describe that ritual, emphasizing the fact that at a potlatch, when the initiates can be confirmed in the presence of foreign guests, this preliminary rite does not take place. 535 556* 575 177

After the distribution of goods the singers beat out* the tune of any one of the initiates, and all emerge in close succession from the back-room, each wearing a blanket, without distinctive design, a collar of dyed and pounded cedar-bark decorated with pendant weasel skins, and the distinctive nuxsk head-dress (see Plate 15).[1] This consists of a circlet of grizzly bear claws, surmounted in front by a small forehead mask; from the inner side of the circlet there rise a number of sea-lion 292 535 556* 575 237

*The present tense is used for uniformity.

[1] [See ill. 116, facing p 218 - ANALYST]

292 whiskers over which is scattered eagle down. From the back of the head-dress hang weasel skins. In Bella Bella it is said to 535 be customary for a skin to be added on every occasion when a
* 556 nsaok is confined to the back-room. This may happen as many 575 as fifteen times to the child of wealthy parents, and a few Bella Coola have adopted the practice of marking each with a skin.
[237] Usually, some six or nine are hung in two tiers, without consideration of the number of times the wearer has been in seclusion. The central figure of the forehead mask is a head with [532] a hooked nose, the recurved hook being joined to the face itself. This figure does not vary with the wearer's ancestral myth, and no one knows what it represents. This design is [177] said to have been introduced to Bella Coola from the north a few generations ago; before that time the head-dress consisted [237] of a circular band of dyed cedar-bark, decorated with the tail [824] feathers of one of the large woodpeckers. The Bella Coola call it simply, "forehead mask." Each initiate carries a hollow [532] rattle, carved in the shape of a bird, which he holds in his right [534] hand, belly uppermost. Long, long ago, when a dancer failed to do so, the rattle became alive and the bird flew away; hence, this rule has been obeyed ever since.

535 Each initiate takes up his station in some part of the house behind the fire and dances to the beating of the sticks. The
* 556 left hand of each is clasped behind his back and in his right he 575 holds the rattle and keeps it in constant motion by shaking his wrist. Ability to do this is one of the marks of a good dancer.
Keeping the body stiff and the legs close together, he rises with slight jumps, barely altering his position on the floor. Sometimes he slowly turns around sunwise[1] in his series of jumps, at other times he does not alter his position. The head is bent from side to side and downwards at each jump, causing the eagle down to fly in all directions. Susak assistants blow more of the material on to the head-dress at intervals (see Plate 16).[2]

[821] [1] The Bella Coola believe that the sun moves from east to south to west to [796] north. Many ceremonial movements follow this direction, which will henceforth be described as sunwise.

As the dances proceed, those women who have the prerogative for doing so, utter a peculiar drooling cry. After dancing, the initiates return to the back-room, where they doff their attire. The ceremony concludes with the distribution of food.

The initiates are now free to leave their place of concealment, as each has become a legal member of the sound society. Some young men, sons of influential chiefs, are included a number of times, others but once. The oftener a youth is included, the greater is his prestige, because goods must be distributed on each occasion to validate his name. At the present time, there is considerable uncertainty about the exact details of the ceremony, for it has been so many of late years to give potlatches that the simpler one has fallen into disuse; some informants state that each initiate should emerge alone and dance by himself. This concludes the shaman ceremony, but with a potlatch the dancing is reserved until the coming of the foreign guests.

DELIVERING OF INVITATIONS

Returning now to preparations for the true potlatch, it does not matter whether the ceremonies already described are carried out before or after the departure of messengers to invite guests from abroad. Although X usually consults his relatives and friends as to whom he shall invite, this is entirely optional. In giving his invitations X is actuated, first, by a desire to entertain those from whom he has previously received hospitality; having accepted presents from them he must discharge the obligations or sink in social estimation. Considerations of friendship also enter into his selection, and he will likewise invite anyone whom he wishes to put to shame by a lavish display of wealth. It is taken as a matter of course that such guest will be accompanied by a number of followers, members of his family, slaves, or adherents.

Acting on X's instructions, a herald invites the people of his village to X's house. X stands up and announces to them [illegible] that he wants an audience, giving the name of a chief, to go, for instance, to Bala Bala, to invite a certain person, whose name he gives, to the potlatch. X thereupon names those whom he wishes to have the escort. In a small whistle is used, it is essential either that the chief himself be a senior crest, or that he shall go with him. It is immaterial whether or not all of the crew are members of the society. Nobody is compelled to go, but as all know it will be a matter of pride to X to recompense them, none decline except for some strong reason. X names those whom he wishes to present to other tribes, sending one canoe to each group of crews. He arranges that departure according to the distance each must travel, the aim being to have all the guests arrive at Bala Cloth at the same time. X is expected to provide food for his guests as soon as they arrive, and as the potlatch cannot start until all have assembled, X aims to ensure simultaneous arrival, so may hasten since the crew from which guests are invited extends from the Dean River to Rivers Inlet.

The mysterious and sacred nature of the potlatch is impressed on the minds of the uninitiated at the time of departure. When the chief who is to bear the invitation, and the members of the crew are ready in the canoe at the beach, there is heard from X's house the sound of a whistle. The uninitiated, unaware of the method by which the noise is produced, consider it to be the voice of some supernatural being connected with the potlatch. Either the messenger himself, or some assistant with him, blows a whistle. This can be done without exposing the method by putting the whistle to the lips under cover of a large blanket. When this has sounded the canoe is free to proceed.

The messenger-chief carries with him his small mask, which he does if he sees another canoe approaching, while angle down is scattered over the heads of the paddlers. These two signs intimate that the occupants of the craft are on essential business, therefore must not be molested. For a considerable distance up and down the coast the sacred nature of the potlatch is recognized as such an occasion that an attempt upon envoys is unthinkable, though one or two myths recount how the sanction has been violated on rare occasions. In some nearby potlatch messengers were sent to the other side of the island to give them the right of way.

On reaching the destination the canoe is brought in close to shore until the inhabitants of the village have gathered on the beach, which they notify by the arrival of strangers. The messenger sounds his whistle, the significance of which is fully understood by members of the coast society. Any chief who wishes to show his wealth and importance will invite them to his house. As they are landing, he sends a herald to summon a number of influential people of his village, who are themselves in their rightful place. As the messengers enter they are given seats on the bench behind the fire, the part usually reserved for chiefs. A number of fish are called in to be smoked salmon, and when the fire has been done the fish are broken into steaks by young girls and served to the messengers on a mat, in lieu of a table-cloth. The envoys do not deliver their message as soon as they arrive. On the contrary, they spend the rest of the day amicably talking with their hosts, and sleep in the house where they have been received.

The following day likewise passes without ceremony, but towards nightfall the host summons all his fellow-villagers to his house. The singers take up their customary place and beat out a theme tune. Upon hearing his or her air, the owner of it comes to dance. Using that one discretion, the singers beat out the tune of theme after theme, and each dances. In this fashion the singers beat out small songs, and the owner of each dances. Since the supernatural beings are not present, the dances are merely of a commercial, not a sacred, nature. When all have danced, each gives a present to the envoys. These gifts are not reversible. They are merely "taught down," but it is necessary that something be given to validate the dances. The value is immaterial, so far as the purpose is concerned, though a chief who wishes to exhibit his wealth [illegible] one after another of the concealed instruments, while the audience, consisting of adult alone, join in the singing. As the sounds drift out to the guests, they so beat out some of their well-known round songs.

At high tide, as the canoe (new now, carefully guided by poles and sailors, the crash coop down to the beach to meet the guests, but to a side, who now wears an apron of puffin [342] leaves and carries a rattle. The singers beat out one of his own and the old dances on to beach, while the supernatural whistle which has been coming from the back-room of X's house, is now heard as his side, blown by an assistant under cover of his blanket. After the side has danced, the singers among the guests, and there is always enough of them to make possible the beating out of the better known tunes, sing one of their side's songs as it dances on the platform surrounding the canoe.

The Bella Coola side, surrounded by a group of crash, now begins to turn about in a frenzied manner, always curvine, bending down, then straightening himself, twisting and writhing like a maniac. Finally, reeling over, he pounds to down something, as the large side, and then falls to the ground. The assistant makes the motion of catching something heavy, and as the canoe one of his accomplices in the canoe sounds another crash whistle, deluding the uninitiated observers into the belief that some power has been concentrated, which is the cause of the strange noise. The reeling side revolves four times, twisting and bending, then straightens up and throws back his cloak, to expose a crash representing thunder. This is been concealed there all the time, but the uninitiated really believe it to be the creature which has made the noise, so far that it is an object miraculously made by this being. The side revolves four times more, with the crash in plain sight, and the whistle constantly blowing, while a Bella speaker "explains" the meaning of it all to the uninitiated who are anything with interest from the background.

The reception of this power from his Bella Coola confidant enables the guest ełki to dance at X's potlatch, if he so desires. In that case the guests are guided to X's house without further delay. X, however, he does not wish to dance, he goes through the motions of throwing something back to the Bella Coola ełki, who pretends to catch it. He bends down, twists himself about, then throws back his cape—to display there the representation of Mitlitelis. At the time of throwing, the visiting ełki had slipped his mask out of sight, so that those witnessing the ceremonies, ignorant of the fact that the recipient has had an identical mask hidden beneath his cape throughout, are suitably impressed. He now sounds four times, while so concealed, shelterd under a large cloak, sounds the whistle constantly. Thus the ełki makes the motion of throwing something to X's house, and also that the whistle sounds from within, while the man who had been throwing one bottle the ełki comes. Thus the uninitiated are led to believe that the voice can proceed only from the place where the power over which the ełki has control is situated.

The guests are conducted to X's house, to which a number of young men carry their goods. A meal of smoked salmon, provided by X, is served to them by a number of youths, all of whom are eager to undertake this task throughout the ceremony. A section of the house is allotted to each party of guests, and within that space they arrange themselves according to convenience. Some informants state that the first group to arrive is seated nearest the fire. The whole of these invited are not placed according to rank. The amount of space allotted to each party of guests depends upon their number, and there is no particular choice made of a section in the house. X, or more often some one who speaks for him, welcomes the guests, and a spokesman from among them makes a suitable reply, usually with the assistance of an interpreter. After the meal, the guests are remain where they are or go out. As many as wish to do so may in X's house, but many prefer to go to the homes of their friends in the village; it is a matter of convenience, not of ritual.

In the evening, there may be no rite of any kind, but X often invites everyone to his house for the performance of non-ceremonial dances. The singers strike up one of his ceed or e'ell (2, p. 279) tunes and he dances to it. Then a tune belonging to one of his relatives is learnt out, and he too dances. After several have thus performed, a meal is served and all depart. No supernatural beings are in attendance, hence there is no solemnity to the occasion; the evening's rites merely serve to show the guests the dances owned by their host and his family.

In each party of guests arrives the same procedure is repeated. X provides food for those who have assembled from day to day, so he anxiously awaits the last-comers. When at last they come the guests from all other towns are in their allotted sections of X's house, and are free to make gifts as the mettlesome of these begin to appearing. Occasionally, hard feelings are engendered in this way, although it is an established custom to mock at the last to arrive. They are themselves and a small amount of food is given them.

[illegible]

Two youths, chosen by X for the purpose, sprinkle eagle down over the heads of all those present, so far as possible blowing it first over the chiefs. It serves as a token of good will, and marks also the ceremonial nature of the occasion. Then a leading ceed, perhaps a ele, stands up and says to effect:

"Thank you for coming. You are welcome. We thank you for coming to witness what X has done. He is delighted to have you here, because he has lost many of his relatives and wishes to perpetuate their memory. They would be grieved if he did not do so."

An elaborate meal is now served by a number of young men.

* The first course is dried salmon mixed with eulachon grease. The fish is first placed in boxes, approximately one to every four persons, though a chief may be honoured by an individual box, and the grease poured over it. As always, any food not consumed is carried away. Failure to do so would be an insult to X. Then round wooden dishes are distributed into which are poured the berries of Vibernum panciflorum. The waiters pour eulachon grease over these and the mixture is stirred with wooden spoons. These two foods are invariably the first meal of a potlatch.

* If the ebi of the last guests to arrive has not returned the power given him by the Bella Coola experts, he now stands up and shakes his cards as a signal that he desires to start his dance. The Bella Coola ebi also stands up, and the visiting ebi centres himself and finally proceeds to produce something from his stomach, which he throws across to his colleagues. The latter begins to catch it, even half loudly several times, and makes the motions of hurling when he has just received into the room at the back of the house where the initiates are concealed. Then he sits down. Meanwhile the last-to-arrive party of guests have started to hum out the tune of one of the "small" songs of their own ebi who dances in time to it. Then another song is hummed out and another member of the party dances, and so on until all have danced who desire to do so. Each wears his own headdress and each performs in the manner already described. After the dancing, the members of this party of guests give presents to X and other Bella Coola chiefs. There is no fixed ratio between the value of the gifts * and the rank of the recipients, though chiefs receive more than lesser men, and X most of all. These presents are specified, which may be translated as "angle down-ness," namely a mark of friendship and goodwill. They are not returnable. Goods so received are distributed by X with his other possessions at the potlatch, care being taken not to return them to the donors, which would be insulting.

[illegible]

After receipt of these presents, the ulki of the penultimate group of guests shakes his rattle, and exactly the same procedure is carried out by members of his party. Then, too, give presents to X and the other Bella Coola chiefs. The same rites are carried out by each party of guests in the reverse order of their arrival. It is frequently near dawn before the first-comers have completed their dances and distribution of gifts. X then gives another meal to all, with no restriction on the choice of food. This concludes the night's ceremony, and the guests depart, except those who are staying in X's house.

THE FOLLOWING MORNING

Considering the lengthy ceremonials of the preceding evening, it is not surprising that on this day no one rises early. The guests receive their breakfast in the houses where they are accommodated, and meanwhile a number of young men gather in X's house to assist in the preparation of food for the main meal of the day. During the previous night a large amount of smoked sturgeon grease has been put to warm on [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the last songs they have made for the initiate, and any of the sacred members of the audience desiring to "help" the initiate dance to them, even X himself on occasion. By "help" no material aid is indicated; such dancing merely displays a friendly and sympathetic interest. The initiate, resplendent in sacred head-dresses, appears at the door of the back-room, and sometimes dances a few steps. Occasionally, at the conclusion of his song, a bad's parents, or other relatives, bring forward the goods which will be later distributed by X to the guests. On other occasions, this is reserved for the following day. Food is distributed and all dispersed.

[illegible]

On this, one of the two most important days of the whole ceremony, the following rites take place.

During the Day

(a) Communication to the foreign guests of the new sacred names of the initiates concealed within the back-room; these names are the ones that have been made known to the Bella Coola before the potlatch proper.

(b) Payment to X by the relatives also with's family of the goods necessary to ransom her from kidnapped.

During the Evening

(a) Dance-rites by X of three sacred ancestors of his own village.

(b) Return of a dead relative of X to life.

(c) Distribution of presents to explain this appearance.

(d) In some cases, dancing by some other sacred initiates.

Early in the morning X gives each of his guests a washbasin with the other necessary appurtenances for cleaning up, and towards noon all of these invited remain in his house. Three river canoes have been brought ashore and are ranged, two parallel to the side walls, and one parallel to the back wall, all far enough out to permit people to sit behind them. Boxes containing large quantities of red ochreous and alachem grease have been placed in readiness. X selects as many youths as the number on whom he intends to confer the names which have already been announced and validated among the Bella Coola, but are now to be made known to the foreign guests. He seats the lads, who are to substitute for the initiates, on the various boxes. Everybody understands that these are merely representatives. X requests two chiefs to act as his announcers, choosing two with good voices and abundant self-confidence. To one of these X whispers the sacred name of one of the initiates.

"His name is now——" calls out the announcer, pointing to one of the substitutes, and the listeners readily recognize the initiate intended, from the use, in conjunction with his new designation, of his well-known ancestral name. The heralds repeat the new name with the usual bellowings, so that it becomes well known to all present. In like manner the sacred name given to each initiate is publicly announced. The substitutes receive no advantage from their part in the proceedings.

Then the boxes are opened and red elderberries poured into the canoes in front of the guests. Boxes are provided with which the visitors pound the fruit into pulp which they proceed to mix with their hands, as clarified grease and cranberries are added. Then X's helpers distribute spoons and the feast commences. All start to eat, but after an interval one of the leading Bella Coola chiefs strikes the side of his canoe with a spoon, as a signal that all must stop. X has several dishes in readiness. If he is wealthy some of these will be carved in the shape of beaver, eagle, or other form to which an ancestor appeared. These dishes are filled with the food which all have been eating and then placed before the principal chiefs, who thus have a second supply. At this point the singers begin to beat out an ancient song of the type known as ts'ela. Each of these has been handed down from the distant past, when some chief, ancestor of X, had it composed for himself as a potlatch. The theme is always about the form or fame of his [illegible] earliest ancestors, and the text is commonly grandiloquently phrased.[illegible] Frequently the singers alter the words slightly to suit the occasion, and sometimes compose entirely new words for an old tune. As they sing, they are aided by some of X's friends who rise and stand between the fire and the front door. They occasionally wear forehead masks carved with his name to add dignity to the rite.

After the song the chiefs continue their meal, and there is much practical joking with the heralds.

"Don't you want some food?" X calls to one of them.

Without waiting for an answer he throws a box containing the liquid pulp, inclined at such an angle that the name is spattered over the recipient. Occasionally, a herald will succeed in catching a box without spilling the contents, but usually he is smeared from head to foot, while the spectators shriek with laughter. It is one of the functions of a herald to be a laughing stock for the visitors.

During the afternoon X's wife and the members of her family deliver to him the goods which they have amassed to "redeem" her from her husband. These are called "wedding material," as if they supplied X with wedding and other necessities. The speaker states how the wife has lived up to her obligation in making this preparation, and how it will clear the path for her children. These goods will have to be distributed by X. They can be used for:

(a) Repayment of potlatch debts, or

(b) Making potlatch investments, or

(c) Validating names, either assumed or inherited, for the children of his relatives.

It would be most disgraceful should any of the goods be applied to validating assumed names for any of X's own children, because they have come from his wife's people and must be to the advantage of her children in any case. These goods are [illegible] X [illegible] [illegible] X's wife's family. A question on this point was regarded as highly amusing. If used for investment gifts, the presents received in return are given to X, not to his wife's relations.

A speaker, acting on instructions from the brother or other member of X's wife's family, also announces what names, portions of myth genealogies, or other privileges the a borrowing on his husband. After that the people disperse, although they are free to remain the house, where, during the afternoon, arrangements are being made for the elaborate ceremonial which takes place that night.

Towards dusk the guests reassemble and take their places as before. Part of the goods which X proposes to give away has been brought in, and, aided by members of his family, he begins himself recounting and making final plans for its distribution. As the Bella Coola have no system of writing, the correct division of goods at a potlatch causes considerable difficulty and worry to the donor. If slighted guest will feel aggrieved, and the social nature of the rite will have been subverted to insult if arrangements are not satisfactory. The first business is the settlement of debts by X to the members of his own village. He may perhaps have borrowed fifty blankets six years previously from a certain individual whom he now intends to repay, with foreign goods or blankets to the value of fifty. X always endeavours to reciprocate with as large a premium as possible, because by so doing he displays his stability of mind to the assemblage. But if he can repay only the amount borrowed, or the same with a small increase, there will be no credit such as might even should he fail to repay at least the principal. When the debt has been settled with interest, the matter is at an end, for there is no compulsion upon the man who receives the additional sum to repay this with interest in his turn. The amount previously lent, and the occasion, are always publicly announced, so that all are made aware of his generosity with regard to interest.

In Kitsegukla it was customary at this stage of the proceedings ings to reward carpenters and others who had helped X prepare for his potlatch, but in Bella Coola this was usually done the following night.

Now comes what the Bella Coola regard as the most important feature of the potlatch. The singers strike up one of the songs of a senior sonnt, perhaps a sila chosen for his skill in acting. As he dances, clad in his ceremonial costume and head-dress, whistling is heard without the house. A number of sonnt are making the noise and they modulate it so that it appears to draw nearer and nearer. This is effected either with whistles of different sizes or by blowing harder. The dancer rushes out of the house. The whistling continues in a series of short bursts, as if a conversation were being carried on in that language. The sonnt or sila returns, and the audience, allured by the mystery of the affair, listens to his explanation:

"It is so-and-so," he announces, using the ancestral name of one of X's deceased relatives. "The crest has come to pay his son for whatever relation X may be to him[] a visit. I will bring him in."

While he speaks, continuous whistling is heard from without, but when he leaves the house it once more takes on the form of a dialogue. Presently he returns, followed by a masked figure in the centre of a group of members of the sonnt society. If the deceased's first ancestor had been an eagle, in that guise the figure will appear—an eagle mask on his head, and his whole body, except perhaps the feet, covered by a large blanket thickly covered with eagle down and furnished with painted wooden wings. The dancer is usually entirely blinded by this costume, but he is guided by a number of the sonnt whose presence is attributed to the necessity for guarding and paying honour to the supernatural visitor. Among those who accompany him there is always a man with a whistle, the note of which simulates the cry of an eagle, with this is sounded at intervals. The actor bends in imitation of a bird and shakes himself, lifting his head and opening the movable beak by means of a hidden string, while the whistle sounds. Then he stoops down and hops a few steps eagle fashion. Slowly, with pauses and turnings around, the figure circles the fire and exits through the front door, always accompanied by a number of sound. The actor displays considerable dramatic ability, and the performance is striking effective in the large, plank-built house, illuminat only by a smoky central fire which casts flickering shadows over the intently watching audience. The dogs, alone unimpressed by the solemnity of the occasion, shuffle to and fro.

If a whale is represented, a large wooden frame-work is carried by several men who walk inside of it. Raven, bear, or other animals may also be used, according to the ancestral myth of the deceased. Some of the first people came to this earth as men, but there have always been a sufficient number of intermarriages to permit everyone to possess some bird or beast, obtained from the family into which an ancestor married. A supernatural object claimed to have been seen by a forefather can also be used on these occasions. In some cases a composite figure is used. Such may have the head of an eagle, a killer whale projecting from the back, and a raven on the chest. In such a case these three creatures have been connected with the ancestry of the deceased, and he spirit is believed to have assumed these forms. Great individual choice is allowed in such matters.

If several of X's deceased relatives are being commemorated, the sound of whistling is again heard from without, a short time after the departure of the first masked figure. A senior sound goes out, and the same ritual is repeated. This time the masked actor represents some other bird or animal. Thus, as in some cases four, dead people are thus shown, though one is more customary. The actual management of the figures is left to the direction of the carpenters who have made them. Often a foreign workman is employed, as a mark of respect for his skill. In spite of all precautions there are often delays about the final preparations, especially with regard to a conglomerated figure such as a whale, and in that case an expert dancer among the guests is called upon to perform. It is announced that this is, "to make clean the road for the dead."

After each masked figure has disappeared, the sound of whistling from without grows gradually weaker, as the apparition returns whence it came. In solemn silence X takes a copper* which he has had in readiness, breaks it across his knee,* and throws it either into the fire or down on the ground in the exact that the figure has taken. Then the announcer calls out loudly:

"It is for his crest.* It has 'made home for the dead.'" Then he continues, speaking for X and using the first person:

"My heart is glad at seeing my father.* At death he returned back on the path of my family's ancestors and donned our ancient crest. He now lives in Nuxalk-a, whence he came to visit us and whither he has now gone back."

The significance of the throwing down of a copper is entirely unknown to the modern Bella Coola, although they still perform the ritual. In some vague way it is felt that "home," which may imply stability, has been provided for the deceased. The act thus appears to be light of an offering to the dead, but this sentiment is not clearly appreciated by the participants in the rite; the present has been made for, rather than to, the one being mourned.

The copper, now valueless, is picked up by any chief and given to a poor man.

After a short interval a number of youths begin to distribute presents, provided by X, which have been placed in readiness. Gifts of equal value are given to all foreign male guests, while the women receive cups less valuable. These presents

*Many of the plaques of native copper, such as were formerly hammered out and used as tokens of value by the ancestors of British Columbia. Their employment by the Bella Coola will be described later in greater detail (L.p. 108).

are strictly non-returnable, being regarded as "eagle down,"* and having, therefore, a ceremonial significance. They validate and mark the importance of the representation just displayed. They are spoken of as having been shaken off by the deceased as he departed to return to his home above. 556* [769 43]

If there are many sunk initiates concealed within the back-room, some of them may now be called upon to dance, but usually this is reserved for the following night. Unless some of those included are going to dance, food is distributed and all dispersed. [575 535]

THE FESTIVAL: THIRD DAY

This is the day when presents are given and, with the previous, is the most important of the whole ceremonial. The following are its features.

During the Day

(a) Distribution of much food, and sometimes of insults to the guests by excessive presents, or by the destruction of valuables. [575]

During the Evening and Night

(b) Dramatic representation of some object connected with X's ancestral myth.

(c) Distribution of presents by X to recompense the craftsmen who have assisted in the potlatch.

(d) Repayments by X of gifts received at previous potlatches.

(e) Giving of presents by X to some of his guests.

(f) Distribution of presents to strengthen X's seat.

(g) Distribution of presents to strengthen, or establish, seats for a number of young men.

(h) Dancing of the sunk initiates. 550* 575

(i) Distribution of presents to recompense those who have assisted the sunk dancers.

(ii) Distribution of presents to validate the sunk dances and the names thereby acquired by the initiates.

*The Bella Coola says that the Kwakiutl term for this is ma-a-gan.

556 [575] (11) Dismissal of the supernatural power possessed by the [illegible] initiates, thereby enabling them to return to normal life in the community.

556 578 191 All day, food is being distributed in X's house with guests in almost constant attendance. Not only are large presents of food made to any chief who has previously shown generosity to X, but he also takes this opportunity to bestow insults on anyone from whom he has received the same. Among the Bella Bella and people of Rivers Inlet guests were frequently ridiculed with respect to their habitual diet or mode of life. Unquestionably, the Bella Coola sometimes did likewise, both at potlatches and at hamat rites to which strangers were invited. Although it is dangerous to dogmatize on this point, because the practice has long since fallen into disuse, it appears highly probable that mockeries were less prevalent in Bella Coola than at other places on the coast.

556 558 628 It is comparatively common, however, for a chief to shame a guest by a lavish disregard for valuables. News is constantly passing from town to town, so that the intended victim usually hears what is in store for him. A guest always takes valuable goods with him when he goes to a potlatch, but one who expects to be insulted takes care to have an unusually large supply. The host seats this particular visitor close to the fire, and during the afternoon or early evening he throws large quantities of grease and food upon it, to demonstrate "the warmth" and "fineness" of his house. The guest experiences physical discomfort from the extreme heat, and suffers mental pangs at having a rival boast of his power and fame. To assert his own importance he will throw goods on the fire, as if they were water to extinguish it, and the host will counter by throwing on more valuables. The contest is continued until the goods of the guest are exhausted, or the host fears to burn more lest he should not have enough left to validate the potlatch. He who has destroyed most is considered to have shown his superiority. [578] The Bella Coola state that such rivalry was unknown between chiefs of the same village.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

The following is an account of a feud which took place about 1870: 556* 558 628

The people of Sunel had gone to a potlatch at Tâl-ès with a plentiful supply of goods, expecting to be insulted in revenge for a slight cast upon their host when visiting Sunel. They were allotted places close to the fire, upon which the donor cast a large quantity of olachen grease until the intense heat almost roasted his guests. Not one of them moved; to have done so would have meant an admission that they were being made uncomfortable by their host's demonstration of wealth by this waste of valuable food. Presently, Sunâlatle, the leading chief of the visitors, stood up and called for "water" to douse the flames, messing goods of equal or greater value, to indicate that he was as wealthy as his host and as little afraid of destroying valuables. His companions threw on the five boxes filled with skins, but Sunâlatle desired still further to demonstrate his prowess. Hastily, he asked some of the other Bella Coola present to lend him a sea canoe (of the large type called Haidâl), promising to repay [591] with two of the same kind. The Bella Coola agreed and the craft was carried in, the bearers showing their disregard for the host by breaking his door as they did so. The canoe was thrown on the fire and the flames mounted. Sunâlatle called upon his Tâl-ès rival to douse that fire. The latter was afraid to do so, being aware that he had barely enough goods to pay his debts at the coming distribution. Accordingly, he tacitly acknowledged the superiority of Sunâlatle, who thus rose in public esteem.

It is very difficult to discover just how often such destruction of goods took place. The Bella Coola realize that the prevalence of this practice among the Kwakiutl led to the potlatch being forbidden by law, and are reticent on the subject. Reliable informants agree that it was a fairly common custom in the early days, although it never went to the extremes prevailing at Fort Rupert and Alert Bay, where, too, was common the breaking of coppers in anger, an act unknown in Bella Coola. In other respects, also, the potlatch among the Bella Coola appears to be less important and less complicated in ritual than among the Kwakiutl, so it is highly probable that the above statement is correct. 556* 558 171

Another method of shaming a guest is to serve him, or any member of his party, so clumsily or gracelessly with food that it is spattered over him. In some cases this happens acci- 558 556*

*554 dentally, but the sentiment is that the guest has been "dis-555 tend." To cleanse himself he gives presents to the lowlife of his host, and perhaps to some of the host's fellow-villagers, thus showing that he too is in a position to demonstrate his chief-like nature by a distribution of goods. The host usually takes the hint and is more gracious in future.

A man can render himself liable to ridicule and insult by saying that he is about to give a potlatch, and then failing to do so. Influenced by his announcement, those giving potlatches have showered presents upon the prospective donor, and if he fails to carry out his plans he will undoubtedly receive insults. Such a man, if he is wise, will carry with him to potlatches large quantities of goods to throw on the fire of his host, or to give to his host's lowlife, or to use in both ways.

Thus the afternoon passes. When the people, including *555 those who are not members of the sound society, have assembled in the evening, a dramatic representation of some event connected with X's ancestral myth is common. A similar performance has sometimes taken place on the first event on the preceding evening. The ceremonial rite is connected with a whale and can be performed by those whose first forefathers came to this earth as whales, or by those whose ancestors obtained the prerogative by marriage with people who owned it. When all are seated, a number of young men rush into the house carrying with them a tree-trunk roughly hollowed out to represent a whale. The cry is raised that the animal is about to vomit, and at the same time large quantities of grease are thrown on the fire by assistants on the roof. The subterfuge is realized by all. None imagines that the whale actually throws up the grease, but the comparison is drawn between the massive oozing grease because it is fat, and a chief throwing away wealth which lesser men would consider of great worth. A display of this kind increases the fame of X, the concept being the usual one, that he has demonstrated his nobility of mind.

Now begins the distribution of the large quantities of goods which Ṡ has amassed. These have been collected to form [illegible] near the fire where he, aided by members of his family, is constantly poring over the question of their proper distribution. One or two Bunsi chiefs have been chosen by Ṡ to act as speakers, and, as he tells them which gift is to be given to which rajah, the speaker holds up the article in question and announces the name of the recipient. It is also proclaimed from whom, and for what reason, Ṡ has received such assortment of goods, thereby making known the names of those who have contributed. In this way a man is glorified who has repaid with large interest a debt owing to Ṡ. In the case of skins or rolls of cloth, the goods about to be given out are held outspread by several people at their full length, prior to being torn into strips. Each beneficiary accepts what is coming to him from the hands of the young man who act as deliverers without displaying either gratitude or disgust, whether or not the present comes up to his expectations. The point of view is that the matter concerns Ṡ alone, as his generosity depends his status in the community.

The few gifts distributed are actually payments, though [illegible] never referred to as such. The Bulu Cada consider that Ṡ is under obligations to those who have helped him prepare for the potlatch and that he is discharging these obligations by presents. The carpenters who have made the new house, the totem pole, and other objects used in the rites, must be rewarded, likewise the singers who have composed the songs, the messengers, the women weavers, the masked dancers, the announcers who even now are distributing the goods, the boys helping with the cooking, the guests who make speeches—one and all have to be compensated. It is no serious task for Ṡ, as he must not overlook any of these functionaries. Paper and pencil are now used to assist the memory, but long ago the only aids were bundles of sticks. No system of symbolism was evolved, each man merely chose a stick and designated it in his mind as a reminder to pay such or such an individual. The skill shown by those who assisted, as well as the generosity of Q, explains the disbursements.

The following presents of money were given as a potlatch held about (Dec), and were considered reasonable:

For painting one designed on the front outside wall of the house	$ [illegible]
For the erection of two upright posts, supporting the walls and roof of the house	[illegible]
For each longitudinal beam with painting	[illegible]
For each cross-beam, without painting	[illegible]
For the planking of the side walls[1]	[illegible]
For painting the rear wall of house, which is also the outside wall of the back room[2]	[illegible]

The average totem pole would cost perhaps $ [illegible], but the price varied greatly with size, complexity of design, and skill displayed.

The main distribution is of goods to heavy debts which Q has incurred in previous potlatches, that is, to return "invitation presents" then received (I, p. [illegible]). This is known as tsiqlas, "repay," and the word is applied to all kinds of money-entry, including coverage. One of a chief's difficulties is to remember his indebtedness. He may have been a guest at twenty potlatches, and at each has received presents varying in value, not only from different donors, but from other people associated with them. To keep these accurately in mind is hard but essential, and parents carefully train their children to do so.

As previously mentioned, the Bella Coola have no fixed scale of interest on debts. Careful inquiries made on this point disclosed the idea to be entirely foreign. The greater the interest, the greater does the donor show himself to be. If, for example, Q received an interest-present of one hundred blankets from a Bella Bella chief ten years previously,

[1] When we are present, that is, the left of the outside door is seeing perhaps the [illegible] side, that is, the right the outside.

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] non-repayment does not affect the standing of the donor in the community. The giver expects no return, but should he come to financial straits he would have no hesitation in walking out from the Bella Bella chief. He expects, however, that the latter will contribute to the expenses of his funeral. This would be optional, as repayment of a non-commercial present concerns the donor and recipient alone, without dues on the status of either in the community. In this instance, if the old man had died soon after his son, his debts would not have been paid, since there were surviving no immediate relatives. Some or other non-kinsmen always settle the debts of dead persons out of family pride, but it is considered more improper for the creditors to think about repayment. By giving they have shown their power, the question of return is the concern of the family of the deceased creditors.

Very rarely can the donor of a potlatch fail to secure his investment events except through oversight. In spite of every precaution errors occur, and these are said to be caused either by a supernatural being, itself invisible, rising between the donor and its guest, hiding the latter, or by Snqamdu, there speaking into his thoughts. Unless the donor wishes to insult a guest he will give him presents here or, and then seek his money. But if he does not do so, the slighted man may remain his foe, and thus feuds are often generated that may last to no between tribes. About 1880 it is said that a conflict between the people of Bella Bella and Rivers Inlet was caused that way. In the autumn of 1911, a Bella Coola chief turned up dancing at a Bella Bella potlatch, although it was commonly known he did not have the necessary goods for distribution to relatives he dance. The boats would actually, moreover, assembled by means, and only the presence of many tribes was prevented bloodshed. Relations between the two tribes are still strained as a result of the incident. The Bella Coola chief was subject to spells of insanity, and dared during one of them. According to the Bafia Costa, the Bafia Bafia should have taken his two sessions, along with the man's generosity on previous occasions, and overlooked his nastiness.

Cases have been known of a "stupid" man endeavouring to increase his prestige by giving many potlatches when unable to pay his debts. Such a man is laughed at for his stupidness, which is not the attribute of a chief, and is given only small presents.

It must be clearly understood that debts publicly incurred, to allow much investment presents received at any ceremony, must be publicly returned, if the debtor is to gain the public esteem granted to one who pays back with interest. But everyone cannot give a potlatch; hence any young man desirous of returning his obligations, and of rising in public favour, can do so at a potlatch given by somebody else. Guests are present from abroad, so his discharge of indebtedness is made known further afield than if he had done so at a local gathering, and the donor has the additional satisfaction of being able to give to those strangers. Sometimes as many as ten young men will ask X for permission to pay their debts at his potlatch. Such is never refused, because it means more ceremonial, and greater interest, which indirectly increases X's prestige. A young man who has been taken to a foreign potlatch as an adherent of a great always receives presents, and if he repays them with interest his name begins to become known, especially as his return payments are announced. It is thus that a man whose clearly name (or names) has been dormant for generations, can begin to restore it. Thanks to presents he gives at X's potlatch, he will in return receive large gifts, until finally he is able to give a potlatch himself. After X has paid his own indebtedness the debts of others are settled. In each case the speaker announces the amount received on each and each occasion and the amount returned. Thus all present are able to estimate the generosity of the payer, a clearly overhaste. When a young man plans to give his first potlatch it is necessary for the elder chiefs of his village to advise whether he has sufficient goods, though every man is understood to be master of his own affairs.

After paying his debts Ṭ will be many heavy expenses in connection with the coming marriage, and the young people for whom he is obtaining units. Goods for these purposes have been put on one side. The remainder he now proceeds to give away as investment presents. His exhibition of ancestral pictures, and the guise in which his ancestors are now living, as eagle, raven, whale, or such like, have been duly validated by the presents given on the preceding evening, and his social status has been saved for by the payments to his craftsmen and other creditors. These investment presents are not mere dole, though a man always endeavours to give them, both for economic and social reasons. There are no definite laws regulating their distribution. Ṭ is guided in his choice of recipients[1] by the following considerations:

(1) If a certain chief is likely to give a potlatch soon he knows that a present given him will be returned with interest.

(2) He desires to give something to a chief from whom he has often received favours.

(3) He wishes to ingratiate himself with a powerful chief by presents.

(4) He wishes to give presents to a chief with whom he is not on friendly terms. Unless the latter reciprocates, it will be considered that Ṭ has shown his superiority.

(5) Usually an inferior chief will receive more valuable presents than one of lower rank. This custom is not governed by any fixed scale, and an inferior chief may be differentially slighted, if Ṭ thinks that he has not shown him, Ṭ, sufficient respect.

It is considered the height of folly to give presents without due regard to their return.

The amount of gifts depends entirely on the wealth and status of Ṭ. If he wishes to increase his fame, he will make

[1] Men are apt to give to men who happens of the same or some to one here. The Tlinkit [illegible] to give right to one kinsman.

[illegible] to give valuable presents, but he need not give any. It is a deep disgrace to any man to be unable to return these presents. Nothing is said, nor does the donor take active steps to receive his return, but the influence of the recipient powerfully works. It is expected that a heavier rate of interest will be paid on presents received many years before repayment, but again this is a matter of individual volition. The debts of a man who dies while owing for goods received or gratuities are scrupulously discharged by his family. If they fail to do so, their own influence is lessened.

One method of reducing the value of an investment present can be used by a man who feels unable to repay a large gift. The uncle of an elderly Bella Coola was once guest at a Kitimat potlatch, where he received, as an investment present, a few large canoes and one hundred blankets. Not willing to incur so large a liability he at once returned fifty of the blankets to his host for distribution among the guests. Consequently, he was expected to make return for only one hundred and fifty blankets, with whatever interest he desired. This action enabled a host to gain his prestige, since it acknowledged his inability or unwillingness to repay his present. The chief in question, being firmly established in his chiefly status, did not fear to do this, though one of lesser rank would have hesitated to confine his interests.

It is on the value of the goods distributed in these three types of presentations, namely, recompense for work done, repayment of debts, and investment presents, that the importance of the potlatch, and consequently of a chief, is usually judged. These distributions of presents are for the potlatch as a whole, including the return of the dead and the intangible prestige of a. The questions which follow are to validate specific connections which can be contrast. In one or two families the whole course of the potlatch is changed, since the members have the prerogative of distributing their presents outside the house. In such a case the giving is done during the day instead of at night. Details of this kind, which is said to have come as a prerogative obtained through marriage with a Kwakiutl woman, were not obtained.

When the distribution of investment presents comes the strengthening of Ｔ's own.

His wife, aided by members of her family, has placed the necessary goods in readiness, though it is presumed they merely happen to be on hand. Ｔ herself takes his place near the door, and another behind the fire. Beside his latest-born a child, seated in a small hand-drum, who represents Ｔ. One of the bandits calls on this substitute to come forward, as if he were just entering the house, and shouts:

"There is no place for him to sit!"

Then he turns to Ｔ's wife, saying:

"Do if you have not a fire ready in your room to strengthen him."

The word for "strengthen" is ulalkiwa, or gilkilkiwa, which means "dusting up," as if Ｔ were nodding on his chair the bandit. The words have the other significance of "clothing." They represent the ceremonial dignity wherewith a chief is garbed.

Ｔ's wife goes to her room, or to the place in the house where his goods are stored, and brings forth a large assortment of valuables, which are piled in a convenient spot. The substitute who is representing Ｔ then places himself in the latter's seat, which is to be made more solid by these goods. Ｔ's wife says to the bandit that they have still more goods for him, and he then says to his wife:

"His son is on hand. There are no self-chiefs for it!"

The wife brings forward more goods to make her husband's son more considerable. The bandit, who has been chosen for his fluency, uses his originality to urge his wife for more the wife, self-chiefs for the son is merely an example. In some cases, more presents are given, in other cases, if the wife and her family be poor, there are but one or little more. It is not essential that foreign guests witness this establishment or strengthening of a son, though their presence means that Ｔ's

The family of Y keep telling the bewilds that they have more goods, so that he knows how long to continue to complain about Y's needs.

As soon as all the available goods have been piled up, they are given to the guests, who are witnesses of the validation of the name and sent to the house. Theoretically, the value of the present received by each is not affected by the rank of the recipient. Y decides whether or not each guest shall receive a present of the value, or whether one shall receive more than number. Owing to the difficulty of accurate estimation of the amount required, there is often a residue, which is given away to the more impecunious clients. These goods are strictly not accountable. They are spoken of as having "become nothing," with reference to the name and sent to question.

Exactly the same procedure is carried out for every young person whom Y wishes to assist or to validate in his own. Parents take advantage of a potlatch to "strengthen" their children in this way, and Y never refuses a request for participation. It is always announced whence have come the goods for distribution, so that Y receives no direct increase of fame. If they have been provided solely by the relatives of the youth, but, indirectly, his prestige is increased through the transaction having taken place at his potlatch.

It is at this time to that other names are validated. There will be usually a number of infants whose parents wish them to receive their first child names, such as are incorporated in the family myths. Likewise, men may be conferred to their occupations, as warriors, singers, or other professions to which success, according to the Bella Coola, depends upon the good-[illegible] expended in their establishment (I, p. 49).

Throughout all this ceremonial the initiates have been carefully concealed in the back-room. They are now eagerly, though with trepidation, awaiting their time to dance. The order of appearance is a matter of no importance. It is arranged by the singers, who send word to one of the initiates and then begin to beat out one of his songs. He emerges, clad in a ceremonial blanket, wearing a small head-dress, and holding a cane in his hand. Taking up his station behind the fire he dances in time to the beating of drums. As he does so, the speaker calls upon X's wife to bring forward goods to "cover back more for him to stand upon," or "cover back more to make wife his own." These are piled in some convenient spot. After dancing, the initiate retires to the back-room, accompanied by one of the older members of the secret society, perhaps a relt. This man presently emerges, saying:

"It is more peculiar. He might be there now."[1]

At the same time a whistle sounds from the back-room, in imitation of the scream of an eagle.

There ensues a constant interplay of remarks between the humble and those regulating the ceremony. One of the former may call out:

"Let us see it."

The elder returns to the back-room, saying, "I will bring it out."

Then now emerges a figure modeled to represent an eagle, or whatever bird it pretends it may be, with a long blanket covering all but the feet. Any clever dancer is employed to wear this disguise, seldom the initiate himself. The "eagle" bends down beside the singers as if whispering a song to them, though in reality they have themselves composed it. They sing this as the masked figure moves around the fire, imitating the gait of an eagle with considerable dramatic skill, while an some, due to the ceremonial costume, including a long cape with pockets. With him come the four or five young men who have just finished dancing. The singer then rises formally with their sticks, and the old chief stand and sound, nothing himself into a frenzy with voices and gestures. Gradually he approaches one of the initiates, and pretends to pluck something from his body. To be sure the hands the spectators see that there is something in them, what exactly, they cannot distinguish. Only those who are well acquainted know, whenever it is, it has been pulled from one of his cape pockets. He pretends to throw his object upwards, at the same time dipping it back into his cape. As the article is, theoretically, thrown into the mouth of initiating to hearts, which gives rise and makes it literally comes. Meanwhile the hands discourse loudly with one another about how the "night" or whatever it is has been connected, and is now wearing above. The same procedure is repeated for the other initiate. This concludes the night's ceremony. Food is distributed and the people dispersed.

The employment of a foreign chief to expel the power from the initiate is necessary since his particular prerogative is not native to Bala Cada. Formerly the neophytes was then in the hut room without any elaborate ceremony. This the native the admission of initiate into the youth society although they cannot yet leave the hut room. It must be understood, however, that a youth may be initiated several times, on each occasion receiving new songs and perhaps a different mask. In this way his prestige as a youth is increased, and the use of a powerful chief will also be initiated on a more times. A mask is supposed to preserve in consciousness in the personal property of the owner who may use it as protection in future occasions. It will be the guise in which a dead person returns to visit the living. When being used for this purpose, a mask may be worn, or rather as a sort adjunct of the dressing, the slightly above the painting before using it himself.

It is somewhat difficult to understand the attitude of those [illegible] anything other than material dances or a representation of the dancers. Usually, the feet are plainly visible, and the spectators cannot fail to realize they are looking, not at an eagle or other supernatural creature, but at a man. This no one ever expresses the doubt. It must be remembered that all are finally convinced of the close relationship existing between dancers of the bird dance and members of the ceremonial society. To the uninitiated this is proved by the whistling. They regard the figures as supernaturally endowed representations of those beings with whom the participants are able to come in contact. A sophisticated Bella Coola Indian thinks exactly as that of a man praying before images of the saints, fully realizing that these are only inanimate objects, yet mentally experiencing a feeling of close contact with the saints themselves. Another expressed it thus:

"The uninitiated are trained to believe what they see. It would be most improper for them to voice any doubts, in fact they do not have any, as this is their belief in the supernatural power of the members of the ceremonial society."

This has appeared to be the real explanation. Everyone must have his or her doubts, but each is afraid to express them, realizing that so doing would not only offend the chiefs, individually, but the supernatural powers with whom they are so much, which is obvious from the whistling that accompanies the ceremony. It appears that the uninitiated have no idea how this is produced.

[illegible] CONSIDERATIONS AND [illegible]

[illegible] The number of ceremonial initiates is usually too great to allow all to dance on one night. If possible, this is done, but if not, on the following evening most of the initiates perform in the manner already described. The distribution of presents and the acceptance of gifts from the young ceremonial also follow the same line. If many of them are activated, three or even four, nights may be required until the last one has danced, and the last dancing has been performed.

There now remains only the necessity of removing from the house itself the supernatural power with which it is firmly believed to have been impregnated throughout the many nights of the ceremony. Should this not be done, it would be so strong that only ozoli could thenceforth live in it, and no further rite could be performed therein. One of the senior chiefs, acting on X's behalf, requests as many ziki as are present to go to the back-room. At the same time a drum is beaten slowly. The ziki call out loudly, in unison, half four times. The whistle sound from the back-room with overbearing intensity, as if the supernatural being, whose voice they are, were going away. It is said that this practice has been comparatively recently adopted from Rivers Inlet: there used to be nothing of the kind. The ziki re-emerge, and one of them stands behind the fire with his stick which he leans on the floor and calls on the audience to shout with him, "Ki ...." This is done four times. It serves to purify the house from the supernatural power with which it has been saturated. The people then disperse, without food.

Goods from the general store are reserved to pay those men for their services, and also for cleansing the initiates from the powers with which they have been infused, a rite that takes place the following morning in the presence of several ziki alone. The initiates are brought from the back-room and seated in a close circle between the door and the fire.* A foreign ziki is chosen by X to perform the actual cleansing rite. He has been asked beforehand and has come provided with a long pole and some soiled clothing. It is immaterial whose this is, provided that it has been in contact with a human body; the most potent articles are ceremonial cedar-bark pads.

The ziki covers the young man with a large cedar-bark mat. Then he fastens the clothing or pads to his pole and holds the end in the fire until they are smouldering. Then he swings it four times over the heads of the initiates and throws the stick with the objects back on the fire. In some cases four sets of cloths are used. This rite, which is regarded as very important, frees the lads from the supernatural powers with which they have been endowed, and permits them finally to leave the back-room and return to normal life, just as their earlier cleansing freed them from the initiation. During their period of seclusion no initiate can perform a bona fide ceremony of any kind. The supernatural beings of the two societies, though closely akin, are yet independent, and it would be unthinkable for a man to come into contact with the two at the same time, unless he should be the owner of Raven prerogative enabling him to do so. Only a few men have the right, which undoubtedly was derived either from the Bella Bella or the people of Rivers Inlet.

It pays the functioning ulu with new clothing. This completes the whole ceremony. The guests either return home or adjourn to some other house where a potlatch is taking place, but no item mark their departure.

Such, then, are the principal features of the Bella Coola potlatch. Without making a careful comparison of its features with those of neighbouring tribes, the following points stand out with great clearness:

(a) The basic concepts of the potlatch in Bella Coola are the same as those of the two practised elsewhere on the coast.

(b) A potlatch has not the same importance at Bella Coola as it has on other parts of the coast, especially among the Kwakiutl. All informants stated repeatedly that they did not carry their potlatches to the same lengths as did the "foolish" Kwakiutl, nor were they as keen financiers. A Bella Coola would never entirely impoverish himself by lavish giving.

(c) The potlatch, though fundamentally the same as it is elsewhere on the coast, has certain area characteristic of the locality. The central Bella Coola feature, the return of a dead ancestor, is not equally important elsewhere. It would be interesting to be able to trace the history of this. The most probable conjecture, and it is impossible to make more than a conjecture, is that it is a concept which has developed among the Bella Coola in association with their specialized theology and has been incorporated into the potlatch complex. On the other hand, the return of the dead may be an old feature, developed in other tribes through the ever-increasing economic aspects of the potlatch, which are of less import in Bella Coola. Whether or not Mulkulla is of Bella Coola origin is questionable; he may be merely an altered form of a supernatural being found among other coastal tribes.

(a) The potlatch concept, that is, the necessity of distributing presents to validate every transaction, and to establish a man's status, is an old custom. The whole cycle of Bella Coola thought supports this view, and it is to be expected from the prevalence of the same idea among other coastal tribes.

Unquestionably, the introduction of white man's tools has made it easier to give a potlatch. In the old days, as informants reiterated again and again, it was a matter of years to save up the material skins and goods, so that a potlatch was a rare event. Now a man is able to work in a cannery for a single season and earn enough for an elaborate ceremony. Accordingly, most of the old names have been duly validated, whereas long ago some of them might have lain dormant for generations. The descendants of old, influential families smile readily:

"Now everyone is a chief," they say.

It appears that the facility for giving potlatches has increased the feature of the destruction of goods, in fact that this is little more than an increment on the ancient ritual. Thus it may be said that the coming of the white man has facilitated the giving of potlatches, has somewhat changed their form, but has not altered their concept.

CHAPTER V

FEATURES ASSOCIATED WITH THE POTLATCH

Heralds—Totem-Poles—Coppers—Professional Prerogatives—Folk Dances—Miscellaneous Ceremonies

138 #556 THE ritual of the potlatch is so complicated that, in order to present a coherent account of it, it has been necessary to omit entirely some features that occur at many potlatches, and to refer briefly to others. This chapter is devoted to an elaboration of these points, thus avoiding the use of lengthy foot-notes in the preceding chapter.

Heralds

203 #556 The principal functions of heralds[1] have already been described. They go from house to house inviting the people to assemble for the different ceremonies connected with the potlatch, but that is only one of their many duties. They likewise bear invitations to all types of ceremonies, such as marriages, mourning rites, or kwakiu dances; in fact, they act as town criers. A person holding any public rite requests one or more heralds to deliver the invitation which is repeated in every house of the village in order from bottom to top.[2]

There are variations, of course, according to the rites to be performed. At a potlatch, the first duty of a herald is to seat the guests in their proper places. This requires not only a good memory, but also considerable tact, since errors with foreign guests cause friction and embarrassment, and diminish the prestige of the whole ceremony. During the actual progress of the rites, a herald must constantly add dignity to the cere-

[1] Hawiti, sk'i', gloral, ewalk'ala, are to be confused with o'ala, the name of a society (I, p. 370).

[2] This order may once have had a ceremonial significance but it has been considered for a long time merely a matter of convenience. When giving presents also, a man follows the same order in his mind and comes first the occupants of the bottom house, thus minimizing the danger of overlooking a guest.

sion by repeating loudly a few words, or even phrases, from the speeches being delivered, or calling on the audience to notice what has just been said and to listen attentively. A white man would be annoyed at such interruptions, but the Bella Coola consider them evidences of attentiveness. 203 556*

The making of comments is a duty performed at every type of ceremony, but it is indispensable at potlatches; since a chief depends on the heralds to emphasize and explain the points of his family history which are being displayed. One intelligent man likened their functions to a compass, constantly guiding the course of ceremonial life. Without a herald a chief would be as useless as a ship tossed on the ocean with no hand to steer. Although the principal duty of heralds is to extol the actions of a chief, they can, and are expected to, deride one who fails to carry out the customary requirements. Cases have occurred in which influential men have so far forgotten their function of generosity as to fail to invite their fellows after killing a deer or other large animal; or women have declined to share their abundant berries. Nothing is said at the time, but when next the people have come together for some ceremony, a herald refers to the omission under so slim a disguise that everyone is aware of his meaning. This public ridicule lowers the prestige of a chief to such an extent that he is careful not to offend again. Not many years ago, a certain Kimsquit chief failed to ask others to share some mountain goats which he had killed; at the first opportunity a herald referred to himself as Yaki, Mountain Goat, and all present realized that he was really alluding to the one who had been remiss. 203 556* 558 626 [224] [222]

Heralds must exercise care in their witticisms at the expense of chiefs because, unless public opinion is with them, the point of the remark is lost, and they expose themselves to the wrath of the person offended. Nevertheless, heralds always strive to cause merriment, and often take risks with this aim in view. They try to make humorous remarks, and also to cause amusement by their antics. As already described, the donor of a potlatch may throw to one of them a dish containing liquid food 203 522 556*

NEA Bellacoola NEA

203 522 *556 in such a way that the contents dribble over the recipient; sometimes, though able to catch the dish, a herald may deliberately allow the sticky pulp to cover him. The humour of this is increased by the fact that guests at potlatches always receive their food in a ceremonious manner.

203 *556 [773] Though one of a herald's duties is to act as buffoon, his position is only very slightly derogatory. In the beginning of time, Raven himself did not hesitate to act in this capacity on many occasions. Ever since, the post has usually been occupied by relatives of chiefs, especially by those who are unable to give potlatches. In some cases the position is sought by ambitious young men, willing to endure the slight loss of dignity for the emoluments. Since the basic principle of every Bella Coola ceremony is that the donor must recompense those who have assisted him, heralds are always lavishly rewarded. At potlatches especially, chiefs remember their dependence upon the heralds, and shower presents upon them. One who has allowed himself to be spattered with liquid food to amuse the guests, is suitably compensated, but in any case he receives presents for summoning and seating the guests and for interrupting the speeches. The same principle holds good in all other ceremonies. An elderly informant related that once in his younger days he had been dancing a tsesk dance, when two heralds remarked that the ground on which he was dancing was dirty, meaning, that it had not been made clean by the distribution of sufficient presents to justify his dance. His mother at once gave the heralds two muskets, valuable articles in those days, to clear her son's path. These belonged to the informant, who knew nothing about the transaction until it had been completed, but he accepted as a matter of course the necessity of giving presents to heralds. If the seat on which a chief is sitting should break, presents must be given to heralds, and if a kusiut should fall when a herald is watching, the latter [622] receives gifts. At the marriage of a chief's son, a herald can [585] claim and remove any of the clothing of the bridegroom or his associates. Above all other occasions, when a young chief is first established on his seat, he must reward the heralds lavishly for their remarks. 203 554

As with so many elements of culture, the Bella Coola ascribe the origin of heralds to the wish of Alquntam as expressed to the first people in the beginning of time. Some groups of these early settlers brought with them heralds whose names had been created by the supreme deity himself in his house in the land above. Such a one was Xaqa'li who was a member of Xemcus's (I, p. 316) party at Kimsquit, another was Olqlimut who came with ayayayut (I, p. 319). These heralds functioned in the manner of their descendants of today; others of the first chiefs appointed certain of their relatives to perform this service, and by means of the power with which they were endowed, created names with respect to their functions. Besides his ordinary name every herald must have an ancestral appellation of some kind, as well as the probability of possessing kwiat ones in addition to those of a professional nature. Either by bringing with them from above, or by creation on this earth, each group of first settlers became provided with a herald, whose name is embodied in the ancestral myth describing their experiences. As each of the first heralds died, his name was passed to a successor, and this practice has been carried out from generation to generation until the present. The Bella Coola state that no new names for heralds have been created since the time of the first people, and it is certain that none has been made for many years. Consequently, the number of heralds is strictly limited in accordance with mythological beliefs, and every man who owns one of the ancient designations embodied in an origin myth knows the name of the herald associated with his first namesake. 203 773 551 [428]

At the death of a herald his name becomes dormant. Since heralds function at all ceremonies, whether or not the donor belongs to the same ancestral family as themselves, the members of the group sustaining the loss are not deprived of their 203 553 556 614 424

203 553 *556 614 [424] services. Hence the less, one of their primal prerogatives, the visible embodiment of an element in their ancestral myth, is no longer present. In such circumstances, no member of an ancestral family would give a potlatch unless able to receive at in the dancer name in a new herald. The intending donor usually consults with the senior members of the ancestral family as to a suitable incumbent, or especially if he is an influential chief, he may simply use his own discretion. In either case, some relatively young member of the ancestral family is offered the post. If he accepts, the matter is settled; if not, another is invited in his stead. The new herald cannot function until his name and appointment have been validated by the distribution of presents at the potlatch. Such gifts are not returnable, since they are held to "have become nothing" for the name. Relatively lavish expenditure for this purpose is one of the many ways in which a chief is able to show his prowess and generosity. Thus established, a herald can carry out his duties thenceforth. He functions at every ceremonial, but especially at potlatches given by members of his own ancestral family, in whose origin myth his own name is embedded. From constant participation in all kinds of ceremonials, a herald becomes conversant with every type, and is appealed to as arbiter in difficult points of ritual, thus adding to his reputation.

203 *556 Although acceptance of the post of herald somewhat curtails a man's activities in other respects, instances are known of energetic ones using the gifts received to establish themselves as chiefs, passing on their herald names at the same time to other incumbents. More often, a herald uses his wealth for the benefit of a son or other relative, being satisfied with his own status in the community. He takes a prominent part in every ceremony and is a person of some standing, yet is spared the responsibility of actually giving rites himself, a position which offers many attractions to a man lacking great ambition and initiative.

Totem-Poles

A feature embodied in many ancestral myths is a description of the totem-pole[1] erected by a group of the first people, either according to a design given them by Mountain, or in consequence of their experiences on this earth. It is the prerogative of a chief descended from that group to erect such a pole, under the same restrictions as apply to the personal use of other features belonging, not to him individually, but to the ancestral family as a whole. Totem-poles are also frequently erected to depict incidents connected with the ancestors of a chief, even if there is no mention of one in his ancestral myth. In either case, the setting-up is a source of pride to the chief, especially as it emphasizes the importance of his ancestors, and its display must be duly celebrated. Theoretically, this may be done at a gathering of less importance than a potlatch, but in practice it occurs at no other ceremony, since a chief wealthy enough to erect a pole naturally desires it to be seen by as many persons as possible.

Poverty limits the number of totem-poles, but is not sufficient to account for their relative rarity. It is a matter of pride for a chief to whose ancestral myth there is mention of a pole to erect one, but all myths do not include totem-poles. Consequently the absence of one before the door of the chief's house is not proof of the owner's poverty or lack of importance. This matter was investigated with great care, and all the older people witnessed that the number and size of their poles were never as great as among the northern tribes. [171]

When a chief is preparing for a potlatch, he alots, among other carpentry tasks, the construction of a totem-pole, if he is sufficiently wealthy to reward the artisan and to validate the erection in the customary manner. If a special design is embodied in the ancestral myth containing the name which he is about to assume, or to make strong, he indicates that design to the carpenter. In the story of Atlwi (I, p. 311), for [532] example, there is a description of his totem-pole with a bell on the top, and beneath it an eagle's nest containing two fledgling towards which a grizzly bear is endeavouring to climb. This is the only known instance of a pole on which the different figures stand in definite relationship to one another. No explanation is offered beyond the statement that this was the form used by Alkai in the beginning of time. Another ancient pole, used by one of the ancestral families of Sanl, consists of a simple shaft surmounted by a sphere; this represents a mountain which stems into their ancestral myth as supporting the sky.

As with all features embodied in ancestral myths, a chief can use his own discretion in cases where he has a choice of designs. A totem-pole with specific figures is a common present from a chief to his son-in-law, and it is a mark of respect for the latter to use and validate this at the first opportunity, in preference to one belonging to his own ancestral family. Since the pole erected at a potlatch may have no association with the ancestral name and myth of the donee, the underlying principle in all cases is that the value of the pole depends upon the quantity of gifts distributed to validate its erection. One man mentioned as instance in which he had become confused with regard to the proper design for the totem-pole connected with his ancestral myth, and had used one belonging to a second myth in association with a name from the first. Both were his property, the transaction was duly validated, and the matter passed off without question. It is possible that the decay of customs which has followed the coming of the white man may have been partly responsible for this error, which was regarded as a somewhat stupid, though not improper mistake; yet it is clear that even when designs are remembered as portions of ancestral myths, they can be eliminated from them and validated as isolated objects in the same manner as names and all other features of ancestral myths.

More often, the exact details of a pole are not included in the ancestral myth and a chief wishing to have one erected can [illegible] the [illegible] to the design. So the cup he always [illegible] the bird or animal crest to which his first ancestor, [illegible] [illegible], came to this earth. Beneath this is the crest of his mother's first ancestor if it differs from his father's. There are no fixed rules for other representations. Sometimes a man wishes to display the crests of the first ancestors of his wife, or wives; more often, the designs are of creatures with which the two ancestors came in contact after reaching this earth.[illegible] One of the Bella Coolas, Smanus (I, p. 330), married a Bella Bella woman from whom he obtained a ceremony connected with a whale, an animal which has often been used on the totem poles of the Haidas. The lower figures on totem-poles often represent creatures from which a recent ancestor of the chief obtained supernatural assistance. Consequently, the number of designs which may be used is legion, and the order of personal is unknown. Moreover, Bella Coola art is not sufficiently realistic for designs to be easily recognized, nor is there standard conventionalization of little used animals; so it follows that the designs on totem-poles are often unidentifiable.[illegible] This is of little consequence, since their value rests neither upon the artistic skill exhibited, nor even upon their significance in connection with the owner's ancestral myth, but upon the goods expended to validate the display.

All Bella Coola totem-poles are carved from the trunks of huge cedars, with the wood cut away so that the designs stand out in high relief. The carvers are allowed great latitude both in choice of form and colouring, hence there is wide variation [illegible] is the term applied to animals with which ancestors came in contact, other than their clans.

[illegible] the layman's point of view, that is, of the Bella Coola who was not himself a carpenter-sculptor. It is probable that an expert would have greater facility in recognizing the conventionalized forms used by his ancestors, although the whole pattern of Bella Coola culture was opposed to extreme conventionalization. Unfortunately, wood-carving, in fact art work of every kind, had degenerated to such an extent that only one man with any recognized skill in that respect was still living when this study was made. He was both unreliable and uncooperative, so that it was impossible even to collect examples of his work, still less to record his interpretations of the designs of masks or other objects carved by his predecessors.

211 in the appearance of the poles. Sometimes one is erected at 556 the front door of the house with an opening at its base through 778 which all must pass to enter the house, or a pole may be solid 532 and stand on the opposite side of the sidewalk; the choice is [184] either one depending upon the usage recorded in the ancestral myth. Instead of a totem-pole, a chief may display his ancestral crests by means of paintings on the front wall of his house, or by carved house-posts supporting the longitudinal beams, if such had been used by his ancestors. Moreover, a chief entitled to display a totem-pole may choose to use only paintings. If he exhibits them by preference, they give him the same dignity and importance as a totem-pole, particularly if he cannot validate its construction by lavish gifts. Most Bella Coola poles are only about fifteen to twenty feet in height, and though [171] it is possible that a few families had prerogatives entitling them to erectors lofty poles, such as used by the Haida, it is unlikely that such were ever common.

When a chief who has erected a totem-pole before his house gives another potlatch, he may wish to put up a second pole beside the first. Occasionally two or three poles stand before the house of a chief, but one is more frequent or even none at [761] all. At death the pole is often taken to the cemetery where it acts as a memorial-post (I, p. 461). Otherwise it remains standing until some other occupant of the house wishes to erect another in its place, when the first is pulled down and neglected.

Coppers

556 The Bella Coola use coppers for only two purposes: casting [769] on the ground upon which the representation of a deceased relative had trodden, or throwing into the fire when the figure has left the house. In either case, they are said to "make bone for the dead." Although used but rarely, the occasion when a copper is employed is so important that to obtain one and increase its value is a vital consideration for every chief.

[177] Most of the coppers now used by the Bella Coola are made of metal obtained from the white men, if not actually manufactured for trading purposes. They resemble the familiar shape found in all parts of the British Columbia coast and vary in length from about six inches to as much as three feet. There is considerable difference in thickness, some of the newer ones are thin plates, others are heavy and appear to be old. The early white traders realized the value placed by the Indians on their coppers and these were soon imitated and became important articles of barter. The Bella Coola state that many of the early Hudson's Bay Company's coppers were made of drawn wire, but this type seems to have passed out of existence, since all the specimens seen in Bella Coola consisted of flat metal plaques. 556*

The Bella Coola maintain that there aboriginal here, ever since the beginning of time, used two kinds of coppers. One variety, known as tsiku, resembled the plaques produced by white men. This is the term in common usage for all kinds of coppers at the present time. The other variety, tsiwaxa, is said to have been thicker and heavier and was made by heating the metal in a fire, beating it into the required shape. Long, long ago, coppers of this kind were sometimes found in the forest by hunters who were thus rewarded for observance of ceremonial chastity, but most were obtained in trade from the northern tribes. One of these is said to be preserved at Kimsquit, but none is said to have been owned by a Bella Coola within the last few years. 556* [325] [434]

The Bella Coola believe that tsiwaxa can only be manufactured in one district, far to the north, at the mouth of an unknown river. There, it is said, the chiefs range themselves along the river bank, each armed with a spear, and each with a number of slaves behind him. When the tide is highest, salmon of some peculiar kind appear at the surface of the water. If one comes within reach of a spearman, he lunges at it, but invariably misses; then the chief drops his spear, seizes one of his slaves and kills him by cutting his throat. A small piece of 552* 773

* [331] [illegible] out from the body is fastened to the point of the arrow, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] to transform it and bringing it adhere. He warms the fish on a fire and then pounds it on a stone until it becomes a copper.

The Bella Coola has carried this dream river for many generations and the belief concerning the manufacture of eulachon appears to have been handed down from the antiquity. Coppers of this kind are said to have been considered much more valuable than the usual Edlin, but were always uncommon. In addition to their ordinary uses, they had a certain curative value. If the owner of one was ill, he used to clean it with a rough stone and water; then he would drink four cupfuls of the liquid which contained minute fragments of metal. In almost every case a speedy recovery followed. In all other respects Edlin or eulachon could be used indiscriminately.

[175] Edlin are likewise said to have a supernatural origin. When found in the forest, they are due to the supernatural salmon-like being, ocuel, having changed itself into one. None has been found in recent years because the ocuel have moved away owing to their dislike of the smell of human footsteps and the odor of smoke.

[196] These stories serve to emphasize the complete ignorance of [325] the Bella Coola concerning the methods of manufacturing coppers. It is possible that long ago they were able to make their own by pounding the native metal, but if so it is surprising that some traditions to this effect were not preserved. On the other hand, there is little reason to doubt their use of [177] coppers, obtained from the northern tribes, antedating the coming of the whites. All informants agreed on this point, and the frequent references to coppers in mythology likewise point to considerable age. In many of the ancestral myths there are accounts of the obtaining of coppers by some of the [551] first people, and many ancestral names, both of men and women, are derived from them.

[237] The Bella Coola attribute the value of coppers to the fact of their occurrence in most uncanny myths? There seems to be no mythological explanation for the casting of a copper into the fire after the passing of the representation of a deceased relative, but the desire of chiefs to see them as potlatches is the result of their use under similar circumstances by their ancestors. Some ancient myths lack reference to coppers, but their use is common to all, whether or not embodied in such. It is said to be usual for a chief to acquire coppers if they had been used by his ancestors, but this is not essential.

When arranging for the appearance of a dead relative, the dance of a potlatch is careful either to possess a copper, or to be able to borrow one at the right moment. As soon as the masked figure has disappeared, the dance stands up, breaks or bends his copper, and throws it into the fire "to make heat for the deceased." No matter how valuable a copper may have been, it is now worthless; its value has been expended on the purpose for which it has just been employed. It has unbended to the flames, a valueless article belonging to no one.

At some convenient time, either hours or days later, any chief may remove the copper and give it to a poor man, only taking care to choose an individual who has not recently received one. It is said that the gift is "to patch his canoe." It is now the poor man's property, but it has no value, since no goods have been expended for it. The new owner straightens and repairs it, if necessary by sinking on the broken piece, thus making it ready for further use. The poor man may keep the copper for years, or it may be only a few weeks before some chief, preparing for a potlatch, offers, perhaps, $20, for it. In the old days, values were computed in slaves, canoes, salmon, and other commodities, but now in dollars. If two chiefs should happen to want it, the poor man may haggle about the price, though in such a case the two rivals would probably agree amicably rather than lower their dignity by seeming to be interested in a matter of money. It is to the advantage of a

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] dual to any ceremonial liability, since its value of the copper depends on the amount expended on it.

The fire received by the poor man must not be casually given. He is supposed to invite the other villages to his house, otherwise he would never again be given coppers. The invitations will everyone to the house, the singers usual being the first to arrive. They hear not the faintest sign of anyone, to which the crowd dances, the songs are sung in after another, until almost every member of the society has sound. Sacred songs may then be sung in the same way. Now the supernatural beings are not present, the fire has no religious significance; it is merely a social affair. At the close of the dancing, the poor man distributes food to all, equivalent in value to the money received. It is probable that our man sometimes gives away slightly less than they have received, although any noticeable lessening this would be punished by the receipt of no further coppers. The recipient of a copper from a fire derives no direct gain from it, though it is to his indirect advantage, since a person who has given away food is likely to receive larger presents on future occasions than one who has not.

Meanwhile the chief owning the copper is unable to use it as his potlatch since the value, dependent on the goods expended for it, is only $10, a sum so small that to use it would be insulting to his dead ancestor. There are several ways of increasing its value:

(1) By Painting. Taking advantage of some ceremony when a number of people are present, the owner gives a carpenter $10, for example, with a request that he paint on his copper a representation of the crest used by his, the owner's, first ancestor, when coming to this earth. Henceforth the value of the copper is $20.

(2) By Naming. The Bella Coola say that among the Kwakiutl names are given to almost all coppers; in Bella Coola it is a rare practice. Occasionally, a chief creates a name for his copper and validates this by presents to all the village or some ceremony, exactly as a child's name is conferred. Designations are chosen with respect to the appearance of the copper, or some incident connected with its history. Such a designation is [illegible], "Sagrimud," applied to a copper thrown many times into the fire. If, for instance, $50 be expended for a canoe, the value of a $50 copper is henceforth $80. 435 552 556*

(3) By Making Gifts. The owner of a copper can increase its value by calling together the other chiefs of his village, and sometimes of adjacent ones as well. After the customary meal, the owner expounds the history of his possession, giving details of its value. Then he passes it to one of his guests, who, unless he wishes to insult his host, must hold it upright, that is, with the broad end uppermost. The owner gives it in turn to each of his guests. To validate the display, the owner must borrow gifts on all present, and the total value of these is added to the value of the copper. Such gifts are not strictly returnable, although it is customary for chiefs to show their generosity and prowess to their fellows by a later repayment with interest. 435 556* [578] [426]

By these means the original purchaser of a worthless copper can increase its value to such a point that it can be used at a potlatch. There is no established custom about this. Coppers are not as valuable in Bella Coola as, for instance, at Fort Rupert, and it is unlikely that any are ever worth more than $300, and the average value is probably between $150 and $200. Considerable time is required to raise the value of a copper to this sum and the owner in many cases finds that he has all the other requirements before his copper is ready for use. In that case, he tries to buy another which has been raised to sufficient worth by its owner. Everyone knows the values of the different coppers in the community, and the intending purchaser calls his fellow-chiefs to his house and offers to buy one valued, for example, at $150. If the owner consents to sell, he usually endeavours to get as much as possible, perhaps $175. The sum is publicly paid and is henceforth the value of the copper, which is transmitted to the new [171] 435 437 556*

435 owner with a statement of its history and the amount expended 437 on it. The purchase of a copper is, therefore, a good business & 556 transaction, and it might be assumed that a chief with keen commercial instincts would endeavour to acquire as many as [177] possible. This is said to be the case in Fort Rupert, but in [178] Bella Coola public opinion is averse to the obtaining of coppers unless for use at potlatches. As every ambitious chief hopes to give potlatches, he can always claim that the acquisition of a copper is for this end, and thus the sale of it is from a kindly desire to assist a fellow-chief who is secure the desired goal than he himself. Consequently, the sale of coppers is relatively common, and a chief is not considered to be mercenary unless he sells too frequently.

426 The intending donor of a potlatch can now proceed to the & 556 ceremony, secure in the possession of a copper worthy to be thrown on the fire after the passage of his deceased relative.
In addition, he may own another copper of too small value for this purpose. As described in the last chapter, he repeatedly calls together the inhabitants of his own village to sites which he validates by the distribution of presents, and at which he also gives away investment presents. He may decide to use his second copper for this purpose. All investment presents, [558] which are given only to men of standing in the community, must be repaid with interest unless the recipient is willing to decline in popular estimation; but when a gift of this kind consists of a copper, a return of 100 per cent is expected on the transaction. Bestowal of a copper in such circumstances is not spoken of as an investment present, ksémkwném, but as dzaxep', which has the definite significance of something that must be returned with 100 per cent interest. If the value of the copper were $25 before this bestowal, it is now $50, since the new owner must repay this amount to the chief planning to give the potlatch. The new owner can use the copper in any way he desires; if he repays a previous indebtedness, he cancels $50 by giving it; whereas if he bestows it as dzaxep', announcement is made that its value is $50, and he expects to immediately before, or during the early stages of a potlatch, in order to receive goods immediately, but with the promise that it shall be returned to him for throwing into the fire. This method has the advantage of providing the chief with goods when required, and doubling the worth of the copper.

Coppers are not always removed from the ashes and given to poor men. If one is still lying in the fire after several days, the donor of the potlatch removes it and forces it to the memorial post over the grave of his deceased relative. It may be left there, or another chief wanting a copper may buy it from the donor and increase its value in the usual manner. Only a small price is paid in such circumstances, since the copper, having served its purpose, is practically valueless.

The Bella Coola state that in ancient times coppers were worth less than at present, and that the change in estimation regarding them is due to Kwakiutl influence. All agree that the value placed upon them at Fort Rupert and Alert Bay is greater than elsewhere on the coast. The Bella Coola believe that the Kwakiutl distribute presents in respect to their coppers and that their values move to enormous sums when the gifts are returned. It is clear that the importance of coppers, like the potlatch and other elements of culture, has increased in recent years through the influence of the coastal tribes.

It is almost impossible to define coppers in the nomenclature of economic theory. They are not mere articles of barter, since they have no practical use outside the ceremonies of chiefs. Nor are they standardized units of trade or currency, since each differs not only from all other coppers, but also at different periods. In a sense they serve as tokens of what has been expended; representations of them may be carved and painted on totem-poles where they serve as marks of the goods which the chief has given away, but this is only a minor consideration. A copper can perhaps best be described as an investment which can be applied only to one purpose, "the making of bone for a deceased" person. It grows more valuable at every transmission in accordance with the goods ex-

424 as possible, a potlatch in the most suitable occasion. Goods 463 distributed for this purpose are not returnable; they have "become nothing" in the acquisition. The value of presents so * 556 bestowed differs enormously; a man who is proud of his prerogative validates it lavishly until he is strong in his vocation, whereas another establishes himself on a lesser scale. The origin [773] of professional rights, like so many of other kinds, is lost in antiquity and ascribed to the wishes of Alquntăm as expressed to the first people. Some of the early settlers come to earth [551] with definite duties and vocations, each indicated by a special name; others, lacking these, created them through their own enormous power. At the death of one of these incumbents, 424 his name passed to one of his relatives who acted in the same 463 manner as his predecessor after duly validating the name in 553 question. Ever since that time, the owner of a confirmed pro-
* 556 fessional name has been able to perform the functions of the prerogative. This is never a man's sole designation, but merely [551] an addition to those of ancestral, kwaiat, nuxuk, and other types. Like them, professional names are usually willed by their owners, though if this is neglected, one can be revived by any member of the deceased's ancestral family. In such a case, the older people usually decide on a suitable incumbent and suggest the matter to him; if he does not accept, the opportunity is given to another. If a member of the group is eager to validate the name, it is unlikely that anyone would try to [789] forestall him. Ability in certain respects can also be obtained by magical means (I, p. 701), and a member of the ancestral family so endowed is the natural choice for the prerogative in question.

Prerogatives of this kind can be grouped according to the types of vocation included.

a man, or woman, with the prerogative of enforcing obedience to river taboos. Ever since, the owner of this name, when it has been duly legalized, has had the right to perform this function. In some cases, such as carpenters and singers, the validation of a prerogative has not brought with it the necessary ability, so that the incumbent remains a properly ratified, but non-functioning, craftsman. No mechanical skill is required by a River Guardian, hence the owner of the name or nemaia has always been able to perform his duties. 424 463 551 693 [793]

From time immemorial certain restrictions have been enforced concerning the river: No refuse may be thrown in, otherwise the olachen would remain in the ocean. For the same reason, women at certain periods are not allowed to bathe lest a speck of blood should blind the fish and prevent them from seeing the nets. Occasionally an olachen with red eyes is caught; this is caused by some heedless woman. When the fish are running in the river, women are not allowed on the bank, nor to repair the nets. At high tide, it is forbidden to drive stakes for olachen nets. 784 825 226 [515] 841 [562]

The number of prohibitions increases during the critical period of the salmon run. Then no freshly hewn planks can be set afloat, and even a canoe which has just been completed must be kept for ten days before launching. No one whose husband or wife has died within the last year can embark at the village, but must proceed to a landing-place at the head of the fiord. Most important of all, refuse of salmon must be deposited in the woods; if thrown into the river, the fish would smell it and avoid the stream. Even accidents such as the upsetting of a canoe, or the spilling of olachen grease, are considered to be offences. [502] [765]

Disregard of any of these injunctions is displeasing to the salmon and it is the duty of the River Guardian to punish the offender, irrespective of his rank. In case of slight infringements, he beats the guilty person or throws him into the river. The guilty person usually scrambles out, but should he be swept away and drowned, no recompense can be claimed by 688 693

688 his relatives. This punishment is customary in cases of the 693 upsetting of a canoe. Death is the penalty for throwing refuse [177] into the river, particularly during the summer, and until the coming of the white man the River Guardian exacted it without hesitation.

THE PROFESSION OF UTTERING A DROWING CRY

424 At the appearance of masked figures representing super-551 natural beings, whether in nuxuk or kuxiut dances, many of the [575] women repeatedly utter a peculiar, high-pitched, droning cry [463] which adds considerably to the weirdness and impressiveness
[431] of the occasion. Ability to do this depends on an ancestral [773] prerogative duly confirmed by the distribution of presents. Many ancestral myths describe how some of the first women were given by Alpuatém, or acquired in other ways, the right to drone, and mention is made of the name used by each with respect to this prerogative. Unlike the one previously described, many of the first women possessed this privilege, which is accordingly common at the present time. A name [553] of this type is usually conferred in girlhood, sometimes even in infancy, and being of relatively slight importance may be validated at a ceremony of less dignity than a potlatch. One of these names is Nuxuqmelelaiqua-a, which has reference to [773] the blue-green sheen of some abalone-shell brought from the east by Raven in the beginning of time, as described in the ancestral myth in which this name is included. For many [178] years there has been considerable laxity with regard to this prerogative, and women lacking it have even been urged to drone in order to add to the solemnity of the occasion and to increase the wonder of the uninitiated.

424 There is another similar prerogative, enabling the incum-767 bent to drone at mourning ceremonies. In the beginning of 463 time, Smawa of Kimsquit married Tlitwaitl, the daughter of 793 a Bella Bella chief, who had this right. It has since been transmitted from one of her descendants to another at Kimsquit.

quit. Details of this prerogative were not obtainable, but it seems to follow the general type. 424 769 463

THE PROFESSION OF FIRST BERRY PICKER

All women can pick berries, but in every village there is at least one who has the prerogative of picking the first of every kind. The origin of this right is lost in dim antiquity, but, like all others, each first berry picker has a special professional name embodied in her ancestral myth which must be duly validated before she can function. One of these is Sitowuswaé-nimin-a, another is ła'ya. Though normally reserved for women, one of these names is occasionally given to a male child, in which case it is said to have been hermaphroditical. No one would dare to pick berries until the legal picker has paraded up and down the sidewalk carrying on her back her picking basket decorated with a representation of the sun, an act which is believed to ripen the berries. 222 424 463 551 552 532 789

"Get ready to pick red elderberries [or whatever species is ripe] tomorrow," she keeps calling out.

The berries may then be picked by anyone. This is repeated for every variety. As far as could be learnt, there was no social mechanism to punish a woman who picked berries before the announcement of the official picker; obedience seems to have been so universal that infractions are said to have been unknown though formerly there may have been some penalty of which even the memory has disappeared. 688 183

THE PROFESSION OF WARRIOR

The profession of warrior is another prerogative handed down from the distant past and requiring validation before it can be used. As with other rights of this type, magical means are in many cases employed to make any young man brave and successful, but there are a number of warriors confirmed as such by the distribution of presents at the time of bestowal on them of professional names. At the present time, it is 701 424 463 431 551

701 difficult to estimate the former influence of such warriors. The belief of all in their ability must have given them some prestige, although the requirements of practical qualifications in fighting must often have prevented them from functioning as military leaders. In other words, a man may be, socially, a warrior, even though he lacks ability as a fighting man.

701 The functions of warriors are not limited to fighting with 693 enemies of other tribes. Each has the power to kill and must exercise it when requested. If a mistake is made in a cere-
[688] monial kwisi dance, the offender must be killed, and one way [579] in which this is accomplished is by the senior members of the society requesting a professional warrior to act as executioner.
428 One of these men, who lived at Ksio-de-i, always used a stone 411 club which had been handed down from generation to generation, becoming the property of each new incumbent of the [754] name and prerogative. In other cases, the killing is said to have been done with the aid of magic. The power of the Ksio-de-i warrior had been confirmed with so much goods that he was the most powerful professional killer known to the Bella Coola. He acted on instructions from the senior members of the kwisi society or when called upon by anyone. If,
[684] for example, a man found that his wife had been faithless and wished to kill her lover, it was only necessary to tell the professional warrior, who was bound to act in accordance with his prerogative. He received no pay, since he was merely [682] exercising his right. The relatives of the murdered person never took revenge on the slayer, realizing that he was powerless in the matter, though they frequently requested him to slay the person who had asked him to kill the first victim. He could never refuse to do so, even if the victim were his own brother, or if he knew that the person he was to kill was guiltless. The underlying principle was that this man's power had [961] been increased to such a pitch by the distribution of presents that if he failed to exercise it on demand, it would react upon himself and cause his own death. This Ksio-de-i warrior began in time to have an aversion for his vocation, since he was being feared and hated by all. Yet his prerogative was so strong that he could not cease to act. He found by chance a cave near the top of precipitous Mount Nacimacta, not far from his village, and told everyone that he would die there, where no one would ever be able to spit or tread upon his grave. One autumn, when an old man, he disappeared, and although search parties scoured the woods for him, they were unsuccessful. Next spring, some young men visited the cave in which they found his badly decomposed corpse; the warrior had kept his promise.

The profession of warrior carries with it prohibitions and requirements other than with regard to killing. Such men are thought always to be so wild and restless that they cannot sleep at night, but prowl around the village watching for possible foes. In actual fact, warriors seldom sleep quietly throughout the night. They have one restriction of a social nature, in that they can never be confined in the back-room as initiates into the nusaé society. Consequently, no tatsiwaw ever comes to one of them. When one gives a potlatch, a rather beautiful song is sung for him as he remains in the central part of the house. What affiliation this brings him with the nusaé society is obscure.

701 [575]

It is difficult to say to what extent a professional warrior believes in his own powers, since there is, and must always have been, great individual variation. The white man finds it difficult to understand the psychology of a man who considers himself bound to kill on request, simply because presents have been distributed to make him a warrior. It must be remembered that this is one of the most pervasive features of Bella Coola life; functions of all kinds depend upon validated prerogatives, and there is no doubt that a man who has one of this kind is actually influenced to such an extent that he begins to believe in his own prowess. It was unusual for a warrior to exercise his powers as freely as did the Xoxo'ts'i man, but the Bella Coola have no difficulty in explaining this:—his prerogative had been confirmed with more lavish expenditure than that of anyone else. The Bella Coola do not rationalize in a scientific manner; if a man holds a belief firmly, he acts on it without questioning its logic. Moreover, if a professional warrior functions a number of times, this in itself is enough to strengthen his conviction that he must act henceforth in the same way. It can be said with confidence that the owner of a professional prerogative has considerable belief in his own powers, that this acts on himself to render him proficient, and that the majority of the community have respect for his capabilities.

THE PROFESSION OF SINGER

Singing is one of the professions open to a Bella Coola either through natural ability or an ancestral prerogative. There is a constant need for men able to sing and compose songs for every kind of ceremonial, so a young man of talent has little difficulty in gaining admittance to the choir. He may even win great distinction and become recognized as the leading authority on musical matters. None the less, his success is considered to be accidental and unsubstantial, lacking the foundation that comes from the possession of a duly validated professional prerogative. A person made a singer by the latter means may be entirely unable to compose; in this case he is not a member of the choir, although he enjoys the social distinction which he has won by distributing goods to confirm his professional name. The singer most respected is he who combines with natural ability a confirmed prerogative to give substance and power to his position and compositions. At the death of such an one, an effort is always made by the members of his ancestral family to transmit the name to a youth who has shown musical promise. Arguments and differences of opinion are common among the members of the choir and in such cases the self-assurance and influence of a man whose position has been made strong by the distribution of presents often outweighs that of one who can rely only on his actual ability.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

THE PROFESSION OF CARPENTER

As with singers, there are many carpenters who ply their trade without the advantage of an ancestral prerogative. They, also, may be expert and receive credit for their skill, but they can never achieve quite the distinction that comes to a man who has been made a carpenter by the distribution of presents. The latter may be so clumsy with tools that no one would ever trust him to make a canoe, or even a mask; but he is, socially, a carpenter, whereas a skilled artisan lacking a prerogative is admired for his ability but has no foundation of social esteem. In transmitting a professional carpenter's name, however, an effort is always made to give it to a youth with a bent in that direction.

The most esteemed carpenters are those who can make canoes, a trade which requires no special prerogative. In the beginning of time, Yulātimut was the canoe-maker par excellence; he assisted many of the first people, and no one can have a professional prerogative as carpenter unless this supernatural being appears in his ancestral myth. The Bella Coola ascribe the skill of the Bella Bella in carpentry to the fact that Yulātimut married a Bella Bella woman in the early period of the world and that many of that tribe are his descendants. In the old days, before the coming of the white men, carpenters were always respected as esteemed members of the community. Chiefs always cared for them, and they received abundant food at every ceremonial. None the less, they were not wealthy, and only in recent years, since the Bella Coola have realized the value put upon good craftsmanship by the white men, has it become customary to give valuable presents to carpenters. Ceremonially, they have considerable influence, since the carpenter who makes a mask usually decides who shall wear it and takes charge of the fitting and adjustment. He is also held responsible for any accident such as its falling when in use or for mechanical defects.

224 THE PROFESSION OF HUNTER

424 Another profession which is entered by means of an ancestral prerogative is that of hunting. Many Bella Coola have [463] validated their right to this vocation, some by confirming names created by their early ancestors, others by legalizing those brought down from above in the beginning of time. [551] One of the latter is Lelaimkila, "The Brusher Off," so-called because the owner is such a successful hunter that he can sweep mountain goats from the mountains as easily as an ordinary person can brush insects from a wall. Unlike the professions of carpenter and singer, it is believed that legalization of a hunter's name always brings success to the holder; perhaps because everyone is more or less successful, it follows [555] that whatever good fortune is achieved by a professional hunter [556] can be attributed to the validation of his prerogative. Others, lacking this assistance, may be proficient, but their success never carries with it the social prestige gained by a man who has distributed goods to substantiate the prerogative.

224 There is a difference of opinion among the Bella Coola as 424 to whether or not certain hunting methods are inheritable pre- 184 rogatives. With the introduction of rifles, these have long [177] been discontinued, and no definite information was obtained regarding the social position of their users. Several of the older men believed that the contrivances depended upon ancestral prerogatives, whereas others stated that they were merely individual discoveries which could have been, and in many cases were, imitated by anyone. It seems probable that most of the following practices are prerogatives, although it may be that they are no more than special hunting devices suitable only in certain areas and, therefore, limited to the members of the ancestral family owning that particular locality.

223 The method about which the most definite information was 424 obtained, was one formerly employed by a certain Nuxpalxiq to catch geese at Tál·ia. According to one elderly Bella Coola,

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

this practice had been handed down with the name from the 223 beginning of time; another man stated that it was no pre- [424] rogative and could be used by anyone. The best time for hunting was at the equinoxes, and Nuxpalqiq always observed [785] ceremonial chastity in such a way that it terminated at that date. Before setting out, the hunter prepared a net of the shape shown in the accompanying sketch (Fig. 1). The net was stretched over a wooden framework, about ten feet long and four feet wide; counterbalanced by a long and heavy handle. The whole affair was called, "The House-like Thing." Choosing a still night, the hunter used to set out in his canoe paddled by a number of assistants. Nuxpalqiq would place himself in the bow with his net, and in the middle of the craft a small fire was kept burning with [372] resinous sticks piled beside it so that it could be kindled into bright flames at a moment's notice. As the canoe was slowly paddled along the shore, the geese were half attracted, half repelled by the light. Unwilling to take to flight, they used to swim around at the edge of the illumination and so were guided into some narrow opening of the shore. Then Nuxpalqiq would throw his net so that the end farthest from the handle first touched the water and as the latter came crashing down it imprisoned a number of birds. Others, bewildered by the light and the falling net, tried to fly outwards and were knocked down by the paddlers. These were retrieved at once and the necks of those caught in the net were wrung at leisure. It is said that this method of hunting was almost always successful.

Goose Net

Another Tâl-ie hunting device which, however, was not 225 transmitted and may have been merely an individual stroke [424] of genius, not an inherited prerogative, was employed to kill seals. The last to use this method was the father's father of an elderly Bella Coola. This man used to go out at night in a

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

225 small ocean-going canoe, with an assistant who passed his paddle through the water in such a way that a slight phosphorescent streak resulted. This resembled the course of a salmon. In a short time a seal would rise in pursuit of the "fish," and the watchful hunter would harpoon it. The seal would rush off with the head of the weapon, which was attached by a long line to the shaft remaining in the hunter's hand He would play it like a huge fish, until the exhausted animal was drawn to the side of the canoe and clubbed. Several seals were often obtained by this means in the course of a single night.

224 424 The two usual methods of killing mountain goats are by cornering them with dogs and then choking them to death, or by shooting with rifle or bow. There was formerly a special method of snaring which had been handed down as a prerogative from the time of the first people. The hunter used to set his snares on a precipitous path commonly used by goats and had remarkable success. Others might know how to make snares and where the hunter set them, but no one would ever attempt this method of hunting without the proper prerogative. Another right, enjoyed by another hunter, was the catching of bears in a similar way in nooses.

424 556 182 Little need be said in conclusion about these particular privileges, except to emphasize that they are merely an aspect of the principle of validated prerogatives which permeates every phase of Bella Coola life. It is as natural for a man to be made a singer or a hunter by the distribution of presents as it is for him to acquire a dance by the same means. Each is contained in an ancestral myth, and the validation of the prerogative enables the incumbent either to function actively, or at least to enjoy the social prestige attached to the craftsman who has been duly confirmed in his vocation. The necessity of bestowing gifts to validate a prerogative introduces an economic element to the concept, but this is lessened by the fact that a poor man can acquire a name by a relatively small expenditure though he must forgo the prestige enjoyed by a 424 man who has been able to elevate his professional names in a 556 lavish manner. Selection is a constant factor in the social life 182 of a Bella Coola; the man who uses all his wealth to acquire a firm seat cannot be "strong" in nuxalk matters; the man who desires to specialize in hamat affairs cannot afford to display an elaborate totem-pole. Amid these conflicting desires, it often happens that a man somewhat neglects his professional prerogatives, especially those of which the dignity has been slightly lessened through superior skill shown by individuals [555] endowed with no more than native ability. Upstarts of this kind have always infringed upon professional dignity, and the [177] coming of the white man has added a new factor which has almost destroyed vocational prerogatives.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

A'alk Dances

The most important, as well as the most spectacular, dances 177 that occur at potlatches are those given by members of the 535 nuxalk society. In addition to these, a feature of many pot- 575 latches is the performance of a'alk dances.[1] As already mentioned, from 1870 onwards there have been many changes in nuxalk ritual; new elements have been acquired by the mar- [184] riages of Bella Coola to members of the coastal tribes, with the result that details of procedure vary at every ceremony ac- [796] cording to the prerogatives of the dancer. Since 1910, the influence of white civilization has increased to such an extent that nuxalk ceremonials have virtually been abandoned.
This took place at a time when the ritual was in transition, a state of affairs which rendered difficult the collection of coherent information. A'alk dances are associated with nuxalk, but the addition of new features to the latter was accompanied by a decay of the former. Both societies have now almost ceased to exist, but whereas the nuxalk organization was abandoned during a period of change and accretion, that [128]

[1] Called o'alpem in Kimsquit.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

177 of the a'alk came to an end when it was already waning in 535 importance. It was impossible to obtain as much detailed 575 information about the latter as was desired, and it is even 128 possible that some of the facts recorded in connection with sisaok ceremonial really belong to a'alk rites.

The right to perform an a'alk dance depends upon a duly 424 validated ancestral prerogative of which the obvious mark is 535 an a'alk name. Some of the first people brought down such designations and dances with them from above in the beginning 575 of time, a few were acquired on this earth as gifts from super-
[773] natural beings. Those who have rights of this kind form a loose organization which may be termed the a'alk society. This is closely associated both with the sisaok society and with chiefs, owing to the occurrence of these three types of names in the same ancestral myths. One member of an ancestral [556] family may use his goods to validate his ancestral name, another to make himself a sisaok, a third to become an a'alk, and an important chief, endowed with ability and wealth, may be able to do all three.

A'alk dances are less spectacular than those of either the sisaok or kusiut societies, nor are rattles or whistles used. The prerogatives of a member are limited to his name, the right to perform a certain dance, and the use of a song which commonly describes some feature of his ancestral myth. Four types of dances are considered to be a'alk; the methods of acquiring and using any one of these are similar, so it is unnecessary to describe the differences before the actual account of the performance of each.

556 If there is a dormant a'alk prerogative in the ancestral 575 family of the donor of a potlatch, he usually chooses to validate this as one of the features of his ceremony. He first consults his wife and other relatives to ensure that sufficient goods will be forthcoming, and if this matter can be arranged satisfactorily, he chooses some young relative as the recipient of the dormant right. It would be most unusual for the youth selected to decline the honour. Or some man, other than the holder of the potlatch, may wish to confirm a prerogative and requests the donor to allow this to take place at his ceremony. Permission is never refused, since the more incidental rites, the greater is the prestige of the whole. The young man on whom the name is to be confirmed is always told what is planned for him, and his relatives instruct him what to do. 556 575

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

As the time for the potlatch draws near, the donor requests the singers to prepare an a'alk song for the youth. The theme always deals with some incident of his ancestral story with which the singers are already familiar. If a number of youths are to be made a'alk, a song must be composed for each. The carpenters are also requested to make for the initiate one, or sometimes two, masks representing a supernatural being, either human or animal, connected with the myth in which occurs the a'alk name about to be conferred. The design is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family concerned; it is usually, though not necessarily, the same as that employed by the last incumbent of the name. If the designation about to be confirmed is one which came down from above in the beginning of time, the mask usually represents the guise adopted by the first user of the name; if the prerogative were obtained on earth, it portrays the being from whom the right was received. These arrangements are made in secret, and are known only to the craftsmen, the donor of the potlatch, and his family. [533] 532 556 575

On the night of xläxtnim, when the work for the potlatch is allotted, the youth who is to be made an a'alk is confined within the back-room of the house, presumably in company with the sisaok initiates, though there is ambiguity on this point. After the general arrangements have been made, an elderly a'alk whose aid has been requested, suddenly rushes from the house as if he had heard some noise. One of the siki, or an influential chief, makes some allegedly witty remark as to why he has gone out, and then follows, taking with him the dance head-dress belonging to the a'alk. This is identical with the type worn by sisaok, one of the many points of resemblance 556 575 [184] [535]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

556 between the two societies. Presently the elderly a'alk returns, 575 clad in his ceremonial costume consisting of the head-gear, a blanket, and a narrow apron from which hang deer hooves, [184] small pieces of copper, or other jingling articles. The singers
[292] strike up his song, and he dances near the fire in a manner [535] depending upon which of the four dances he has the right to perform. Again the siki leaves the house; when he returns he announces that a tutwinam is coming with a song for the youth, naming the one who is to be made an a'alk. A moment passes, and in stalks a masked figure depicting the form taken by the first ancestor of the novice, or the being from which one of his later forefathers received an a'alk prerogative. Sometimes two of these beings appear. The apparition circles the fire, stops beside the singers, and chants a song to them in a low voice. Then it enters the back-room and is seen no more. Presently the singers strike up the song they have just heard. To those who are neither a'alk nor tsaok it seems that the song was brought by the supernatural visitor; in reality, it is the one previously composed by the singers and taught by them to the wearer of the mask to lend realism to the performance. The youth concealed within the back-room does not emerge on this occasion, the song is merely sung in practice. Sometimes the masked figure appears during the daytime and walks openly along the shore of the river like a foreign guest, as indeed it is said to be.

The coming of a tutwinam is one of the points of resem-[184] blance between a'alk and tsaok rites. The older people agree [178] that this has long been a feature of the former society, adopted by the latter in recent years. The description given in this section appears to be of the original and proper use, although, as already noted, the tsaok have recently employed tutwinam for somewhat different purposes.

It is uncertain whether or not the a'alk novice remains secluded any longer within the back-room. In ancient times he probably did, but with the recent growth of the tsaok

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

556 society and decline of the a'alk, concealment has become lim- 575 ited to initiates of the former organization.

No more a'alk dances take place during the potlatch pre- [178] liminaries, but with the coming of the first group of foreign 556 guests, the host displays as many types of dance as he is en- 575 titled to, including a'alk if he has the necessary prerogative. 535
On this occasion other a'alk, especially relatives of the donor, give their dances, the only time that such are used at potlatches except by novices receiving names. This is repeated on the arrival of every party of guests.

Meanwhile the novice, or novices, has been practising the proper steps for his appearance, which always occurs immediately before the entry of the masked figure representing the donor's dead relative. As already mentioned, there are four kinds of a'alk dances, known as nuiqual,[1] llaiyáłam, qi'aqa, and am'lel a. A similar song is used for a dancer of any one [533] of these four; the text describes some small incident of the ancestral myth in which the name occurs, such as the bringing down of the prerogative by the first incumbent in the beginning of time. At the proper moment, the singers beat this out and the audience joins them in singing it. Then the singers begin to strike rapidly on the floor with double beats, assisted [533] by the guests who clap their hands in rapid couplets. Out comes the dancer, resplendent in his head-dress decorated with weasel skins, and women with the required prerogative begin to drone. If his prerogative is as a llaiyáłam or qi'aqa, he proceeds to a place beside the fire and begins to run around it, sunwise, in short mincing steps, revolving at the same time on himself. He clasps his hands behind his back and bends down, then stands upright with palms extended upwards, never ceasing to move his feet in rapid steps. This type of dance is far more violent than a susaał one, and the amount of energy expended by a dancer in his rapid circuits of the fire is tremendous. Never, even for a moment, are his feet quiet, while his body twists and bends in an amazing fashion. After two 556 or three rounds he retires utterly exhausted. The time beaten 575 out for a nuxqual or am'lel-a dancer is the same. He too comes 535 near the fire and at first dances in the same manner until the [533] singers in unison bellow out, H'ai , "More." With a run that ends in a crashing leap that seems to shake the floor, the performer takes his position between the fire and one of the side walls and begins to revolve furiously upon himself. His body is bent forward until it seems as if all that prevents him from falling to the floor is his hands clutched together as far as possible behind his back; while his feet move so rapidly that the short mincing steps run into each other. Gradually the beating becomes less violent, only to be followed by another cry of H'ai , and another rush and jump that lands the dancer behind the fire. Here he revolves once more in the same furious fashion; the same is repeated on the side of the fire opposite to the place where he first performed, and finally between the fire and the door. Nuxqual and am'lel-a are the most strenuous of all Bella Coola dances and the performer is glad to retire. He afterwards joins the audience. This dance entails no taboo or restrictions on the dancer.

This terminates the performance of this type of dance at a potlatch, but among the goods distributed are some to validate the name acquired by the dancer, and others to legalize his actual display.

574 The occasion on which importance and solemnity are 575 attached to a'alk dances is during potlatches, but they are 535 also given at other times. Most Bella Coola performances are so steeped in the presence of the supernatural that the element of enjoyment is secondary, but in the spring, after the [196] end of the kuxiut season and before the salmon come to the rivers, dances for pleasure are of common occurrence. A xuxuk can call his fellows to his house and the singers beat out xuxuk songs to which the owners dance, but the most common hosts are a'alk. Of course an individual may be a member of both societies, but the heralds invite the guests in his a'alk name. Those summoned include both members of the society and those who are not. Any a'alk, provided that he has enough food for a meal, can call in his neighbours, but the one who usually does so is a man who has received his name a year or two before the occasion. 574 575 535

A few days before the time selected, the host asks the singers to compose a new song for him. For a nusqwal dancer particularly, and in some cases for any one of the other three divisions of the society, the text does not deal with incidents connected with the host's ancestral story, but with humorous or disgraceful incidents of the present time. If a man has caught ten salmon and kept them all for himself, his miserliness is commented upon in the song; if a wife has deserted her husband for another man, the actions of the two are mercilessly ridiculed; if a chief has failed to display generosity it is likewise recorded, and reference is made to errors in dance ritual. To do this is one of the functions of a nusqwal, and the singers are always ready to assist him. At the same time they often add a new incident to the tune belonging to some other a'alk dancer so that he too will be able to perform. In this way the airs are remembered from year to year, which is different from the customary Bella Coola usage. 575 574 535 533 [626]

On the morning of the day chosen, the host asks one of the singers to beat a drum repeatedly but slowly, as a signal that a non-ceremonial dance is about to take place. About noon, heralds go from house to house announcing who is to give the dance. In the late afternoon the people gather in the donor's house where men, women, and children seat themselves without distinction of rank, the only reserved place being that for the singers behind the fire. They beat out the host's tune and he dances to it, while the singers themselves sing the words to the amusement of the audience. Using their own discretion, they then beat out the tune of another a'alk and he also dances, followed in succession by a third, a fourth, and as many as the singers think fit. Sometimes the songs of ssaok are used in a similar manner. When many have danced, the host distributes food to all his guests, not forgetting to give the largest [202] [203]

presents to the singers and heralds who have rendered assistance. Instead of dispersing immediately, the guests may remain to gamble or wrestle. Since there is no solemnity attached to the affair, it is a time for indulgence in amusements of all kinds. These conclude the chief features of the a'alk dances. Probably they once played an important part in the lives of the Bella Coola, but with the increase in importance of the ɪsaok, they have decayed into little more than a form of entertainment.

A'alk ORIGIN MYTHS

551 575 773

Theoretically, every Bella Coola a'alk should be able to record the myth in which his name is embodied, but few can do so. Of course if a man has been able to validate both ancestral and a'alk names from the same myth, that is his authorization for both. In many cases a myth is split, and the portion containing an a'alk appellation is given to some member of the ancestral family, other than the chief able to validate the most important ancestral name. In such a case, the a'alk can record little more than that his designation came down with a specified group of the first people. This, for example, is the explanation given by a Kimsquit nusqual for his name Sinxälotla which came to earth with Smaoan (I, p. 332) in the beginning of time. Another Kimsquit a'alk, Tlaiyäkam, whose prerogative is to perform the dance of that name, states that it was brought down by Sinuqstl (I, p. 326), who assumed the designation of Tlaiyäkam after its performance. This early settler had the additional name of Wi'tälao.

539

The two following origin myths were obtained in some detail:

Once,[1] long, long ago, Äqunäm came to the conclusion that it was not good for the inhabitants of the world to be afraid of supernatural beings. He decided that the best way to dispel this dread would be to arrange a marriage between his daughter, Sunaw-a, and a mortal; so he sent the young woman down to Stwix. She brought with her a small ring and told the people that her father had commanded her to marry the first mortal who succeeded in casting a stone through it. Sunaw·a was so lovely that all the young chiefs hastened to try their skill, but not one of them could succeed. At that time there was living at Stwix a poor orphan Bo'ostem, who had been brought up by his grandmother. Like all other young men, he admired the beautiful maiden and determined to try his skill. Bo'ostem asked his grandmother to wash and paint him preparatory to entering the contest. She was most unwilling, thinking that where chiefs had failed, there would be no hope for her grandson, but at length a friend persuaded her to give the lad a chance, and she painted his face as he had requested.

Bo'ostem took two pebbles of suitable size from the river and smeared them with colour. He told the first stone to go through the air and graze the ring, and the second to pass through it. The haughty young chiefs who had failed were amused at the idea of Bo'ostem even entering the competition, and asked him how such a lowly individual as he could aspire to the beautiful Sunaw·a. Paying no heed to his mockers, Bo'ostem again whispered his instructions to the first stone and threw it. Obedient to his instructions, the pebble grazed the ring, and once more the chorus of jeers burst out:

"Ha! Ha! What else did you expect, Bo'ostem!"

Nothing daunted, Bo'ostem told the second stone to pass through the ring. It did so, to the amazement and chagrin of the young chiefs.

Bo'ostem and Sunaw·a were married in due course. With his wife's help, the poor orphan became prosperous and built a fine house for himself. After a few months his wife became pregnant, and with phenomenal rapidity gave birth to a male child. The infant grew faster than a mortal, and in a few months had become a sturdy little boy. One day he asked his father to make him a bow and arrows, which Bo'ostem did. He gave his son a large number of arrows, but the latter said that he would want many more. As his father watched, the boy shot one arrow after another into the air, but not one fell back to earth. The lad asked for more arrows, which Bo'ostem gave him after some hesitation, and these too disappeared into the sky. At length the father saw above him what appeared to be a thin rod stretching down from above; it came lower and lower until he could see that it was formed by the arrows, each one lodging in the butt of its predecessor. In response to his son's requests, Bo'ostem made more and more arrows until the rod reached the earth.

The boy told his father that the topmost arrow was embedded in the floor of Sway" and that he proposed to use the chain of shafts as a ladder

539 to climb up to visit his grandfather. Be'estem did not discourage him, so his son began the ascent and soon disappeared from sight. In course of time he reached the land above and made his way to his grandfather, Ałqunstm, who was delighted to see him. He told his visitor that he was weary of constantly carrying the sun's light, and asked him to relieve [821] him of the duty for a time. He mentioned that on previous occasions when his wife had acted as his substitute, she, being a woman, had been shy and had hidden herself behind clouds. The boy was willing to undertake the task and listened to his grandfather's instructions; in the morning he was to use only one fire stick, a little later, two, then three, and, finally, four at midday. In the afternoon he was to decrease the number in a manner corresponding to the morning's increase."

Next day Ałqunstm went away for a holiday after entrusting his grandson with the precious fire sticks. As soon as he was alone, the malicious youth began to pile one after another on the fire, until people in the world far below were wakened at dawn by the suffocating warmth. Be'estem's son threw on log after log, each increasing the heat below. The earth began to sizzle, and finally burst into flames, and the water boiled in the rivers and ocean. Sneowa had realized what must be the matter as soon as she felt the great heat, so she went outside and rubbed her hand over the planks on her house. Thus protected, those within survived, although all other human beings perished. Most of the animals [825] escaped by hiding, though the weasel failed to conceal the tip of its tail which was burnt black, a characteristic inherited by all weasels ever since. Ałqunstm felt the heat and hurried home.

"You have done great harm to mortals," he burst out angrily. "Henceforth you shall live on earth as a mink."

[825] Ałqunstm seized his grandson and cast him to earth in this guise.

The survivors of the catastrophe multiplied until the whole world 539 was repopulated from the single household. Each of them took an a'alt 551 name from the burning, and these have been transmitted from one to 575 another of the descendants of each until this day. One of these, a sxaqwal name, is Stałpahram, "The Increase of the Sun's Heat through the Addition of Fire Sticks"; another, a Sła'ałtłum, uwałwałtała, "The Track of the Sun"; a third, Słaml, "The Charred Portion of a Half-Consumed Log."

539 The following Kimsquit story[a] describes the obtaining of 575 an a'alt prerogative in the distant past.

Long ago, there lived in Kimsquit a young chief who was a great hunter. On one occasion, he was camping in a cave, Anoko̓wi̓ili, on the mountains when not only its roof, but the dome of the sky as well, opened so that he was able to gaze into the upper regions of space. From this manifestation of the supernatural, he took for himself the name Ätkwi, "The Opening of the Upper Regions," and validated it by giving valuable presents. This name has been transmitted from generation to generation and was recently brought to the present owner by his wife. With it is the prerogative of distributing potlatch gifts outside the house since the first Ätkwi claimed that the sky itself was his only ceiling.

A few years after Ätkwi had had this experience, he and his three brothers left Kimsquit by canoe to hunt mountain goats at Sawalk. To their surprise, a gull perched on the bow of their canoe; they did not scare it away, thinking it indicated a manifestation of the supernatural. At intervals it left its perch and circled around the canoe, but soon returned. As they neared the landing-place, the gull flew ashore and changed into a yearling mountain goat. Ätkwi told his brothers, of whom the second was named Äkwa and the third O'mäni, that he believed this to be a further visitation of the supernatural to himself and that he would investigate it, and later meet them at Anoko̓wi̓ili.

Ätkwi leapt ashore and followed the yearling goat. Wherever the road was rough, his strange guide travelled slowly so that his human companion could follow him. At length they came to a deep chasm with sheer walls about six feet apart, and a ledge running along one side. Ätkwi followed the goat along this, until the animal leapt across the gorge, struck the face of the precipitous rock, and vanished. It was clear that he had passed into the interior of the mountain and the chief could hear the distant sound of a drum.

"I can die but once," he said to himself.

Then the brave hunter leapt across the chasm, struck the rock, and passed through it as if it had been tissue paper, to find himself in a vast cavern amid a large number of people. These were really animals who had gathered to await the coming of his guide, the yearling goat. The latter told him not to be afraid, that henceforth he would be under the protection of all animals and would not come to harm, no matter how often he hunted. With breathless interest, Ätkwi watched the performance of a nuqwal dance, for every yearling goat is a supernatural dancer of this type. The ceremony lasted throughout the night, and next morning he set out for Anoko̓wi̓ili, not realizing that it was really a year since he had left his brothers.

Meanwhile, though the three brothers had almost despaired of their elder's safe return, they patiently remained at their post, and after a year were overjoyed to see smoke rising from Anoko̓wi̓ili. They hurried

539 to the cave and greeted their long-lost brother affectionately. Though
575 he, too, was delighted at the reunion, he said but little, and for two days told them nothing of his experiences. They remained in camp and on the third night Ätkwi told his brothers that he had obtained supernatural hunting powers. The following morning the four went out and killed so many mountain goats that the cave was filled with their carcasses. Their good fortune was amazing. Ätkwi sent one of his brothers to invite to the cave not only the people of Kimsquit but of the whole countryside as well. While he was absent on this errand, the remaining three prepared and smoked the meat, taking care to preserve the leg bones.

Within two weeks the guests began to assemble. Anaklwätlä was a good place for a ceremony because Ätkwi had decorated it with paintings after its roof had opened to show him the upper regions of space.[11] When all the people had arrived, the host gave a mountain goat leg-bone to each, asking every recipient to beat time with it. Then Ätkwi danced [535] a nuxqual dance, imitating the one he had seen done by the goat. After performing, he unfolded the story of his adventures and finished by giving away valuable presents of smoked meat and goat grease. Thus was initiated this particular nuxqual dance.

In later years, Ätkwi had such phenomenal success in hunting that [551] by distributing the spoil he was able to create and confirm for his youngest brother the name, Nuxlalwaltmi, "The One Who is Always Successful." This has since been transmitted from one generation to another. Ätkwi, [103] too, is responsible for the name of Mount Tcupinätl, "Leg-Bones." On one occasion he killed a large number of mountain goats on the mountain and left their leg-bones, tcupinätl, piled together near the spot. He instructed everyone to refer to the mountain by that name, which has since been done.

575 A few words should be said about the reputed early history
578 of the a'alk society. Its members seem always to have been on the best of terms with the sisaak, and there is no mention of feuds between these two organizations. On the other hand, there is said to have been constant friction with members of the kusiut society.[12] The latter comprises a large number of individuals bound together by the possession of supernatural patrons and claiming to possess supernatural powers. In contrast to the a'alk, the kuxiut are well organized and regulated; its members are proud of their powers, and scornful of those who lack the same. Under these circumstances, it is not difficult to understand jealousy between the two. Until relatively recent times, the a'alk were numerically stronger, and included some chiefs, whereas the strength of the kuxiut society depended on the supernatural strength claimed by its members. It is true that individuals occasionally belonged to both, if they happened to possess prerogatives of both kinds, but, as a rule, the a'alk were young men and the kuxiut were older people. This rivalry was formerly so intense that all who were not members of the latter society were often termed a'alk irrespective of whether or not they actually possessed dances of that type; Carrier Indians alone were not so designated. During the summer, members of the two societies dwelt amicably together, but during the winter, when dances took place, there were continual bickerings. The kuxiut constantly endeavoured to impress their rivals with their own prowess; while the a'alk, not convinced of the others' power, used to mock them in their songs. This was the usual practice in case of some error in kuxiut ritual. The a'alk frequently disobeyed the orders of the kuxiut and a number of them once tried to pry up a huge boulder beneath which was the "power" of a certain kuxiut (II, p. 8). In recent years the kuxiut society has entirely gained the supremacy, but it is agreed by all Bella Coola that in former years this was by no means the case, and that a'alk did not hesitate even to kill one of their rivals.

[532] [11]These paintings are said to be still in existence, and the sister of one informant claimed to have seen them.

[12]This point is elaborated in vol. II, chap. x.

Miscellaneous Ceremonies

The rites described in this chapter and the one preceding comprise the potlatch of the Bella Coola so far as its details could be learnt. Until the increase of wealth in recent years, the potlatch was rare, and it is unlikely that in any village more than one month in the year was consumed in the

Schultz-Swanton E-5 (1902-1904) 1948
NEB BellaCoola NEB

556 performance of rites of this kind. But sociological and ethical [182] concepts, shown at their highest development in the potlatch, are not limited to a few weeks of the year, or to any class of the community. Generosity on a large scale can be publicly [577] displayed by chiefs alone, but to a lesser degree this virtue must be practised by everyone, since avarice is considered a 576 major sin. Anyone who happens to pass a house in which a 574 meal is taking place must be invited to share it; to do otherwise would be considered rude. The person summoned must take at least a trifle to show that he is not churlish and too proud to eat with his host, while if he is hungry, he shares [177] whatever is being served as a matter of course. The head of [273] the family should be the first to taste any wine* as proof that it is not poisoned, but otherwise he fares little, if any, better [342] than his guests. This custom is now rapidly falling into disuse [414] through the construction of individual family houses with doors and locks. The fisherman who has exclusive rights to a suit-476 able place for netting olachen or salmon must give some of his [224] catch to anyone who asks him. If he has landed four salmon, the first solicitor is given one, later comers, none at all. When a net is set in the river, anyone passing is allowed to raise it and take some of the contents; if there are two fish, he may remove one, if many, three or four. To take all would be a [685] despicable theft, sufficient to brand the transgressor as greedy;
[624] hence public opinion prevents the system from being carried [224] to excess. A hunter who brings back several mountain goats or other large game is expected to invite his neighbours to a feast, which virtually means that he must share his takings.

556 Presents of this kind increase the prestige of the donor who 431 has thus acted in accordance with Bella Coola ethics, and are advantageous investments since others must reciprocate. The system is carried to such lengths that, until recent years, it was more profitable to give away goods than to sell them. In the case of a sale, the purchaser endeavours to give as little as possible, whereas the recipient of a gift returns as much as he can. Several of the older people mentioned that early white traders would have received more for their goods by giving them away than by selling. 556 431

*This is a modern practice, dating from the introduction of house-keys.

1:56:Dewalth E-5 (1922-1924)948
NEB Bellacoola NEB

Even at the present time the Bella Coola sometimes carry out a practice which was once common. Particularly in the early autumn or in spring, a chief who has large supplies of food may decide to show his wealth to the members of a neighbouring tribe such as the Bella Bella. Alone, or with a few friends, he goes to a foreign village where he is sure to find accommodation in the home of some friend, relative, or important chief. In the evening he invites the inhabitants of his host's village to the house in which he is staying, and uses the food he has brought with him to provide them with an elaborate meal. His guests now feel it incumbent on them to repay this generosity, and one of them asks the singers to beat out one of his songs, the Bella Bella equivalent to nuaat, a'alk, or even kuxiat. The owner dances to it and then gives presents to the stranger to validate the performance he has just witnessed. This is repeated by everyone to whom he has given food, and although each present may be small, their total is greater than the original outlay. Sometimes a poor man, feeling himself too insignificant to give a ceremony of this kind, takes a supply of food to a foreign tribe to sell. If the hosts wish to show their generous dispositions they persuade him to give it away in the fashion just described, which always brings in more than he could obtain by sale. It is even customary for the hosts to lend such a stranger enough food for public distribution if his own stock is too small. 556 449 [484]

Although the most important Bella Coola dances are performed at potlatches or during the kuxiat season, they are not confined to these periods. Professional singers do nothing else and, except during the run of salmon when everyone is busy fishing, a dance occurs every few nights. Supernatural beings are not called down; consequently there is little solemnity and everyone has a good time. On these occasions, kuxiat songs are first beaten out, followed by nuaat and a'alk, and the owner 533 535 574

NER Bellacoola NER

533 of each song dances to it. Anyone who has enough food to 535 provide a meal for all is glad to invite his neighbours to such 574 an affair, but the singers and heralds can force a stingy man to act as host. Everyone knows his neighbour's resources and the singers have no hesitation in going to the house of a man with an ample supply of food and beginning to beat out songs [203] there. The heralds are quick to see what is happening and [626] call the people, with the result that the involuntary host is compelled to provide a meal in order not to be thought mean and churlish. Without waiting for the singers to take the [203] initiative, heralds likewise often invite people to the house of a man whom they know to be well provided with food.

During the summer, the necessity of laying in supplies of [221] salmon makes it impossible to hold many dances, although one 796 of the non-sacred type just described takes place whenever there is a lull in the fishing. In the early autumn, when ber-
556 ries, fish, and game are abundant, the thoughts of chiefs turn 796 to potlatches and the lengthy preliminaries are begun. At this season, too, a chief who lacks sufficient wealth to invite foreign [221] guests, calls in his neighbours for a tusek dance and initiates
[575] some of his young relatives into that society. The ritual, described in the last chapter, resembles that of a potlatch
[535] except that no new house is constructed, there is no return of a dead relative, and the ceremonial connected with the coming of foreigners is necessarily omitted. In some cases a chief performs this type of rite a year before he proposes to hold a potlatch, and explains that he is doing so because he will be unable to give presents to the inhabitants of his own village [426] at the later affair. Gifts so distributed are returnable with interest, though it is not obligatory for recipients to do this in time for the donor to make use of their repayment at his potlatch.

Ceremonials of this nature occupy the Bella Coola during [575] the early autumn, while in winter kusiut dances take place [535] almost nightly. When they are over, it is time for the non-sacred variety of a'alt performances, and for another type of rite, nusāxkāmx̂.

Boas: Twenty E-5 (1923-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

rite, nusäxkämx. This can be described here, since, although not closely associated with the potlatch, it serves to teach children the principles of present-giving and indebtedness. February is the proper month for nusäxkämx, although preliminary arrangements are made early in the winter. A chief who has a son or daughter about ten or twelve years of age may decide to use some of his food, and a small part of his wealth, for the benefit of the child. With the assistance of his relatives, the father begins making large numbers of toy canoes, miniature bows and arrows, small baskets, and models of all other types of articles commonly given away at potlatches. The manufacture of these requires several months, but towards the end of January they are nearly ready.

A name must then be chosen for the child. Since a nusäxkämx dance is a humorous, non-sacred affair, a nusäxkämx name is not embodied in a myth, but is drawn from some story. Occasionally, parents decide on a new one, but more often the designation selected is one used for the same purpose by a grandparent of the child. There is no rivalry with regard to names of this type, and one of them can be re-used without asking consent of the last incumbent, although permission would never be refused. There must be a song with each name and the grandparents and other elderly relatives teach this to a number of boys who are to act as singers. The words may have been remembered from a previous occasion; if not, a simple theme is composed by one of the old people having some reference to the name about to be conferred. For example, one appellation of this type is Ṭopiwac, Fawn, and the accompanying words are:

"We hear that Deer has borne a child."

Another name is Qalew, Beaver, and the song: "Be of good cheer, the Beaver is coming."

A third song is, "Go outside under the house like a dog."

Occasionally a small incident in an ancestral myth is used. The teaching of the song to the juvenile singers is a source of constant merriment; the parents and grandparents are the 852 principal instructors, aided by the professional musicians.

867 Boys are always willing to act as singers for the practice they [533] receive, and the gifts they will acquire. Other lads are chosen to act as heralds, an effort being made in each case to pick those likely to pursue these professions.

[796] The day finally selected for the ceremony is in February, on a date when nothing of importance is taking place. The juvenile heralds summon the child guests, who have been invited in accordance with the rules governing a potlatch, especial care being taken to omit none to whom the child donor is indebted. His father carefully instructs him in this matter, thus impressing on his son's mind one of the fundamental points of Bella Coola life. In the late afternoon, when all have [535] assembled, the boy singers beat out the donor's song and he dances to it. It may be in the nature of a sisaok, a'alk, or kusiut dance, according to the wishes of his parents. In many cases, one of the grandparents or some other old relative likewise dances to the song, using whatever style he chooses. There is no ceremonial significance to the ceremony and all enjoy themselves immensely, especially the adult guests. After [553] the dancing, the new name is announced and presents are given to the guests. The father of the young donor carefully instructs him as to the scale of his gifts, emphasizing the necessity of rewarding the singers and heralds, and of repaying with interest those children from whom he has received favours. In this way, the ceremony serves as a practical example of how to conduct a potlatch. The parents of the donor always provide some tasty food for the occasion, and this is distributed after [556] the gifts have been handed round. The necessity for food and presents makes it impossible for any but the children of chiefs to enjoy this training.

After the ceremony, the children parade up and down the sidewalk in front of the houses, singing boisterously. The performance has been for their benefit and they wish to "show off." One night completes the affair, but the following afternoon another child may summon his comrades to a similar ceremony. The child singers first beat out the song of the present donor, then that of his predecessor, to which the latter dances once again. If food is plentiful, nusäxkämx ceremonies may be carried out every day for several weeks, or a year or two may elapse without one. A child's song is remembered from year to year and he dances whenever it is beaten out. The name acquired in this way is used semi-jocularly by a lad's comrades. After marriage, it is considered unfitting for a youth to be concerned with nusäxkämx and he normally becomes an a'alk.

Ceremonies of this kind have been discontinued for many years and it was impossible to obtain detailed accounts. The main features are clear: they served to instruct children in the methods of present-giving. According to one informant, there were two types of nusäxkämx ceremonial; one of the humorous pattern above described in which, however, food alone was given away, and another in which miniature presents were distributed. This man believed that the latter was only possible for the children of wealthy chiefs, and that on such occasions the themes consisted of small incidents in the family myth. In either case, the importance of ceremonial can be judged from the manner in which it was impressed upon mere children.

CHAPTER VI

ORIGIN MYTHS

Introductory—Bella Coola Origin Myths—Origin Myths of Other Tribes—Early Traditions Having the Ceremonial Significance of Origin Myths—Sisaok Origin Myths

INTRODUCTORY

773 128 EXAMPLES will be given here of the origin myths, which are believed to authorize so much of the ritual already described, and to which repeated reference has been made. [114] In 1898 Professor Boas published such an admirable collection of traditions of this type (pp. 50 ff.) that the present writer paid little attention to the subject. The Bella Coola, however, are so intensely proud of the deeds of their first forefathers [124] that several insisted on recounting them before they were willing to do other work; in consequence, a fair number of myths was collected through necessity. Since tales of this type were recounted almost entirely at potlatches, their significance has declined since the prohibition of this rite. Consequently, many legends are only remembered in part; the abbreviated and often pointless series of anecdotes here recorded can be no more than a small part of the rich field which must once have existed among the Bella Coola.[1]

424 773 As Professor Boas has clearly shown, origin myths relate how, in the beginning of time, the supreme god sent down to earth the first ancestors of the Bella Coola people, each usually

[1]In writing up this field material, it was my original intention to place all legends together in a separate section, or appendix, following a common anthropological practice. This, however, would have been contrary to Bella Coola thought since origin myths, for example, are regarded as entirely different from either mere stories, or from incidents connected with shamans,—to name two other groups of what are usually described as "legends." I recognize that the insertion of this chapter of origin myths interrupts the sequence of presenting Bella Coola culture, but I believe that it is the way which the Bella Coola themselves would regard as logical, and that it brings out the essential interactions of this type of myth upon their whole life.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

provided with means of sustenance, a house, and certain super- 424 natural powers. The right to the names of these people, as 773 well as to the type of ceremonial objects used by them, has been the privilege of their descendants. But these early Bella Coola, like their modern descendants, had several designations, each carrying with it a definite prerogative. In a single myth there may be embodied a dozen or more names and incidents which are quoted at the present day to authorize such different phases of culture as dances, rights to hunting-grounds, professions, names of dogs, or kusiut prerogatives.[1] Any myth which gives the initial use of a name, a dance, or any other prerogative, is termed a smaiusta. Each of these is, or was in the old days, remembered with great care and never recounted in full detail except to the members of the ancestral family whose names are embodied in it. Even at potlatches the full details of the myth are not laid bare. Indeed, if a young man is of a [577] flighty, garrulous disposition, unlikely to preserve the dignity of his ancestral fame, the details are concealed from him. Even at the present time there is much resentment at any unauthorized use of a smaiusta, and in the old days this would [627] inevitably have led to bloodshed.

Boas (p. 116) states that the terms smaiusta and sumsma are synonymous. The writer feels certain that this is an error. 114
It was discussed repeatedly with various Bella Coola, all of 538 whom agreed that a sumsma is a mere story which can be told by anyone, whereas a smaiusta is a myth possessed by the individual, or individuals, whose prerogatives are derived from it. To the Bella Coola the two are utterly different.

None the less, there is no doubt that records of the past 176 change from one category to the other. A wealthy chief, eager 773 to give a potlatch, but lacking the mythical authorization, must frequently have used a sumsma, claiming the hero as an ancestor. There would be veiled amusement at him for doing [183] so, but the prestige of one who can give potlatches is so great that in time his claim would probably be accepted. The two

[1] The details of these will be described later.

McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

178 versions of the myth given (vol. I, pp. 313-19) is a case in point.
773 The first was told as a smaiusta by a woman who claimed to be a descendant of the people figuring in it; the second, as a story, sumsma, by a man. In view of the reliability of both informants, it seems highly probable that this is a story, partly converted to a myth. In other examples there are incidents resembling the supernatural tales given in vol. I, chap. IX, and here too it appears probable that sumsma have been assimilated into smaiusta. It is complimentary to the truthfulness [577] of the Bella Coola, and to the respect they show for intangible [424] property, that none of the myths recorded were smaiusta owned by others. Repeatedly an informant would say that he knew one, but would not tell it since it belonged to some other family.

128 After collecting a few myths, in each of which it was stated
773 that the first settlers at village X were A, B, and C, with their sisters, P and Q, it seemed as if it would have been possible, before the culture of the Bella Coola had fallen into its present decay, to make a census of those whom they believe to have been first settlers of this earth, and that such a list would have had few contradictions. This was soon found to be false. Two myths may give different people as the first occupants of a certain village, nor does such contradiction trouble the Bella Coola. Each man, convinced of the authenticity of his own family account, is quite willing to believe that the one belonging [811] to someone else is equally correct. This characteristic lack of logical consistency has already been mentioned in other connections. Boas (p. 61) likewise gives an instance of uncertainty as to the first occupants of a village, though, on the whole, he found Bella Coola mythology to be more codified than the present writer has done. In view of their lack of systematization in other matters, it would have been surprising if they had evolved a census of their first ancestors, accepted by all as accurate.

[178] Another matter to be considered at this point is the similarity of detail in many myths. In part this can be explained by the assumption that sumsma have been elevated into smaiusta; in this case it would not be impossible for the same story to have been used by two or more families. A more common explanation is the splitting of myths. Although, theoretically, one can never be altered, and portions in the possession of other individuals are remembered as such, there must have been many cases in which the owner of a section told the whole as his own property. This would not be difficult in cases where he moved away from the other members of his family. In course of time, with the assimilation of elements in themselves not strictly mythological, two myths would evolve having a few incidents in common. If asked concerning this, the Bella Coola explain that the first people were quite as capable of doing the same things as two modern men. The occurrence of the same name, or names, in different myths does not, according to them, prove a connection, since many of the first people had the same names.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

Finally, there have been included a number of myths dealing with the coming to earth of people in other localities. Probably these are, in origin, those of other tribes, more or less assimilated to the Bella Coola pattern. Each was said to have been obtained by the marriage of one of the descendants of the people described therein with a Bella Coola.

No further explanation is needed for the following myths which are arranged, as far as possible, according to the list already given of Bella Coola towns.

Bella Coola Origin Myths

ORIGIN MYTH OF Ālqāläxl[1]

In the beginning of time, Ālqunīäm, in his form of Sunx, the Sun, sent down a man, Yuyulk"mai, to Mount Nus·mätlaix (also called Ālqunīämedku, Sqatsdx, and Alkikemlākun), a mountain on the north side of the Bella Coola River about two miles from the sea, near the upper end of the Indian reserve. With him came Xwonxwonum, the Hummingbird, *539 and Qwax, the Raven. The former flew ahead to clear a path down the mountain slope for Yuyulk"mai. At that time there was no sun, everything was dark and bleak. As they descended the mountain, they remembered that they had forgotten to bring from above the sticks for making fire which Sınx had promised them. So Raven assumed the form of a deer, returned to the upper regions, collected the desired appliances, and rejoined his companions below. Sınx had given Yuyulk"mai a stone hammer to use in making a salmon-weir, so he chose a site near the river, where the village of Ālqālāxl now stands, and built a house of evergreen boughs. The perpetual gloom annoyed Raven so that he determined to release light, sxem, which he knew was in a container in the house above. Once again he ascended and succeeded in uncovering the light of the sun which has since shone forth on this world. From this Raven took for himself the name, Qunqwınım uldidā sxem.

When Yuyulk"mai awoke after the first night in his new house, he found a salmon-weir ready for him, built by Sınx while he was sleeping. That night he slept again, but nothing had altered in the morning.

*539 551 During the day, Sınx appeared to Yuyulk"mai, saying:

"I bring you the name, Sınxālotla. When you give a potlatch, carve my face on your totem-pole."

The next day Sınx came again.

"I bring you the name, Sınxākila," he said. "When you give a potlatch, carve my face on the bench where the chiefs sit."

The third day Sınx appeared once more, saying:

"I bring you the name, Ānuxemlaix. When you give a potlatch, paint my face on the back wall of your house."

Next day Sınx appeared in the form of a stump with numerous radiating roots, scoured and polished by the river.

"You will have the name Alqexqi'djut,"[4] he said. "If you find a hammer used in the construction of salmon-weirs, you will know that other people are living above you on the river. Put abalone-shell on the hammer."

*539 With these instructions Sınx went away and never came back.

In course of time, when the population of the earth increased, Yuyulk"mai became rich and invited the people to a potlatch. The name he used on this occasion was Sınxālotla and he carved the face of Sınx on his totem-pole, as he had been instructed to do. A few years later he gave another potlatch, with the name Sınxākila, and this time he carved Sınx's face on the bench where the chiefs sat. When he gave his third rite he validated the name Ănuxemlaix, and he had Sınx's face painted on the back wall of his house. Yuyulk"mai's fourth and last potlatch was given in the name of Alqexqi'djut. This time he erected as a totem-pole a bare stick, presumably in reference to the appearance of Sınx as a tree-trunk.[5]

When Yuyulk"mai came to Mount Nus·mätllaix he was accompanied by his old father, Ťciknutl, his younger brother Diqom'notl, and a still younger sister, Kimilkän. These three went away at once to the Skeena River, taking with them some of the large cone-shaped whistles which they had brought with them as a present from the supreme god. The people living on the Skeena desired these articles so greatly that they quarrelled and fought for them, disgusting Ťciknutl and Kimilkän so much that they determined to return.[6] But Ťciknutl was too old to travel. His daughter had a copper upon which she thrust her aged father, and then placed it firmly against the under side of a rock which was suspended without visible support a few feet above the ground. Ťciknutl was wedged between boulder and copper, and there he died. Kimilkän retraced her steps back to Bella Coola, to the summit of Mount Nus·mätllaix, whence she took flight back to the land above.

Meanwhile Diqom'notl was prospering. He lived in a copper shelter on the shore of a river with a copper raven, Snuqwaxwäls, perched on the roof of his house where it could peer over the edge into the river beneath to see the salmon, Snusımkäls, and the salmon, Snusımlkänk'. Diqom'notl was able to give potlatches at which he made for himself the name Ao·sti, and the sısaok name, Łäliämy. One of the songs which he used was composed as if it were sung by the copper itself: the themes of others were Snuqwaxwäls, Snusımkäls, and Snusımlkänk'.

At last Diqom'notl became weary of the Skeena and determined to visit Yuyulk"mai. Travelling in a copper canoe he soon reached the mouth of the Pe·ssls where he found no one. From this experience he created for himself the name, U·sḳäxus, which means, "There is Nothing." Diqom'notl proceeded on foot to Sınxl, where he met Yuyulk"mai to whom he told his adventures.

SECOND ORIGIN MYTH OF Älqäläxl[7]

In the beginning there came down to the western slope of Mount Nus·mätllaix three brothers, whose names, in relative order of their ages,

[5]The names which occur in this myth are still in use.

[6]Another version states that they married and settled on the Skeena where their descendants still live; it is said that their origin myths record their Bella Coola ancestry.

539 were Stālhmx, ʟyuyuyut, and Nuxemda. Descending the mountain they settled at Alqālāxl. There was a spring inside their house, near the back-wall, and from spring water, xwanutl, the brothers took for themselves the name Snuxwnulāls.

After they had been living on this earth for some time Stālhmx married a certain Skqwālutl; they soon had a daughter to whom they gave the name, Nuxemtaidn·a. Much to the parents' joy, she grew into girlhood very rapidly and was soon of marriageable age. Now at this time there was no sun; it was hidden in a container hanging from the roof of Stālhmx's house. Raven determined to obtain this for the use of mortals, and decided to become Nuxemtaidn·a's child with this aim in view. First he changed himself into a tiny fragment of hemlock needle, and placed himself in the cup from which she was drinking. But the girl blew away the fragment of leaf, though she had no idea that it was Raven. Again he tried by changing himself to a piece of eagle down, but again she skimmed it from the surface of the water. The third time Raven became mud. Nuxemtaidn·a drank this carelessly with the water, and was both startled and perturbed to find herself pregnant. Raven had entered her body.

One day Nuxemtaidn·a saw a very old man sitting by the side of a pool. He had spots of red paint on his face and appeared to be very poor. The man's name was Kāmālqwax. The girl told her father whom she had seen and Stālhmx upbraided her for not inviting him to come to their house.[1]

In course of time Nuxemtaidn·a gave birth to an infant who was, of course, Raven. Within a few weeks he had grown to a naughty little boy, always demanding new toys, and always crying if he could not get them. One day he saw the sun hanging near the roof and at once he began to cry for the shining thing. He continued until Stālhmx yielded to his grandson's tears and gave it to him to play with. Raven played with it on the floor for a short time, then opened the door and dashed out. As he did so he shattered the container which held light. It became the sun, which has since remained shining. Raven once more assumed his bird form and flew away.

ʟyuyuyut, the second brother, had received from Ālqunīām the power of completing the transformation to human form of any of the first people. Some of them who had come to earth as eagles still had the beaks of these birds, others had the tails of wolves, or other animal characteristics. ʟyuyuyut remedied these defects by rubbing the affected parts with urine.

From this he took for himself the name, Yu'yuhaslaia, "The Face Cleanser."

According to another informant the first settler at Ālqālxal was Xemzemnum who brought with him a moosehide and a model of Nuzmāt·a. He set up this house and it expanded or contracted according to his wish.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Slskistl[9]

Among the first people to be sent down to this earth was Ḳril. For some time he lived on the north side of the Bella Coola River near its mouth; then with his sister, Ānuzyalaix, and a herald he moved across to Slskistl, at the base of the mountain on the south shore of the river. He had a daughter who married a son of Xemzemnum, living on the north side of the river. To their child he gave the name Nosmāzaik.

About this time Ālkwi, a Snuklo·tl chief, lost Alqcālas, a stake decorated with abalone-shells which he used for his salmon-trap. It floated down into Ḳril's country where Ānuzyalaix saw it, and advised her brother to take possession of it. Ḳril did so gladly because of its beautiful decoration, without knowing what it was or whence it came. He took it home and displayed it to many of his neighbours, but no one could tell him what it was. In honour of this event Ḳril gave his son the name Alqcālas, which has since been handed down in his family. Ālkwi followed downstream after his stake, but failed to overtake it before Ḳril had obtained it; so it was never returned to its rightful owner.

FRAGMENT OF A Ḳomqo·ts ORIGIN MYTH[10]

In the beginning Ālqunām sent down from Nuzmāt·a to Mount Nuz·āmm, on the south side of the Bella Coola River, about one and a half miles from the sea, four brothers: the eldest, Xemlaia or Laqwomais; the second whose name is unknown; the third, ułqalam; and the youngest, ułmaisa. They each came in the form of some animal, bringing with them a miniature salmon-weir, which they set up in the river near where they had settled. ułmaisa brought with him the prerogative of punishing violators of taboos connected with the river. The four brothers lived for some time at the base of the mountain until jealousy arose among them and the eldest moved to Ḳomqo·ts. There he caught innumerable salmon in the river so he was soon able to give them to people all over the world. It seemed as if the earth were tilted so that all its wealth flowed in upon him; accordingly he took for himself the name Siālxelāx which has this significance. Since he was the eldest and chief of the four brothers the name has always been considered the most exalted in Ḷomṇo·ts.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Snulǝli[11]

In the beginning of time Ālqunām created the forefathers of all mankind in his house above and then asked each in what form he wished to go to earth. A number of bird and animal cloaks were hanging on the walls of the house, and each was invited to take his choice. One whose name was Kāliāks chose the raven. When he had donned the garment he became a raven. Slowly he circled down from above in long spirals, carrying with him his two younger brothers and a sister, all in raven form, as a bird carries its young. He set down the two small brothers on the top of a flat mountain near Snulǝli where he told them to remain, adding:

"I am going to the east but will return."

He brought back some abalone-shells, which he set down near the diminutive ravens, saying:

"Stay here, I am going to the west but will return."

This time he brought back with him some copper, that flashed in the sun.

Kāliāks and his two brothers now assumed human form and sent their raven cloaks floating back to the land above. This was what happened to all the bird and animal forms used by the first people. The three descended the mountain and built their house by the Bella Coola River at the spot now known as Snulǝli. Kāliāks had brought with him a mountain goat, which, when set at liberty, bred with great rapidity, so that these first Snulǝli people subsisted largely on goat flesh, the provision made for them by Ālqunām. In some inexplicable manner it appears that the supernatural hunter Twalālhit, whose other name is Lalemkila, "The One Who Throws Down [Goats]," had come with this group. Kāliāks had such success in hunting that he was able to give a potlatch and bestow valuable presents of goat meat, goat grease, and woollen blankets. At this ceremony he took for himself the sisaok name, Łālāliāmdimut, "The Copper One," because when returning from the west the raven had covered himself with copper, so that it seemed as if he were made of it.[12]

During his lifetime, though whether before or after his potlatch, it is impossible to state, Kāliāks determined to obtain light for mankind, as at that time it was all semi-darkness, faintly illuminated by what resembled pale moonlight. He remembered that he had seen the sun in Ālqunātm's house, enclosed in a kind of a sack, and he determined to steal it. So he again assumed the form of a raven and flew back aloft. Without allowing himself to be seen, he changed himself into a grain of dust and placed himself in a cup from which Ālqunātm's daughter, Sigman-a, was about to drink. Noticing the speck of dirt, she blew it away. Then he changed to a hemlock needle, floating on the surface of the liquid, but she lifted it off. Undiscouraged, Raven became mud which she drank down, enabling him to enter her body. Sigman-a was greatly surprised to find herself pregnant, and so was her father. In course of time a boy was born, really Raven, though she knew it not. He grew with phenomenal rapidity, and within a few weeks was crawling around on the floor and, like a spoilt child, crying for playthings. Whatever his mother or grandmother gave him, he threw aside after a few minutes and cried the more; he was a fractious child. Looking up, Raven pretended to notice for the first time the sun, dimly gleaming from within its container as it hung from the roof of his grandfather's house. He cried and cried, almost choking himself; nothing would satisfy him, so at last his indulgent grandfather gave him the shining object though he was careful to pad the floor with soft bark. The happy child rolled the dimly glowing ball around on the soft covering for some time, but when the door was opened, he crawled outside with it, burst the container against the door-post, assumed raven form once more, and flew away, croaking derisively. Thus human beings received the boon of sunlight. Raven flew back to earth and again became Kālādks.

SECOND ORIGIN MYTH OF Snulɔli[11]

Long, long ago, there were no people on this earth; they were all in Nusmāt-a where different languages were made. Then Ālqunātm gave life to the occupants of his house and sent them down to earth. A post, nulunikta, stretched from the land above to this world, and down this swarmed five brothers, Xemcua, Yuyulk"mai, Pungkla, Wādks, and Nōkile. Pungkla, who was in part an eagle, brought with him an olachen and a hammer for driving stakes used for olachen nets, and Xemcua and Yuyulk"mai brought a painted seat which they used at ceremonial gatherings. About the same time four sisters came to earth at Nooi, far to the east. Their names were Wiakai, who was without legs; Tsumlūks; Skamolsymdn-a; and Nuskwalsklānda. Pungkla exerted his power of thought to make them come to Bella Coola. The four women set out for the west and at Smaiw-a, the source of the Bella Coola River, Wiskai scraped the ground with what served her as a foot, and a stream began to flow. Skumelqwán-a put her hands over her head and began to rock to and fro in woe at seeing the water, hence her name; Tsemlíuks sucked up much of it, but a gentle rivulet continued to flow which they followed to the west. It increased in size and ultimately led them to Nuxpalit, where they heard Echo (I, p. 306). Wiskai led her sisters to the south to get some of the highly prized paint which was bubbling from the ground like a spring.

Meanwhile Xemsus had come from his mountain at Tsmaní, and though Y'xyalk'mai had gone to Sinaí they continued their joint ownership of the painted seat. Pnqhula went westward looking for a suitable place to settle, carrying with him his olachen and his hammer. At Mesatche Nose, the point between North Bentinck Arm and Labouchere Channel, a house arose from the water beneath him. It was that of Xemqwu, chief of the sea creatures, within which the walls were painted by the rising and falling of the tides. This house appeared, moved slightly, and subsided, whereby Pnqhula became a shaman. He continued his journey, stopping at Xwaqa, Tál-ia, and Nuk' rivers, at the last of which he met a chief A'yanq, and his herald, Kámcia. There he threw his olachen into the water, where it multiplied past all count in order to serve as his food. Pnqhula ascended a small river flowing from the east and after various travels reached Swaloli where the rest of his party had remained. Here he constructed a fish-dam in which many salmon were caught. He built a house fashioned on the plan of the one which had risen from the water, and invited guests from far and near to potlatches. It fell several times, but he always rebuilt it. Four of the brothers married the four sisters.

The above myth was collected with difficulty and probably contains many inaccuracies. No explanation could be obtained of the relationship, if any, of this group to Kálikis and his people. Another informant stated that Pnqhula settled at Tsmaní, where he used his hammer to construct a salmon-weir.

THIRD ORIGIN MYTH OF Swaloli[a]

Before this earth was populated Ilqunstw created birds and animals in his house up above, giving to each its form and its voice. Only Raven was dissatisfied, and constantly rubbed off his coat of paint, hoping that he might be adorned even more beautifully. At that time Raven had variegated plumage. When everything was ready, Ałqunxtem sent a house, built like his own, and all that it contained down to Snaiłł under the guidance of a man, to whom he had given his own name and his own power. This human Ałqunxtem tried to paint Raven, without being able to please the petulant fellow, until, becoming disgusted, he coated him a uniform black which Raven could not remove. Now all was finished, and when Ałqunxtem opened the door, out rushed the animals and the birds. In the press Qao ḥuḥ, the Duck, whose seat was on the left of the fire facing inwards, was stepped upon; that is why to this day the duck can only waddle awkwardly. Her neighbour, Łqual ḥuḥ, another species of duck, whose place was opposite Qao ḥuḥ, was not injured; consequently she can walk comfortably.

Among the animals released was Deer, who rushed down to the river, seized some sticks, thrust them up on his head where they grew into antlers which had hitherto been lacking. There was no fire in the world then, so Deer determined to obtain some from the house of Ałqunxtem above. He returned aloft and began to dance. Ałqunxtem, not recognising the disguised Deer, watched the performer with interest. Suddenly the crafty one thrust his head down into the flames, trundling some of the burning sticks on his antlers and rushed away, with Ałqunxtem in vain pursuit. This is the way fire was brought to the world.

In course of time, the man, Ałqunxtem, amassed enough goods to give a potlatch, taking for himself the name Ałqunxtmałkx, as the supreme god had decreed. When the guests had assembled Deer danced, but in his wild gyrations he kicked some of the visitors, wounding them. The irate Ałqunxtmałkx chased him out of the house and told him never to return. The guests then gave presents to Ałqunxtmałkx, to his heralds, and to those who had been injured by Deer.

Since that time whenever the owner of the name Ałqunxtmałkx gives a potlatch he erects a house similar to that brought down by his first ancestor with a totem-pole showing a design of Raven. Included in the ritual is a presentation of presents similar to that carried out by the guests to the first Ałqunxtmałkx; it is not clear whether this was originally done as a mark of goodwill or whether it was to shame the host on account of maltreatment of the guests. Belonging to this origin myth is the nuxmal name, Talałkw.

The inclusion of such explanatory details as this is a common feature of origin myths and illustrates the way in which traditions blend into narratives; in the old days they would not have been related at potlatches, but it seems wise to include them where necessary at the end of individual myths.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nuxfalst[15]

In the beginning of time there came down from Nuxmăt·a to Nuxfalst a man whose name was Kămăltsong[16]. As a present from Ăkuxtăm he had brought with him a model of Nuxmăt·a, which he set up on this earth and to which he gave the same name. This was after the first tsong[16] sky, had fallen; it was from this catastrophe that Kămăltsong[16] derived his name.

Kămăltsong[16] had seen at the zenith of Nuxmăt·a the face of a grizzly bear, in consequence of which he used that animal for all his decorations. His blankets, food boxes, spoons, all were adorned with grizzly bear designs; the door of his house, Nuxmăt·a, was the mouth of one which opened to admit a guest, and closed when he had entered. The dwelling, which lengthened of its own accord whenever Kămăltsong[16] gave a potlatch, endured for generations.[17] Before the door there lay on his back a man, Bo'ăkste, with a huge stomach on which anyone entering the house had to step; a slave or commoner did so without resultant noise, but when a mighty chief trod on Bo'ăkste his weight drew forth a grunt from the recumbent man.[17] Any chief entering gave to Kămăltsong[16] a slave, a canoe, or a copper, "to open the door," otherwise the mouth of the grizzly bear would snap shut and kill him.

Kămăltsong[16] was powerful enough to give many potlatches; when planning one, he began his preparations early in the spring for the following winter. First he beached his canoe before his house, smeared its grizzly bear nose with urine, and beat upon it with evergreen boughs. This was a signal that he proposed to go on a raiding expedition, and his fellow villagers were always glad to follow him. His forays were always successful due to his own power and because he took care when nearing his destination to send forward a scouting party to determine the number of hostile houses and decide how many attackers should be allotted to deal with each. On one occasion he attacked the Fort Rupert people and captured a woman of chief's rank, who begged him not to enslave her, promising him her name, Wĭkuxu·ăwula or Kwula. He agreed to her request and she tied a long halibut line around her neck and told the other women to grasp it; those who did so were spared. In the same attack Kămăltsong[16] made use of a Fort Rupert slave whom he bribed to act as guide against his masters. The man led in the party under cover of a fog which lifted at an inopportune moment, but the slave deceived the Fort Rupert Indians into believing that his comrades were not hostile. Kāmālsong[w] rewarded the guide with a marten-skin coat and one of marmot-skins. 539 v

When he gave a potlatch, Kāmālsong[w] had the back wall of his house decorated with pictures of sun and moon, while he himself wore a grizzly bear-skin with its head above his own. As he danced, there rose through the floor a large box on which was painted a raven. Kāmālsong[w] went to the receptacle and took from it sufficient presents to supply the requirements of the visitors from one tribe, the Bella Bella, for example. Then the box would sink from sight, only to reappear with gifts for another group; this was repeated as many times as there were parties of guests from outside places. This was the method of procedure decreed by Ālquntām.

These first Nuxalst people made a number of special objects for their potlatches. As a representation of the five-peaked mountain beneath which they lived, they erected five peaks over the front of their house, a custom which has been carried out until the present day. Projecting from one of them was a figure of a mountain goat, since that animal was brought to earth to serve as food by their first ancestors. They also made a number of large stone spoons, which, after being used for many generations, were buried with a certain Potlas about 1875. These utensils were of a type used by Nuxalst before he became a mountain, and were later copied by the carpenter-masons. [124] [415]

Kāmālsong[w] was so powerful that he altered a xaxak rite of his potlatch into a kusiut dance, changed Nuxmāx-a to a kusiut name, and decreed that the repository should be under the spot where his house stood. For this ceremonial he always used a whistle with the voice of a raven.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nuxalst
(Second version dealing with another settlement)[10]

Nuxalst is a chief among mountains. Like a human leader, it has several names, Tēkwatāx, Sānatlx̄m, and others; these names belong to several persons now living. Like a person, too, the mountain was sent down from above at the beginning of the world to Tsowat, Bute Inlet, whence it moved to its present position midway up the Bella Coola valley, a location which it had heard was a pleasant one. He had brought with him from above a house, called *Kimdzong which, when set up on this earth, grew so large that all the owner's family and descendants could live within. Outside the door, Nuxmit-a had caused the erection of a totem-pole, Nutlaqid. Within dwelt Echo, an incessant talker, who was very clever at learning languages; his rolling voice reverberated through the house and the whole countryside. This being acted as herald and summoned people to a [532] dance by using the word Nuxnalika; whenever a descendant of Nuxmit-a gives a potlatch he makes a mask with an ever-changing mouth to represent Echo.

Not long after the completion of the house and totem-pole Nuxmit-a set out one evening to fish for salmon with the aid of torches, taking with him his infant son and several followers. During their absence a snow-slide wiped out the town, killing all the inhabitants except one slave who concealed himself within the hollow totem-pole. The slide was due to the mountain being angry at the totem-pole, carved to represent him as he was before he changed to mountain form. When the survivors returned to their buried village they at once set about rebuilding it. In time, as the people increased in numbers, it again became prosperous. They built a fish-weir to supply their wants, using tools of stone obtained from Mount Nuqalit. Ałwi, the son of a Stuxo chief, married Nuxmit-a's daughter, Skamalika, and Nuxmit-a moved to Ẉmqa-ts.

Other narrators provided a little further information about Nuqalit. While still in human form, he wore a flat-topped hat with broad brim around which ran two snakes. After he had been changed to stone as a mountain, several individuals looked down on him from above and chose his slopes as a landing-place, thus making him their crest. The first to do so is said to have been a man named Ojimai.

FRAGMENT OF AN ORIGIN MYTH OF *Nałkuz

In the very beginning of time, before the sky was made, Ẉqamin sent down to Nałkuz three brothers and their two sisters. The names by which the men have been remembered are *Mizong, *Kimdzong, Zuxwałkic, and the women, Zuxwuz-a and xałuxuz-i. They came to earth as golden eagles, bearing the beaver as food. The youngest sister refused to change her form, and wandered around in a semi-human condition, becoming frenzied at the slightest excuse. At length her dis- [103] quested brothers and sister united to get rid of her; she became petrified in the valley which still bears her name, and which still has an evil reputation as the coldest place in the vicinity of Bella Coola. Thence come the cold winds.

Ilquantsw instructed his carpenters to construct Sawy'. They set about their task, but failed to use any supporting posts so that when all was completed, except a small section in the east, it fell. When the carpenters recommenced their work, they took care to erect uprights to bear the weight, and thus were able to construct the sky as it is today. When it was finished, the supports were removed. Only those living at Nalhas witnessed this disaster, and from it they took their names. Xmalkwy' was the name of this first Sawy' that fell.

According to another informant the first settler at Nalhas was Dadkwy', who had also the name Xmoomlais. He came to earth in the form of a beaver, bringing a salmon-weir as means of obtaining sustenance.

FRAGMENT OF AN ORIGIN MYTH OF Nalhas[*]

Among the first people who came down to earth at Tsawat was a stone man, who brought with him a sword as a present from the supreme deity. As a result of this gift the Tsawat were constantly practising the art of war, and always ready to start hostilities; their settlement was a hotbed of trouble. One of these people, Lkwakila by name, wearied of constant strife, determined to set out and find a new home for himself. After considerable travelling he reached Nalhas where he settled down among the inhabitants of that village. He had brought with him a young boy who in time married a woman from Lkulu, and became the father of many children.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Itsat[*]

In the beginning Wlapalt came to earth as a man on Mount Naya, near Itsat. He seated himself on the mountain top and slid down to the valley, clearing a smooth track as he went, which is still here like the path of a landslide. He was all alone and built for himself a house of evergreen boughs, Iwalt, to which he gave the name Kwalatal. After sojourning there for some time he decided to marry; so he set off up the valley to find out if there were any people living above him. He travelled *534 over a series of parallel ridges, from the top of one of which he saw before him a number of men, also going upstream. Around their heads they wore light-coloured bands. They disappeared over the next rises and when Wiapalt reached the summit of this he saw in the hollow below, him, not a number of men, but a pack of wolves, preceding him on the trail. The wolves passed over the next ridge out of sight, but when Wiapalt gained the crest he saw in front of him, not wolves, but the men again with bands around their heads. This continued for some time, Wiapalt seeing men before him from one ridge and wolves from the next; he was slowly gaining on them, and finally saw the animals assume human form, take off their tails, and wrap them around their heads. He caught up with the wolf-men and told them the reason for his travels, that he sought a wife. They agreed to help him and all travelled together to the home of Alkomatsaie, who had landed with his wife from above on Mount Tsuxiz in the Carrier country. They had brought from above a beaver as food, and some moose skins. Alkomatsaie had a daughter, Nielhlaie, whose other names were Nachmdie and Nachmmtal. Wiapalt asked Alkomatsaie for the girl and the latter agreed. So the two were [424] married and the wolf-men sang a song which has since been handed down as a prerogative in the family of their descendants.

After the marriage the four returned towards Stuie, Nielhlaie going ahead to break a track through the forest. From this she took the name Nagmdumdo-a, "Stick-Breaker"; had she not cleared this path there would have been no intercommunication today between the Carriers and the Bella Coola. In the house which Wiapalt built for his bride, everything was decorated with a raven; the door was the beak of the raven; the totem-pole was a raven; and a raven was carved on the end of every beam. Alkomatsaie constructed a house a little above Sikse; it was like the present Bella Coola ones but made entirely of skins. He called it Skwmdal.

The two families sojourned in this vicinity for some time when Wiapalt decided to travel around the world. He set off and, far in the east, crossed the upper waters of the Bella Coola River, which he decided to open as a route to the sea. He had brought with him some abalone-shells, which he used to decorate a stick; then gave it the name Alkloda-i. It floated downstream to Nuxpalit, where the river plunged beneath a huge rock, but Alkloda-i made clear its course by shattering the barrier. Meanwhile, ugayayat, another of the first people, who had come to earth on a mountain behind Tsumal, had made ready his canoe for a journey upstream. ugayayat was very proud, and considered himself the oldest of all mankind under the assumption that he was the first to reach this earth. Accordingly his grief was great when he saw Alkloda-i floating down the river and realized that other people were above him. In his disappointment he cried out, "I am but a younger brother," and abandoned his journey.

Ałhlsán i drifted on until it was caught in the fish-weir of Ojimai, the man dwelling farthest down the valley on the south shore of the Bella Coola River about a quarter of a mile from the sea. Ojimai, delighted with the pretty thing, took it to his house and called his friends to see what he had found.

SECOND ORIGIN MYTH OF STAUX[11]

In the beginning, when there was still no sun in this world, Ałquntim erected a post which reached from its base, near Staux, to the land above and prevented the sky from falling. On the top sat Tsilwałałz, an eagle. Down it came Nazmłhwai, Wałtimai, Wałłłtimai, Wisqałł, Tłisla, Qril, and several women whose names have been forgotten. Though all were supernatural, Qril alone was not in human form; he had come as Raven and used to croak from inside the post itself. The newcomers looked around them for a suitable spot on which to settle. Trawat, on the mainland opposite the northern extremity of Vancouver Island, appealed to them, but they did not like its inhabitants, the Kwakiutl. Nazmłhwai and his companions were proud of the fact that they were the first to occupy the Bella Coola valley, but with this pride came the dread that others might lay claim to the distinction. There was then no river, but Wisqałł scratched in the earth with his foot and the water that filled the depression became a river. In this stream he placed a log decorated with abalone-shell and instructed it to łłmstadimai, "be like a person," that is, have human intelligence. When floating down the river, which was continually increasing in size, it should move from side to side so as to pass close to every populated place. The inhabitants of the villages, seeing the log, would know that they had not been first in the land. The stick did so, causing deep chagrin in all the villages past which it floated to the sea.

After due consideration, Nazmłhwai and his comrades travelled some distance down the river valley; then returned to Nałłłta, not far from Staux, where they built their house. It was of the normal size, but when many guests assembled, it enlarged to accommodate all within. The posts, the benches, the boxes, the beams, and the totem-pole were all carved with the design of Raven, known to them not as Qnax, but as Snagmamłb. In one corner sat Echo. With the completion of this house Nazmłhwai and his companions became mortal.

539 In course of time, as they grew wealthy, they were able to summon people from far and near for potlatches. This in turn enabled them to validate several names which they had brought from above. Älquntäm had given Nusmälexwai a box containing whistles for kusiut rites. He used these and bestowed on one of his sisters the name Nunuxmeax, a kusiut designation still in existence. When the roof of the house was opened light shone through, from which circumstance the name Sxsutl was acquired at one of their annual potlatches. Not only was Nusmälexwai able to validate designations which Älquntäm had given him, but he created several new ones as well. He gave to his sisters the names Kälxmäknm and Qopmpmän·a; the latter means "Rising Dust," with reference to the dust rising from the floor of the house as Nusmälexwai threw down the moosehides which he was about to give away to his guests.

[551] All the names mentioned in this myth have been preserved. That of Nusmälexwai is held in especial esteem by the people of Stuix. It means "Head of the River," referring to the point where he came to this [552] earth. Even Ïlmstadimut is still in use, applied to a dog as the owner has no children.

THIRD ORIGIN MYTH OF Stuix[33]

In the beginning Älquntäm sent down to Smaien·a, at the head of the Clearwater, a branch of the Bella Coola River, four brothers, Älkwi, *Dudusonx, Nänätskwi, and one whose name has been forgotten, with their sisters, Känilkes and O'mielkes. *Dudusonx had brought with him from above as a present from Älquntäm some olachen in concentrated form and one of the large cone-shaped whistles used in susook ceremonials. The two women cried because they had no house. But presently they thought they were in one with a wonderfully painted roof; in reality it was the sky and the decorations were brightly shining stars. By means of their supernatural power, for they were not yet mortals, they reduced the firmament to such small compass that it was really a house to them, with the star-illuminated sky as roof. Taking this abode with them, the six set out next day for Tcawat, a point on the mainland opposite the north end of Vancouver Island. They travelled down the valley of a river which rises not far from the Smaien·a source of the Bella Coola. Älkwi and his relatives did not like the language of the people living at Tcawat, so they returned to Smaien·a, taking with them some of the fine cedars that flourish on that part of the coast. Thanks to their supernatural power they were able to carry these easily. 529*

Returned to Smaien·a they built a dug-out canoe of birch(?), the outside of which, and also the paddles, they decorated with abalone-shells. The effect was very beautiful, and they named the canoe, Ki'laielotl. In this craft the six set out down the Bella Coola River. When still above Stuix they stopped to investigate a beating sound and found that it came from the house of Oḑsmai. The latter invited them to come in, using *Dudusonx*ʷ's name, which he knew in some mysterious manner. When they entered they found that the beating sound was caused by their host's daughter, Kānuslāliām, who was sitting in the back-room, thumping a copper which she was holding as if it had been an infant. Oḑsmai was much impressed with his guests' canoe, and they with his. A trade was mutually agreeable, as a result of which the travellers obtained a copper canoe named Łāliaelotl, fitted with copper paddles. *Dudusonx*ʷ married Kānuslāliām, who embarked with him and his brothers and sisters. They had not gone far when they were hailed by the chief of a village, who also knew *Dudusonx*ʷ's name.

"*Dudusonx*ʷ," he called out, "your canoe is not much good; it has to be paddled or poled. Let us trade. You take my canoe, Kwakwaoselotl,[24] it travels with its own power."

*Dudusonx*ʷ was unwilling to part with Łāliaelotl, but at last agreed. The seven now travelled rapidly in their merganser canoe to the coast, not stopping at the villages which they saw on the way. At the mouth of the Bella Coola River, *Dudusonx*ʷ cast into the water one of the fish which Ālquntām had given him; it became the progenitor of all the Bella Coola olachen. The travellers went thence to the head of South Bentinck Arm where *Dudusonx*ʷ threw out another olachen, the forefather of all that now frequent this place. He repeated this at Rivers Inlet, at Smith Inlet, and at every fiord on the coast, wherefore olachen are plentiful in British Columbia at the present day. At Łāltaml, a town of which the location is uncertain, *Dudusonx*ʷ was received as a benefactor and given the name T'lākwakila. After visiting all the rivers on the coast Ālkwi and his party returned to Bella Coola, where they finally settled at Stuix. [825]

Throughout their travels they had carried the cedar trees with them, and they now planted them at Stuix. That is why fine cedars have flourished there since that date. The four brothers built a comfortable house and also constructed a salmon-weir in the river, which made them so prosperous that people came from far and near to pledge their daughters to the fishermen. They were able to give numerous potlatches and so display a totem-pole, the design of which Ālquntām had shown to Ālkwi [824] [532]

*539 532 before he came to this world. It was a large pole and stood across the sidewalk from the house, not being pierced by the doorway. At the base was a grizzly bear, with paws wrapped around it as if desirous of climbing after the food which could be seen higher up. Immediately above the bear was an eagle's nest with four fledglings standing amid their broken eggshells and craning their necks eagerly upwards to greet the mother eagle flying back with a salmon. At the top of the pole was a ball, Nuszemda, representing the container in which the sun was enclosed; it was this that Raven broke to release light to mortals. The name of the pole was Äl·ilikotl.[26]

[551] The names contained in this myth are still in use. Känilkas was the relator of it; her sisaok song deals with Smaien·a and, since the salmon enter Bella Coola River in hopes of reaching this place, salmon are used in the decorations of her house. The name Dudusongʷ' varies; it becomes Mäsongʷ' when applied to a youth, and Mäsongʷ'an·a for a girl.

FOURTH ORIGIN MYTH OF Stuix[28]

*539 Long, long ago there was in a mysterious place far to the east and far above this world, a very large house, Nulsätlmais, in which dwelt together all people, Bella Coola, Bella Bella, Carriers, and the rest. In it there lived too, all kinds of birds, including the thrush who taught each its song. [829] The chief of the house, Sikxim by name, lived there too and gave to each tribe its special language. One day he decided to visit the earth, and dived from his house downwards, becoming the sun. In this guise he came to earth on Mount Nuya, near Stuix, where he became a man and built for himself a house which was a copy of Nulsätlmais, and to which he gave the same name. Sikxim became prosperous and gave many potlatches.

FRAGMENT OF A Snulle·tl ORIGIN MYTH[27]

In the beginning of time, Älqunäm, in guise of the sun, sent down to earth a number of brothers with their one sister. Their names have been forgotten except that of the oldest man, Ťaiakwala, who had brought with him a beaver as provender. He released the animal, which multiplied to provide abundant food for all; it became the ancestor of all the beaver of the upper valley. Owing to their position higher up the Bella Coola, Ṭaiakwala and his brothers considered that they were nearer to the sun than any of the people dwelling below, a fact of which they were exceedingly proud. Moreover, having been sent down by him, the sun was their crest. 539 *

[424] [551] [26]As is commonly the case, there is no connection between this totem-pole and the adventures of Älkwi. The person using this name has the right to use these designs as a part of his myth, exactly as the right to recount the adventures of his namesake belongs to him.

There were two large boulders in the river near the settlement, which Ätqunäm had shown Ṭaiakwala how to use as supports for a salmon-weir. With the help of his brothers, a hole was drilled in one of the rocks; then they felled a large tree upstream and allowed it to drift down until the butt lodged in the perforated boulder and the head swung across against the other. With this as base, other trunks were woven in upright so that the river was almost spanned and a fine dam constructed. In this they caught so many salmon that Ṭaiakwala and his brothers were able to call people from far and near to potlatches and feast them liberally on the fish. In course of time their sister was married to a chief from another town. Henceforth, whenever one of her brothers gave a potlatch, he was able to rebuy his sister on a lavish scale with the teeming salmon. The sun had taught the woman a song for such occasions, which has since been used as a prerogative by her descendants when rebuying themselves from their husbands. [424] [583]

Ṭaiakwala made a long voyage of exploration during which he reached the Skeena River. He made friends with the inhabitants of the town, Q̣ixwan, who gave him the name, Xwelbon,[28] meaning whale in their language. Continuing his journey, he ultimately circled the earth before returning home. He obtained several other designations, including Ailsamka from the Kwatna people.[29]

Years after the settlement of Snulle·tl, the drilled stone supporting the salmon-weir broke and the ruins were swept away downstream. The people cut their hair and blackened their faces in mourning, then moved to Sinx where a number of their daughters had married chiefs.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nusxeq[30]

It is common to add details from a story to a family myth in order to increase its length and importance. Almost cer- [178] [114]

[28]It appears that Xwelbon is an attempt to pronounce the English, whale-bone, an interesting example of the way in which modern words have been incorporated into ancient myths and been clothed with the glamour of antiquity. [178]

[29]Both are still used by members of the ancestral family descended from Ṭaiakwala. [551]

539 [178] [114] tainly this has been done with the following, in spite of the fact that Boas (p. 53) records it in greater detail than the writer was able to obtain. A second version was obtained from a reliable informant who recounted it as a mere tale without hesitation. He may have been ignorant that it was the myth of another family, or may have disregarded that point, though this is unlikely. The content itself strongly supports the view that details of the usual "story" type have been added.

In the beginning of time there came down to the river which enters North Bentinck Arm at Green Bay a man, Nusxeq, and his wife, Sumsiutaäkis. They went down the river to Green Bay, since called Nusxeq from the man, where they built their house and settled. In time a son was born, to whom they gave the name Slskło. The child grew with phenomenal rapidity until before long he had acquired the strength and intelligence of a man. One day Slskło went for a walk up the river, carrying his bow and arrows. He met what he thought was a man, though it was really a black bear in human form. The supernatural one invited Slskło to go home with him, which the youth did. As soon as he entered the abode he realized that he was in a bear's house, but he did not disclose to his host that he had this knowledge. The bear brought to his guest some skunk cabbage, saying that it was dry salmon; to bears skunk cabbage is dry salmon. The food was broken in small fragments and served on a very small dish so that Slskło was afraid that there would not be enough, though Black Bear assured him that he would not be able to eat it all. So it proved. Slskło ate and ate until he could eat no more, without diminishing the amount of food on the dish.

Then Black Bear said, "You must spend the night here; tomorrow you can return."

So Slskło slept that night in Bear's house.

Next day—it was really next year, because one night in the land of supernatural beings is equivalent to a year in the land of mortals—Black Bear said:

"I make you a shaman (I, p. 539). One end of your bow, as far as the middle, will be as if coated with power. If you have a quarrel with a man just wave that end towards him and he will fall dead. If you wish him to come to life again, wave the other end and he will be revived."

Then Black Bear took off his pelt and gave it to Slskło, saying, "If you want to strike down several people, put on my skin, scatter eagle down on it, and then shake yourself. The down will fly in all directions and when it lights on your enemies it will cause them to fall to the ground. Their arms, legs, bodies, wherever the down has touched them, will swell, so that they will be unable to get up again. Unless you recall the fluff to yourself they will die. Now I will take you home." 539 *

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Slskłɔ set out with Black Bear, but when they reached the edge of the woods the latter returned. Instead of at once entering his father's house, Slskłɔ went to the back of it where he shook the planking, and disturbed his younger sister, 'enłłälän-a, who was within. She went out to investigate, and ran in again, calling out to Sımsiutaäkıs:

"Mother, mother, Slskłɔ has come back."

But her mother answered, "You liar. Your brother has long been dead."

The little girl went out again, and when she returned a second time to tell the same story, Sımsiutaäkıs herself went out. She was almost overcome with joy at seeing her long-lost son.

Slskłɔ would not enter the house until Nuixeq had built for him a raised platform behind the fire and had scattered sand on the floor. When this was done he crawled through a hole in the roof direct to the staging. That evening Slskłɔ called 'enłłälän-a, saying,

"Tomorrow I am going to Nuxälk, [Bella Coola]. I do not wish to mar our parents' pleasure at my return by telling them of my departure, so say nothing about it now; but tomorrow, when they discover my absence, you can tell them where I have gone and that it will be all right."

Slskłɔ slept that night in his parents' house.

In the morning he assumed the form of a black bear and set off. In those early days there were no trees, so he was able to travel without stopping to pick a path and soon reached the village of Älqäläxl near the mouth of the Pe-śıłɔ. Here he again changed himself to a man, wearing a black bear-skin blanket. At this point Slskłɔ met a man and the two became sıäx, boon companions. Slskłɔ went to all the houses in Älqäläxl and invited the young people to gather on a level piece of ground near the river, saying that they would see something peculiar. When they had assembled he suddenly changed himself to a black bear and ran to and fro among the startled crowd. Then he retransformed himself to human form, whereupon all the girls fell in love with him as something new, strange, and altogether desirable. But Slskłɔ only laughed at them.

Then his friend said, "Säıai, why don't you go across the river and repeat your performance at Slskiıł?"

So Slskłɔ and his friend crossed in a river dug-out. They called the young people of Łempo-ıs and Slskiıł together on a level piece of ground below the latter village and here Slskłɔ repeated his performance. As before, many of the women fell in love with him; but the men, their

*539 husbands and lovers, were so angry at the interloper that they decided to raid Green Bay. Slskla's friend, however, learnt of this plan and told his comrade. "All right," replied Slskla, "if they dare to do so I will show them my power. Of course you will have to accompany them, but when the attack is launched stay a short distance to one side. You will not be hurt."

Slskla now determined to return home. But the raiders, who were assembling at Kit·co, a point on the south side of North Bentinck Arm about a quarter mile from the head, had taken all the canoes, so the best Slskla's friend could obtain for him was the broken bow of a river canoe. In this frail craft he reached Änusg, on the north side of North Bentinck Arm about one mile from the head, without difficulty, and there he took on the form of a black bear once more. In this guise he travelled so rapidly that he reached Green Bay long before the raiders.

Once more in human form, Slskla said to his parents, "A Bella Coola war-party is on its way to attack us, because they are angry at the way I have attracted their women. Stay inside the house, and all will be well."

Before long the hostile canoes appeared in close formation near the beach. Slskla had donned his bear blanket, over which he had strewed a large quantity of eagle down. He now shook himself. As Black Bear had promised, the down flew in all directions and those of the enemy on whom it lighted fell helpless to the bottom of their canoes, their arms, legs, heads, or bodies swollen beyond recognition. After a time Slskla called back the down, thus curing his victims. As he did so he told his father's herald to call out to the attackers that they must never again try to raid Green Bay. In spite of their discomfiture many of the Bella Coola rashly landed to press the assault, but Slskla climbed on to the roof of the house, from which point he struck them down with the death-dealing end of his bow. When the abortive attack had ended with the death of all those who had landed, Slskla's sätux came to shore and requested him to restore his relatives to life. The two walked among the corpses, the friend pointing out his relations, whom Slskla revived with the life-giving end of his bow. Each of those brought back to life begged for a friend, which Slskla granted, until finally he had restored all those whom he had slain.

In their gratitude many of the Bella Coola besought Slskla to accept their daughters as wives. He took only one wife, but by this marriage [582] friendly relations were established between Green Bay and Bella Coola, and ever since that time the people of the two places have intermarried and been on the best of terms.

Nusxeq had a younger brother whose name was Sınxäkila. The latter moved across North Bentinck Arm to Sätlia, the southeast point between North and South Bentinck Arms. Here he married and in time became the father of a daughter, Ämkpls, who was about the same age as Nusxeq's daughter 'enllälän·a. On one occasion when Nusxeq took his daughter on a visit to his brother, the two girls enjoyed playing together very much.

A short time after this Sınxäkila became a shaman. He saw a copper house with a loon totem-pole emerge from the ocean near Sätlia; it was the house of Ḷomoqwa, lord of the under-water world. Ḷomoqwa was inside with his long hair extending from beneath his huge hat. He greeted Sınxäkila and gave him the wonderful copper house to live in. As a result of this supernatural experience Sınxäkila was able to give his daughter the names, Känusläliäm, "Pretty Copper," and Äls'ɣmän·a, "The Clang of Copper."

Unaware of her uncle's good fortune, 'enllälän·a again went to visit Ämkpls. She was amazed at the beautiful house, and was filled with envy of her cousin's names and of the luxurious copper room in which she lived in one of the front corners of the house. And Ämkpls had become too proud to play with her former friend. This made 'enllälän·a so miserable that she went home at once and begged her father to get her a nice house too.

After some deliberation Nusxeq married, fictitiously, his daughter to Ämkpls. As a result of the exchange of presents which ensued, 'enllälän·a obtained many copper articles as well as the name Äls'ɣmän·a, and Ämkpls received a Cannibal dance with the name 'Łıamdimut, of which the incubus (II, p. 78) was a snake. The repository of this name is beneath a large boulder at Green Bay, where, too, is that of a Cannibal dancer, Kwala·ıstımut.

Secure in the wealth which Ḷomoqwa had brought him, Sınxäkila was able to marry his daughter, fictitiously, to many chiefs. He always gave with her presents of copper. When Ämkpls was old enough she was married to a Nulleax chief.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nusxeq
(Second version told as a mere story)

Once, long ago, at Green Bay a boy, walking along a path seeking suitable wood for a bow, stepped in some black bear dung which he angrily rubbed off on the grass. Soon he met a bear, who was annoyed at what he had done and asked him to come to his home. The two set off together, travelling easily owing to the power possessed by all bears

* 539 of passing through ridges and rocks without effort. They reached a house within a mountain, where others had assembled for a potlatch. It was mid-winter. Bears perform kusiut dances as men do and dance through the winter, but they lack the ability to become shamans. The lad told his guide that he was hungry, whereupon the latter reached down and took off the small dimple from one side of his haunch, put in it a minute helping of salmon roe, and gave to his guest. The boy was angry at the meagreness of his portion, but his host told him to eat as much as he could since the supply was inexhaustible. The youth ate and ate, until he became fat, but he could make no impression on the food.

After a time the lad returned home to Green Bay. Search-parties had scoured the woods for him without success, but his mother was weeping for him as dead. He remained outside, but called her by name. A younger brother, hearing him, told his mother, but she did not believe him at first; finally she went outside where she saw her long-lost son. He bade her spread fresh sand on the floor, and when this was done he went in.

As a result of his visit to the bear's home, the youth obtained a small but remarkable canoe with a wonderful paddle. In this he and his partner used to travel. One end of the paddle held aloft kept at a distance the strongest wind, and smoothed a patch of water before the canoe, so that the one man paddling was able to make phenomenal headway. The two used to visit villages within a convenient radius so that the bear-boy might seduce the women. The partner would remain in the settlement to allay suspicion, while his friend would go to the woods behind and, by his supernatural power, will that women should come to him. He repeated this practice so often that the inhabitants of Ḷomqo·ts decided to kill him and his whole family, and endeavoured to take advantage of one of his visits to their village. His canoe was on the beach, and to prevent his return to Green Bay they destroyed it and all of their own that were drawn up in the vicinity. The partner saw the deed, and transmitted the news of it through the air to his friend, who rejoined him. One canoe was not entirely wrecked, so they took a small piece of the side that was left, and on it paddled to a point on the north side of North Bentinck Arm about one-half mile from its head. Here the bear-boy transformed himself into a bear, and in this guise was able to travel rapidly overland to Green Bay, while his partner continued to paddle in that direction close to shore.

On reaching home the bear-boy said to his father:

"A war-party is coming against us entirely on my account."

"I know nothing about it," his father replied.

"You stay inside, I will deal with them," his son continued.

He made a platform on the roof from which he watched and soon with his marvellous vision he was able to descry the fleet leaving Ḷomqo·ts. As he had willed, his enemies drew near on canoes lashed together, and furnished with platforms from which stones could be thrown. When they reached Green Bay, he projected his bear power at them and they succumbed. He allowed them to recover, again they came on, and again he felled them, and so for several times until he had killed them all. Then he came down from his station on the roof and told his father and mother to pick out their friends.

"I shall resuscitate them," he said, "and throw the others into the ocean, otherwise the stench would be oppressive."

His parents pointed out to him their friends, whom he revived. Each thus restored begged him to save some friend; these asked for others, until he had revivified all. His father, a chief, gave a feast, at which marriages between Green Bay and Ḷomqo·ts people were arranged.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Sätlia[31]

In the beginning of time there was a village on the lower Fraser, in which everything was abalone-shell. It was there that Raven came to earth from above and assisted the chief, *Dodosong*ʷ'. The two set off together in a canoe to visit Ł̄ālia, a town in which everything was copper and where lived a chief, whose name was likewise Ł̄ālia, with his daughter Ł̄āliaaiuts. They reached this settlement in safety and Ł̄ālia gave his guests a copper canoe, a copper box in which were all kinds of foods reduced to small bulk, and a sisook dance whistle. Finally, on *Dodosong*ʷ' he bestowed his daughter Ł̄āliaaiuts, as wife. Then Raven, *Dodosong*ʷ', and the latter's wife returned to the abalone-shell town.

*Dodosong*ʷ' and his wife set out in the copper canoe to distribute the gifts which he had received from Ł̄ālia. First they went to the Haida country and gave a whistle; the Haida chief blew on it and the whole face of the world was altered. Although but one whistle had been received, the supply was inexhaustible; another always appeared when the first had been given away. *Dodosong*ʷ' returned from the land of the Haida to his home on the Fraser, and again set out with his wife in the copper canoe. He gave one whistle to the China Hat people; one to the people of a Bella Bella village; and one to the people of the present Bella Bella village, the recipients in each case giving in return some blood to *Dodosong*ʷ' and his wife. From Bella Bella he went to Rivers Inlet where he *539 gave a whistle to the village of Wanuq, and also threw overboard some of the fish that were in the copper box. They became olachen, from which sprang all the olachen of Rivers Inlet. *Dadosong*ʷ and his wife proceeded up Rivers Inlet, giving a whistle to each village until they reached the head of the inlet, whence they journeyed to Samkoil, a settlement on the lake beyond, and from there to the town at the head of the lake, in each depositing the usual whistle. They portaged the copper canoe along the overland trail running thence to the head of South Bentinck Arm, and in due course reached *Ás*ʷ, at the head of the fiord. Here *Dadosong*ʷ gave a whistle and a number of olachen, the latter being the progenitors of the olachen in that inlet. They travelled down South Bentinck Arm, delaying at the various settlements to give a whistle and olachen to each. Their stopping-places included Ḳwapa, *Nuk*ʷ and the last Ḳamkoil, an island in the fiord. Thence the copper canoe ascended North Bentinck Arm to Bella Coola, where *Dadosong*ʷ and Ḳáliasiats built a house on the site of the present Álpálał. They lived in it for a number of years, until the people of Bella Coola protested so strongly against the din of the whistles which kept sounding continuously that they moved away.

*Dadosong*ʷ and his wife travelled in their copper canoe to Sátlia, the point between North and South Bentinck Arms, where they built a huge copper house. In this they lived for a great many years and many children were born to them. The people from Bella Coola were friendly with the Sátlia people, whom they frequently visited and with whom they exchanged presents, and sought to marry the children of *Dadosong*ʷ. Among them was a lad, Ánuḳpumlaix, who was very unhappy because of his father's neglect and lack of affection. He made a bow and hunted ducks for four days. Then he lay and wept for four days. On the fourth day, as he lay on the beach weeping and sleeping, he heard a voice:

"Get up, get up; think of your friends."

A man led him to a house that had risen from the sea, in which seals were being given away. The man wished him to enter by the door, but Ánuḳpumlaix was afraid because beneath it lay an evil monster, a sḳámtsk, which lived on the flesh of human corpses. However, he succeeded in entering the back of the house.

Here the narrator stopped abruptly.

SECOND ORIGIN MYTH OF Sátlia[11]

Long ago, when the world was first populated, there came down in human form to Sátlia, near the junction of North and South Bentinck

Arms, two brothers, Snaxhākila and Miai'sila, with their sister, Sللsلān·i. Ālqunlām had provided them with means of sustenance; Sللsلān·i brought cranberries and Miai'sila a model salmon-trap, such as is used in salt water. The three had no house, but Ālqunlām sent them some logs of driftwood from which Snaxhākila constructed a shelter, which they called Yentsānl because it was made of flotsam. On the roof Snaxhākila placed a huge copper with which the smoke vent could be closed, and immediately above the door a wooden loon kept calling incessantly. 539*

When they had been on this earth for some time Snaxhākila became a shaman from the sight of a copper house that rose from the depths of the ocean in mid-channel. He paddled out to it in his canoe, climbed to the roof on a conveniently placed ladder, and went from the roof down inside. Then he discovered that it was the house of Qomoqwa, who was sitting in the middle behind the fire, his long hair protruding from beneath his huge hat. All around the walls were paintings of different denizens of the water world, and various creatures were sharing the house. As Snaxhākila stood by the front door looking inwards he saw on his right a number of seals sitting around a small fire in one corner of the house. In the opposite corner, on his left, also by a fire, was a very old woman; in some unexplained manner Snaxhākila knew that her name was Nuixwanaix. In the right-hand rear corner a man, Nusqwal, was seated by his fire, and in the remaining corner, by a fourth fire, was another man, Nunuxemlaix. Xaqānts, the Heron, was stalking back and forth behind the fire; as his dignified gait shows, he is a chief, and as such has the chiefly names, Numelsدmut, ıxwappātsدjut, Ānuxlnımدmut, and Ānutcekلāmدmut. Near the left wall, opposite the fire, was a large box, Snulkānāls, containing heavy coppers, tskankدmut, and mice, which gnawed incessantly. A porcupine and a grizzly bear were playing together in the back-room. Halibut was lying outside the front door so that anyone jumping down outside leaped through its open mouth into its stomach. Whale was likewise lying outside, parallel to the front wall of the house. The totem-pole of this strange house was Ḱدxta, a supernatural ocean being. [551]

From his seat behind the fire Qomoqwa greeted Snaxhākila in a kindly fashion. The chief wrapped some of his own hair around a stick and pulled, thus breaking off a few strands, which he gave to his guest. He then told him to take three names for the use of himself and his children forever: they were, Tskankدmut, the coppers, Āmkpls, the mice, and Snulkānāls, the box in which these were contained. After spending a few hours with Qomoqwa, Snaxhākila returned to land, whereupon a gale arose and the house sank beneath the waves. [551]

*539 In course of time Snayhdhila became so wealthy that he was able to call people from far and near for a potlatch. He built a house identical in every particular with that of Ḵ̓omoqua as he had seen it. He bestowed on his children not only the names which Ḵ̓omoqua gave to him, but also [551] two which he took from what he had seen, Ḵ̓ants, the whale which was outside the front of the house, and Ednikhs, the significance of which could not be determined.

[552] These two designations have since been transmitted in this family, and now been bestowed on a dog, there being no children left.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Tāl io[*]

In the beginning of time, Ālqunūm sent down to this world a man, Ā imdzaix, with his two sisters, Ālcamka, "The Abalone-Shell Woman," and Ālhlxēn-iallīux, "The One with Abalone on Her Hat." The three landed on an island several miles in circumference, formed of an enormous abalone-shell; its location is now unknown, but it was somewhere in the south, presumably not far from Vancouver. Here they dwelt for some time and began to construct a house for themselves out of the shell. All the time they longed to travel in search of a desirable place to settle, but they lacked means of transportation. At this juncture Raven appeared, and offered them a canoe if they would promise to use it. They readily agreed and presently the supernatural bird returned with one. It was a sḵāmtsk, one of the mythical monsters who live beneath the ocean and suck down small craft by opening their mouths.

Ā imdzaix and his sisters embarked. They had decorated their hats and blankets with abalone-shell and took with them a large store of the same material. Raven perched on the bow and croaked whenever they drew near a landing-place. After travelling a considerable distance, they saw smoke rising, and presently noticed a house. Ā imdzaix landed to investigate and found it occupied by a solitary woman, Tlēkwskīlayukw; the place where she lived was called Nagwdlax, probably on Schooner Pass. Ā imdzaix asked her to accompany the party as his sister (meaning here a non-marriageable female relative, not an own sister). She agreed after much discussion. The four continued their travels until they drew near Fort Rupert, where they saw more smoke. As before, Ā imdzaix landed and found another solitary woman, Kwal'hila'yukw, whom he also persuaded to join the group as his sister. The five now passed on to Rivers Inlet, where Raven vanished. The others thought he had left them but, unknown to them all, he had entered Tlēkwskīlayukw's body. They paddled as far as the lake at the head of Rivers Inlet where they abandoned their craft and set out on foot along the overland path to the head of South Bentinck Arm. 539*

Midway along this trail the travellers saw a house, called Tsēkwalat because it could lengthen itself at will. From this supernatural sight each of the five became a shaman. This house was a replica of the one above in which mankind was made and, like it, contained many rooms, in each of which lived an individual speaking a different language. Ā'imlaxis failed to understand them and in his annoyance scattered the speakers, who fled to different parts of the coast where each increased and perpetuated his own language. This is why the various coastal tribes have their own tongues; if Ā'imlaxis had been able to understand them in Tsēkwalat there would be no diversity of speech now. [829]

Various dances were taking place in the rooms within the house. There was a constant din from the large whistles used in nusēt ceremonial which sounded of their own accord and were continually answered by Echo. Only at this place and at Nuxalk did Echo appear to the first people; hence only the descendants of Ā'imlaxis and of the Nuxalk people have the right to portray him in their dances. Ana'ēkwalaxis (II, p. 8) stood near the door; when at last she called out, the nusēt whistles became silent as if in fear. [824] [525]

Continuing their journey the travellers reached Tāl'ēs, at the head of South Bentinck Arm, where a solitary man, Nuxowula, was living. At this place Tsēkwakilayakwa gave birth to Raven, who was born as a boy with the legs of a raven. Ā'imlaxis named him ulqalēwqwendjinas. After a short sojourn at Tāl'ēs they ascended the river, and presently Ā'imlaxis saw a female grizzly bear, whom he also invited to join the party as his sister. The bear accepted and he endeavoured to change the creature to a woman. He had fair success with the paws and face; that is why these parts of a bear are similar to those of men at the present day, but the beast's hairy hide defied his efforts and in disgust he told it to run away. Before banishing it, he bade the animal always show a friendly disposition to human beings, wherefore grizzly bears at Tāl'ēs have never been known to attack a person. The party proceeded up the river to Mount Sisq', where Ā'imlaxis found a repository (II, p. 8) through the discovery of which he became a Cannibal with the name Sisaxāl'ka and an eagle as incubus. From this point they returned to Tāl'ēs, where they settled permanently. [825]

Many of the names which occur in this myth are still in use. Mrs. Schooner's designation as chief is Tsēkwakilayakwa, a name that can be used by either man or woman; in the former case the suffix yakwa is 551

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

551 dropped. Kuul'kila'yakw is held by a Port Rupert chief. Several hamat names, with dances, were obtained from Tsēmālōl where the travellers saw them being performed; among them were Ānuhkhnuit and Dudeqpas, which are now used by two Bella Coola women. Ālkomka is now a Cannibal (II, p. 71) name. At Tāl'ic Ā'ōmlaic gave a hamat dance, and with his own power made there a repository as if he had brought it with him from Tsēmālōl. This was only possible because of his supernatural power as one of the first people, strengthened by his becoming a shaman through seeing Tsēmālōl.

SECOND ORIGIN MYTH OF Tāl'ic[*]

§ 539 In the beginning, there came down to the Skeena River,[*] Nacqtqs, Nacqemda, Wīnqoit, and their younger sister Nalīxumaukis; they brought from Ālqawīnw some of the large cone-shaped whistles used for hamat ceremonials.[*] The three travelled all over the coast seeking a place in which to settle, and always the whistles kept calling out of their own accord, giving advice. Finally they decided to locate at Tāl'ic, the head of South Bentinck Arm.

When they had lived there for some time, the neighbours objected to the din of the whistles, which drove away oolachen and herring, so Nacqemda built a high, narrow mound of refuse, on the tip of which he constructed his house. The building was peculiar; its door opened horizontally and used to close with a crash when anyone entered. On either side of the hill there lived a cuang, whose keen ears could hear the wailing of an infant at any distance. In those ancient days, these beasts were like dogs and did not annoy mortals; they were servants to Nacqemda. [179] One day he learnt that a raiding-party was approaching, but instead of being afraid he instructed the cuang to use their power when it drew near. When the hostile canoes came in sight the two creatures reversed their eyeballs, causing a blinding flash which stunned the occupants of the canoes. After a little they recovered consciousness and again came on, but again the cuang reversed their eyeballs with a like result. When this had happened several times the raiders withdrew discouraged.

THIRD ORIGIN MYTH OF Tâl ió[1]

Long, long ago, when the first people came to earth it was very different from now. There were no trees on the mountains, all were bare and hard like rock and flatter than at present. There was no sun, since it was contained in a nuxwnda, a light container, within Ałquntim's house. Raven desired to get the sun for this world, so he went to the house and asked Ałquntim for it. The supreme being refused and allowed Raven only to play with it on the floor. Raven, too wily to be satisfied with this, waited his opportunity to open the door and threw out the sun, breaking the container as he did so. In this way it was obtained for mankind. 539

About this time Ałquntim sent down to the head of Rivers Inlet a man, Kuxpałłinum, and a woman, Nuqłłapałłw-a. At this time the only clothing worn was made of yellow cedar-bark and animal skins. The couple begot children, who in turn married and had offspring, but Kuxpałłinum did not grow old. Near the settlement there was a lake, on the shore of which his grandchildren often played, in spite of constant danger from a sp̓ámtł which lived in it, and which had, in fact, sucked in several victims. This sp̓ámtł was a creature as big as a house, which could rise or sink in the water at will and was able to suck in its victims through its mouth-door. Kuxpałłinum realized that Ałquntim had given him power to slay this evil monster. Accordingly, he boldly entered the water and succeeded in passing into the interior of the house-stomach through an opening in the side; even he would have perished if he had tried the front door, which was likewise the mouth. Inside was a chief, whose name was Sp̓ámtł, like that of his house; he wore a huge hat with weasels running around the brim. Kuxpałłinum asked Sp̓ámtł whence he had obtained all the many wonderful things hanging on the wall.

"If you are brave," the chief replied, "you will be able to get not only my possessions, but my house and my name as well."

So it transpired. Kuxpałłinum remained for some time in Sp̓ámtł's house and executed some wonderful paintings on its walls; then summoned the people to come and see them. Four times he did this, using the house for his potlatches; then he left.

He set out for the south shore of North Bentinck Arm about two miles from its head. As he travelled a raven stalked along the road before him, carrying a copper in each hand and calling out the road he should follow. On the site selected he built a house, Tołłwałał, so large that the front door was invisible from the back-room. Within there lived the members of the different coastal tribes: Fort Rupert Indians, Rivers Inlet people, Bella Bella, Kimsquit, and Bella Coola, each group of which used its [829]

*539 829 special type of whistle. Kaespektnum remained in this house until he had given four potlatches. Then he removed to Ápu·i, near Tál·io River on South Bentinck Arm. His house still stands there, but it has become an island around which the clouds mass whenever a hostile raiding-party is approaching, so as to conceal from them their objective.

[197] From their long residence in this house Tál·io people understand the language of their Bella Bella, Fort Rupert, and other coastal neighbours better than do the Bella Coola.

FOURTH ORIGIN MYTH OF Tál·io[50]

*539 Among the first people sent down to earth were four who landed at the river Tcold, on the mainland opposite Fort Rupert. Their names were: Ninitsamlaix, a man who became the leader of the group; Nayul·-laix, a woman; Ínuxhmutlm, a man; and another woman, Inuxmuth-mán·a. They met a wasp, which helped them by pointing out the proper road to follow and by killing evil things which barred their path. With this assistance they were able to reach Tál·io, where they settled and where Ninitsamlaix plucked a number of twigs from the branches of a spruce tree near the ocean. These twigs became the people over whom he was chief.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nalal[51]

In the beginning of time there came down to Mount Swaly, near the mouth of the Dean River, two brothers, Xemcus and Sinagul, their sister Ḳáḳms, and their herald Ḳáḳáḳ. Xemcus came as an eagle, but at once assumed human form; apparently the others had always been human. They moved down, and formed a settlement at Nalal, near the mouth of the Dean River. Xemcus had brought with him as a present from Ałquentm, some olachen, called by their supernatural name, dłpnaiyu·a, which he threw into the water. They increased rapidly and became the ancestors [825] of all the olachen at Kimsquit. Thus provided with food, the brothers prospered so that they were able to give many potlatches. In course of time Ḳáḳms was married to Nedkila, a chief who had come to earth on the upper Dean River.

At one of their potlatches Sinagul performed a łlaiyáłem dance, as Ałquentm had instructed him to do before leaving Nuxmit·a. Valuable presents were distributed to validate the name, Tlelpelem, which Sisaqal had chosen for himself. 576*

Sisaqal married a Bella Bella woman who brought with her the prerogative of a dance with respect to the devil-fish. In Bella Bella this rite was connected both with the hamat and the seanl, but in Kimsquit it was performed only as a hamat dance. It was first given there by Ladpaw-i, a relative of Sisaqal, and has since been performed in like fashion in Kimsquit. Their daughter received the Bella Bella name, Talkoa, which has since remained in Kimsquit. [424] [575] [535] [551]

ORIGIN MYTH OF Ape-i[*]

In the beginning of time there came to Ape-i, on the east side of the Dean River, about one mile from the sea, Sawamlko and his three younger brothers. They brought a stone hammer as their present from Alpawlem. After they had lived some time on this earth, Sawamlko asked Talkinwa to have a canoe ready for him on the morrow. By the next day Talkinwa had completed a fine craft. Sawamlko was delighted and spent four days fitting it out; then set out with his three younger brothers for a trip to the far north, where he knew by report that abalone-shells were to be found.* The four did not know the route and were constantly penetrating into fords from which there was no exit; however, they persevered and were helped by all whom they encountered, Sawamlko's name being well known. After a month's voyage, they reached their goal. They found themselves before a lofty precipice falling sheer into the ocean with a cavern visible in it at very low tide. This they boldly entered. At first they were deluged with falling sea-fish; in fact, their canoe would have been sunk by the weight of them if the youngest brother had not held up his cedar-bark cloak to ward them off. A little further on they found countless abalone-shells, with which they swiftly filled the canoe, fearing lest the tide should rise sufficiently to prevent their return if they stayed to investigate further. Once safely outside they camped, and the eldest brother took the opportunity to harrow canoe on the younger brothers for things they had seen or done on the way. He called his second brother Nawaw-ewa, "The Warrior," as if he had fought against the abalone; the third Ala-lauda, "Falling Sea-Fish," and the younger Alaqua, "The Reed-Maker," a reference to the manner in which he had shielded them from the falling fish. Sowenikc alone kept his original name.

When returning they made presents of ehalem-shell[*] to everyone they met, and reaching Kimsquit they made very valuable gifts to all the people. The four had been absent about six months, and as they approached their home the three elder brothers poked fun at Skaqen, saying:

"You will find that your wife has gone to another husband while ours will be waiting for us."

They found the reverse to be true. Skaqen's wife alone had remained faithful to her absent husband; all the others had taken new consorts. The three fickle wives repented when they had done so soon as they saw the wealth brought back by their former husbands but it was too late to change their course, so they were left lamenting. Many people were rather jealous of Sowenikc's success, but he distributed valuable presents to all. Soon after this the three brothers married new wives, refusing to take back their former ones, much as the latter desired it.

Another informant stated that the first settler at this village was a single man, Tsaikc, who brought a stone hammer as a present from Sqawtin.

CRITIC MYTH OF Nazqwalt[]

In the beginning of time Sqawtin sent down to the Dean River four brothers, cowayqwat, Tsilin, Tsenkitlmais, Tsaikcdiwat, and their sister Sainsiw. They brought with them a herald, Nazqwalain, who was a kingfisher, and two men, Kwatsis and Qalaiya, who had the prerogative of dancing at weddings. The five came as black bears, and for a long time remained that form. Tsilin carried with him from Nazmir a several mountain, a stone axe, some dyed cedar-bark, sticks for making fire, and the prerogative of a kwiar dance. After tarrying a few days at their landing place, the party set out down the river, with Nazqwalain flying in front as guide. He was a kingfisher at the time and used to make short flights with quivering wings, and then stop until his bear friends had caught up with him, exactly as those birds do at the present time when a canoe travels up a river. On reaching Nazqwalt, "The Place of Many Spawning Sockeye Salmon," about a mile and a quarter from the mouth of the river, on the south-east side, they camped for the night.

[*] This was formerly valued very highly, both for its use as beads and ornaments, and because it had to be imported from a great distance.

Next morning they found a house in readiness for them, a short distance from the bank; its name was Nuxalpkum, and it had been created for them by Alquntim who had selected this spot for their residence. It resembled other houses except that the door was in a back corner instead of in the middle of the front because bears must not approach the river, and the fire still had urine characteristics. The salmon would have been frightened if they had lived too near. The paintings on the back walls were of Kingfisher.

Chips from their firewood floated downstream to the point where Smanu (I, p. 332) lived. Judging that someone was encamped above him, he set out to investigate. He met Yaklo and entered into conversation with him, finally asking if he, Smanu, might marry Yaklo's sister, Sximdzu, "The Light-Bearer." Yaklo agreed, and the two were married in due course. At this ceremony a marriage song given by Alquntim was first used.[9]

Ayayayar and his brothers made a special kind of fish-trap, in which they caught large quantities of trout and steel-head salmon, and below them Smanu and his family were also catching large quantities of salmon. The two settlements combined to give a potlatch. The brothers built an extension to the house to accommodate their guests, and when all were seated a representation of a black bear emerged from the room at the back of the house, imitating the appearance and actions of its ancestor when first they arrived on this earth. The artifacts brought by Ayayayar and his brothers from above were displayed to the guests, as has since been done on similar occasions by their descendants. At this potlatch the name Nalpkinlaic was given to Sximdzu, having reference to the tabooed house with the rear doorway.

Yaklo once sent his kingfisher herald up the river to discover whether or not there were people there, for at that time it was unknown country. He reported that there were, so Yaklo built a canoe, in the manner taught by Raven, and set off; en route he met the upstream settlers, who had Skawine learn the art of making canoes and were travelling downstream on an errand similar to his own.

The brothers used some of their wealth on one occasion to give a hamat dance, at which they validated for Nanpulaic the Breaker (II, p. 123) name, Nandemlaic. This refers to the way in which he had flown with quivering wings when a kingfisher, and as he danced he shook his hands in imitation of this. This name had been given him by Alquntim, as had also his third, Gilkiwat, referring to his status as herald.

Smanu and Sximdzu had many children who formed a bond between [539] the people of Kimsquit and the Dean River, and ever since then inter-[582] marriages have been common.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Sinal'ot[*]

Soon after the first people had reached this earth Ilpuntsw feared that as they increased, they might quarrel about land tenure. Accordingly he sent down to Sinal'ot, on the Dean River thirty-five miles from the sea, three brothers, Ilpuntsw, ttyayayat, and Ililcoos, a name in many [551] cases used by women, with their sister Iyaje'tl. He gave the oldest brother instructions to divide the land among the different villages. Ilpuntsw came in the guise of a mountain goat, but promptly sent his animal cloak back to the land above, before starting downstream. To the inhabitants of each town he allotted certain valleys in the vicinity to serve as hunting-grounds, and told the people that these, and only these, were to be theirs forever. After reaching the coast, he travelled down Dean Inlet as far as the Bella Bella country, likewise allotting land to the different settlements, and marking each boundary with a stick. After finishing his task, Ilpuntsw returned up the Dean River to his brothers. The three built a weir that spanned the river, and in it they caught so many steel-head salmon that the Carriers used to come from great distances to buy from them. Iyaje'tl was married to a chief living on the lower part of the river, and her brothers, too, came below for their wives. Ilpuntsw ultimately moved to Nuqtqts, on the east side of the Dean River, twenty-five miles from the sea.

ttyayayat had come from above in the form of a deer. After taking [925] off this cloak, he released it as an animal, which become the ancestor of all the deer near Kimsquit. They did not like Sinal'ot, where it was very cold, so they moved to Nikinik, on Dean Inlet, about three miles below Kimsquit, and there built their town. Unfortunately, the snowfall was so heavy that they had much trouble in lighting their fires; sometimes as much as ten feet of snow fell in a single night.

"Please, Ililcoos," said the deer, "don't keep falling on us."

In the language of men, snow is kai, and Ililcoos means "Copper One," but the language of deer is quite different. The snow, unmoved by their appeals, continued to fall, until at last the deer held a meeting and resolved to move away to the outer coast near Bella Bella, and never [925] return again. They carried out this plan, and it is only within the last few years that some have come back, although for centuries some lived near Kimsquit.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Äsklia[46]

[534*]

In the beginning of time Älquntäm sent down to Äsklia, Salmon House on the Dean River, Noätkila, his younger brother Tcaqos, and their sister Swalkanäh, "Box," so named from a supernatural box in the land above. Tcaqos brought a caribou with him, and released it on earth.[47] With these people came as herald, The Wasp of Heaven, who later assumed human form and guided them. Tcaqos at once moved inland to the country of the Carrier Indians, where he remained,[48] taking the adapted name Qaqos.

Noätkila, unprovided with a house or clothing, was so lonely and unhappy that for four days he lay hungry, inert and despondent, alone with his sister. Älquntäm had promised to provide for his welfare, and, four days after Noätkila's landing, sent down the four supernatural carpenters to help him. Yulätimut at once cheered his drooping spirits by building him a house, which was a replica of Nusmät·a itself. Noätkila asked the third carpenter, Mätlabälitcak, to provide him with food, and the latter, obedient to Älquntäm's instructions, whittled a steel-head salmon from maple wood and put it into the river. The fish came to life, swam, and jumped for a short time, but soon died. The carpenter tried several times with the same result. Then Raven appeared and gave him the bone which every steel-head salmon has in the back of its neck. Mätlabälitcak put this bone in one of his wooden models, and when he had thrown it in the river it swam strongly and survived. This fish multiplied so rapidly that Noätkila and his sister were able to support themselves on this kind of salmon, which have been plentiful in the Dean River ever since. [825]

After a time Noätkila decided to visit the people dwelling on the ocean. He asked Mätlabälitcak for a canoe, and the carpenter made him one in the form of an enormous merganser, that travelled without visible motive power. At that time the Dean River disappeared beneath a huge boulder a short distance above the sea, but the craft shattered the rock and opened a channel.[49]

At the mouth of the Dean River Noätkila met Xemcua and married his sister Äskma, using at this ceremony a wordless marriage song given him by Älquntäm. They had many children and ever since that time there have been intermarriages and friendly relations between the people of Salmon House and Kimsquit. [582]

*539 [551] The names embodied in this myth are still in use. That of Noākila was validated at a potlatch during the winter of 1921, after being dormant since the death of the eighth Noākila, an old man, which had taken place some thirty years previously.[50] To illustrate this myth a representation is made of the merganser canoe, a specimen of which, obtained by Mr. Harlan I. Smith, is now in the National Museum, Ottawa.

According to another version of this myth, Noākila and his party came to earth at Anaham Lake, in the country of the Carriers, bringing with them the steel-head salmon. They first went to Stuix, but Noākila did not like the place, so released only a few of the fish. They returned to Anaham Lake, and from there went to Salmon House. They found this spot so desirable that they settled and set free their store of steel-head salmon. That is the reason why this fish is so plentiful in the Dean River, and so relatively rare in the Bella Coola. [825]

ORIGIN MYTH OF Sä·tsk'[51]

In the beginning of time Älqunäm constructed an abalone-shell covered post which reached from Nusmät·a to Ältwolsqämus, a mountain near the Kimsquit River, not far from its mouth. To this place came from above two men, Smaoan, "The First One," and his younger brother, Omqomkilıka. The former flew down as an eagle, but the latter, in raven form, swarmed down the post, which vanished after he had reached the earth. Smaoan spread his wings, like a mother bird, to shelter his younger brother. Älqunäm had given Omqomkilıka a box containing sockeye salmon, with instructions to throw them into the ocean, where they would increase rapidly to serve as food for him and his elder brother. He also taught the two how to build a salmon-weir to catch the fish. The brothers climbed down the mountain-side to the mouth of the Kimsquit River, where Omqomkilıka became a man and sent back his raven cloak above. He then released the salmon as he had been instructed, and also another present from Älqunäm, a mätsqus (I, p. 525), which was to serve as bait not only for fish but also for wealth and goods.

Smaoan declined to assume human form immediately, so began to travel, and his younger brother, sad at being thus left alone, started to make a salmon-weir. In accordance with Älquntäm's instruction, Smaoan planned to make a circuit of the world seeking a suitable place to settle. He started northward, in eagle form, scattering eagle down, wherefore this material has ever since been highly regarded and is used as a symbol of peace. Owing, moreover, to the eagle down scattered on the mountains, there has always been much snow in that region.[53] 539* [778] [821]

[173] [50]This was the only instance given of an approximation of the interval since the first peopling of the earth. The Bella Coola usually reply, "long, long ago," and have not questioned further. This myth was received from a reliable informant, but it is doubtful whether his statement concerning the "eighth" Noākila would find credence among most Bella Coola. Even if it should be the eighth, that would be of little value in estimating the period at which the Bella Coola believe the earth to have been populated, since names may remain dormant for generations.

Sometimes as he travelled he assumed the form of the sun, for he was so powerful that nothing was impossible to him. Far in the north Smaoan obtained an enormous copper, which he carried back to Kimsquit without completing his original plan of circling the earth. He perched on a tree near his brother's almost completed salmon-weir.

"Why don't you change yourself to a human being?" Omqomkilıka inquired.

"I am waiting until our food is more plentiful," Smaoan replied. "Besides I have been to the far north where I obtained an enormous copper."

When the weir was completed and Omqomkilıka was catching many salmon, his brother at last decided to become a man. But instead of sending his cloak back above he animated it, as an eagle. Smaoan now became an ardent fisherman and was much annoyed by the thefts made by the bird, though he himself was responsible for it not having returned to Nusmät·a. After about a year he suggested to Omqomkilıka that they should kill it, but the latter demurred, since it was the guise which Älquntäm had given Smaoan. The latter said nothing, but the next time he saw the eagle stealing his fish he killed the bird, without consulting his brother. No sooner had he done this than he felt sorry, but it was too late; he could not restore the eagle to life.

Owing to the salmon given them by Älquntäm the two brothers were now very prosperous, and Smaoan began to think of marriage. One day he noticed some chips floating down the Dean River, so he judged that people must be living on that stream. He set out to investigate, met Yeälos, and married his sister Sximäna, as has been described in a Dean River myth. To celebrate this event the two brothers prepared to invite people from far and near. First they lengthened their house to accommodate a large number; it was of the type known as tcäkwaloti, though it could not expand without human agency. Then they painted their spoons with designs of the mätsqus, since they had brought that creature with them from above. Now everything was ready and they summoned their guests. When all had assembled, Smaoan gave a llaiyäkam dance [424] [535]

[53] The clouds which float over Kimsquit before a west wind are still called "Smaoan's clouds," in memory of his journey. The myth fails to explain how Smaoan was responsible for these phenomena.

* 539 to commemorate the killing of the eagle. The text of his song described how he had come to this earth and how he had slain the bird which had [424] been his own cloak. This dance was duly validated by presents of [535] salmon, and has since been carried out by the descendants of Smaoan. It is assumed that the concept of such a dance was given to him by Ālqantām before he left Nusmāt-a, but he used his own discretion on this earth as to the actual reason for it.

At this gathering of people, virtually a potlatch, Smaoan tobk for himself the name Ānuqplālaix, "What Fills People." He chose this name with reference to the countless salmon caught in his weir.

Smaoan next travelled to Bella Bella seeking a wife. His fame and wealth were so well known that he was able to wed Ťlākwaitl, the daughter of a powerful chief. She had the valued prerogative of wailing, a right which had been duly validated by presents. Her father told her that when she was going with Smaoan to Kimsquit she would pass Yuyulmxl, a man who had been turned to stone on the skyline above the western side of Dean Channel, about five miles from its head, and that unless she wailed as she passed him her children would be unable to enjoy this prerogative. The reason for this injunction is not now understood; it is merely recognized that as Yuyulmxl became petrified near Smaoan's home he became, in some manner, a crest. As the canoe bearing Ťlākwaitl passed Yuyulmxl she began to wail and weep, nor could her husband soothe her. He, for his part, told the herald, Nusliluq, who had come with him from above, to call out as follows:

"Hello! Crest, our chief has married a Bella Bella woman; as you are his crest, so are you hers."

[484] When Nusliluq had called this a second time the stone man answered. [763] Ever since, passers-by have addressed Yuyulmxl, and a failure on his part to reply is considered an omen of death.

Ťlākwaitl brought her husband several valuable prerogatives, a sisook dance with the large cone-shaped whistles, several kusiut dance rights, as well as some dyed cedar-bark. According to one of Smaoan's descendants, this is how the sisook ritual reached Kimsquit. Among the Bella Bella, whales can only be eaten by chiefs, and Smaoan received this right from his father-in-law. The latter also gave his son-in-law a dead whale, which was towed behind the canoe towards Kimsquit. Smaoan knew that his people would object to it being brought into the river, since there was a firm belief that a whale would drive away the salmon. Accordingly, he beached the carcass in the fiord and there dried the meat in smoke.

Smaoan now determined to give an elaborate potlatch at which he planned to portray his prerogative with regard to the whale. He decided to build his new house of the semi-subterranean type; when it was finished

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

he had the design of a whale painted on the back wall. He invited guests from all parts of the coast, and validated, by valuable presents to them, a new name which he had chosen for himself, Nuxāpnia'sta, "The Place for Catching Salmon." This name was applicable because his house was built on the west bank of the Kimsquit River at a good place for catching salmon. 539*

Smooan next went to the land of the Xuxais Indians, a branch of the Carriers living northeast of Kimsquit, where he married Wat·as, the daughter of a chief. From her he received the right to use a form of sisook whistle that imitated the voice of a deer.[11] Soon after his return with his bride, Smooan called guests from far and near to another potlatch, at which he validated the name xlliksaix, "The Circuit." He chose this with reference to his first travels when seeking a suitable place to settle. He used his own discretion in selecting the name.

About this time Smooan married yet another woman, daughter of a Dean River chief. These marriages so increased his wealth and fame that he was able to give numerous potlatches and validate several names which he chose for himself from incidents that had happened to him since reaching this world. Among these designations were:

Sinxālotla: a sisook name meaning "Sun." He chose this in consequence of his transformation to the sun when first travelling around the world. At one potlatch he performed a sisook dance with respect to this name.

xxālxotsaix: a chief's name which he took when he gave away valuable presents. It means "The Going Around," and refers again to his circuit of the world.

Ponpolletsdimut: a chief's name of which the significance has long been forgotten.

Alqoxnkam: a chief's name which he validated by valuable presents. It means "The Shelterer," a reference to the manner in which he sheltered his raven brother beneath his eagle wings when he first came to earth.

Ompomkilka, who lacked his brother's power and ability, was able to marry one wife only, Snalkānāli, the sister of Nodkila. Ever since that time there have been intermarriages between the people of the Kimsquit and the Dean rivers, as if this first marriage had "Opened the Way." [582]

After some time, though whether before or after his fourth marriage is not known, Sximāna bore Smooan a son, and within a few years he had a large family. Owing to his great wealth he was able to give numerous 539 [551] potlatches,[811] at which he validated names for his children. One of these was Ăs·yănam, the designation he had applied to his salmon-weir; it has been used by his descendants as a child's name ever since. As time went on, when his children grew into manhood, he obtained for them seats in the house and also procured wives for them. His eldest son, whose mother was Sximăna, had the names Łăloxmăn·a, the meaning of which is unknown, and Ăluskmăn·aix, "The Most Important of All Chiefs' Sons." Smaoan had arranged marriages for this young man with four women, but Łăloxmăn·a was so ugly that only one of his wives, as ugly as himself, would have anything to do with him. His only real friend was a younger brother, Ăłkexa, aged about twelve years, who was his constant companion.

One day Łăloxmăn·a became so embittered and disgusted at his own ugliness that he went away, determined never to return, and not caring whither he went. As provisions he carried only a goat bladder filled with goat marrow. This prevents hunger and is said never to become exhausted, no matter how long the hunter may be absent. Ăłkexa saw his elder brother depart, and decided to accompany him. Łăloxmăn·a allowed him to come with him for about ten miles, up the valley of the Kimsquit River, where he shot some mergansers which he asked Ăłkexa to take back as a present to his parents. The younger boy was unwilling, nor could he be dissuaded from following, even when Łăloxmăn·a told him he was going off to die.

So the two camped for the night, and next morning continued their journey up the valley of the Kimsquit River, a region then unknown. Łăloxmăn·a was very sad at the thought of the hardships which his younger brother would have to endure, but he could see no way in which to persuade him to return. On and on they pressed, camping at night, their only food being the goat marrow which Łăloxmăn·a carried. Far up the river they followed an affluent from the left, and from its valley climbed the bare mountain which, though they knew it not, is the watershed between the Kimsquit and Kitlobe rivers. Here, above the treeline, they met a wolf. It lowered its ears, hummed, walked a few paces along a path, stopped, and looked back, as if it wished to guide the two wanderers. They decided to follow the animal which, once assured that [811] "Although the Bella Coola are sufficiently logical to demand an explanation for everything, once a belief has been formulated they cease to inquire whether it is possible. Thus, in all these accounts of the first people, the reader wonders how there were enough people in the world so soon after its settlement to make potlatches possible. Who were the musicians? Who formed the bulk of the guests? Such questions do not strike the Bella Coola as obvious; the stories have been handed down as facts, and they believe that anything was possible in those early days before man had lost his supernatural power.

the two were actually following, led them down an animal trail on the farther side of the mountain. After a while they saw some gulls, a cheering sight since it presaged a river. On and on they went, until at dusk they came to a stream, the headwaters of the Kitlobe River, though of this they were ignorant. Here they met Sä·lma.

"Where are you going?" the supernatural one asked. "I can see by your faces that you are melancholy."

Łäloxmän·a told him all his woes, how his wives had deserted him on account of his ugliness, and how accordingly he had wandered away, careless of his fate. Sä·lma inserted his fingers in Łäloxmän·a's mouth and the latter vomited. Sä·lma examined the vomit and found some of the water in which dry dog salmon had been soaked.

"That is why your wives left you," he said. "It is filthy stuff, no wonder they would not let you come close to them. But I will beautify you."

Sä·lma first massaged Łäloxmän·a's face, until it was very comely. Then the supernatural one rubbed his whole body so that, when he had finished, the ugly youth had been changed to a handsome one. Finally Łäloxmän·a passed between Sä·lma's legs, went around his body, sunwise, and again passed between his legs. He did this four times, thereby becoming a shaman, and Sä·lma gave him his own stick, which had the power of life and death.

"Now," said Sä·lma, "I know that you have been married to four women, but that only one of them has been faithful to you. When you return home, handsome as you are, your wives will all ask you to take them back, but you must cherish only the ugly one, who was faithful to you when you were repulsive. You will be able to make her beautiful, even as you yourself are."

When he had said this, Sä·lma vanished.

Still guided by the wolf, the two brothers continued their journey and at evening reached the district on the Kitlobe River known as Ṫniqo. Here they spent the night in a large cave. In the morning the trail was so bad that Äłkexa decided to go no farther. Łäloxmän·a divided his goat marrow with him and told his brother he would not be long absent. On he went, confident that he would soon come to a settlement because Sä·lma had told him there was one on the river. Presently he saw trees that had been felled by axes, then smoke, and finally a village on the opposite bank of the river. Here the wolf left him.

Łäloxmän·a had carried with him on his travels a bear-skin blanket and some eagle down. He put these on, and went to a spot immediately opposite the village. Some children were the first to notice him, and they ran home saying that they had seen a supernatural being; this was *539 because Łāloxmān·a was so beautiful. The Kitlobe chief, Kapsālopst, also called Yelsqwikaiya, bade some of his people ferry the new-comer across the river, and when this was done, he welcomed Łāloxmān·a to his house. All the people gathered to see the stranger guest; it was the first time that the people of Kimsquit and Kitlobe knew of each other. Owing to his supernatural power, Łāloxmān·a was able to talk to them, and when he mentioned his father's name, Smaoan, they all knew of him, for his fame had travelled even to that distant spot.[15] Kapsālopst asked him whether he wished a wife, and when Łāloxmān·a answered in the affirmative, he allowed him to marry his daughter Wisamkilak, known also as Xwisamkila.

For two years Łāloxmān·a dwelt in Kitlobe, until he spoke the language perfectly and was regarded as one of themselves. He had two children, the eldest a boy, Ḳaiyu, and the younger a girl, Wanql. At this time he thought of Ālkexa, waiting in the cave on the upper waters of the river which he now knew was the Ṭsi·dis, Kitlobe, and of his parents who must long ago have abandoned all hope for their missing sons. He told his friends that he wished to return, and told them of his brother. A number of his friends volunteered to go with him, so when Łāloxmān·a set out he was accompanied not only by his wife, his children, and four slaves belonging to his father-in-law, but also by a large number of young Kitlobe men, carrying olachen grease, for which Kitlobe is famous, as a present to Smaoan. Knowing the route, they reached the cave within a single day. But instead of finding Ālkexa, all that was there were his bones, scattered by animals. At this his Kitlobe friends lamented, but Łāloxmān·a, unperturbed, collected the bones and laid on them the stick he had received from Sā·lma. Instantly Ālkexa was restored to life, and he rubbed his eyes as if awakening from a heavy sleep. The socket joint from one hip had been carried away by some animal, so that when he arose he was lame. That is why so many Kitlobe Indians are lame, even to the present day, in spite of the fact that Ālkexa himself never visited Kitlobe. The restored youth was very weak from death, so for two days the whole party tarried at the cave, administering strengthening food to him. To pass the time Łāloxmān·a executed some wonderful paintings on the wall, which remain to the present day, as if petrified. When Ālkexa was well enough to travel, Łāloxmān·a massaged him to give him beauty equal to his own, and then the whole party continued on their way.

Meanwhile, in Kimsquit, Smaoan and Sximāna had long despaired of ever again seeing their sons, and a mourning ceremony was taking place.

[15] The myth does not explain how the Kitlobe people had heard of Smaoan if this was the first they had heard of Kimsquit.

At this juncture someone saw a party of strangers, and wondered who they might be as they entered the town. There was great rejoicing when the two brothers told their parents who they were, for they had been so transformed that they were unrecognizable. As Sä·lma had said, Łäloxmän·a's three beautiful wives came rushing up, eager to have him take them back, but he paid no attention to them. He welcomed only the ugly one, who had mourned for him, and massaged her until she became the most lovely of all. 539*

Smaoan, delighted at the safe return of his sons, and proud of Łäloxmän·a's beautiful children, sent invitations far and near to a great potlatch. At this ceremony he validated, with many presents, a seat in the house for Łäloxmän·a. The name thus confirmed was Spätcalıt, "The First Born," a name given to Łäloxmän·a by Kapsälopst. Smaoan also took this opportunity to confer names on his numerous grandchildren. After sojourning for some time in Kimsquit, the Kitlobe people returned home, richly laden with gifts.

In the course of time Wisamkilak bore her husband two more children. Smaoan continued to prosper and to give potlatches, at one of which he gave one of his grandchildren the name Stälımx, "Chief." This designation at once became honourable on account of the goods expended. Łäloxmän·a did not wish to forget his Kitlobe friends, so in time he sent two of his children to live there. One of them was Stälımx, a name that has ever since remained there. Thus friendly relations between Kimsquit and Kitlobe, first opened by Łäloxmän·a, have been maintained. There have been many marriages between people of these two areas, each knows of Łäloxmän·a, and it was only about one hundred and fifty years ago that a Kimsquit woman, Äts̱ıtıl by name, was married to a Kitlobe man to repay the original marriage of Wisamkilak. [648] [582]

When Smaoan became old he gave yet another potlatch at which he took for himself the name Lilixwnimut, "The Scatterer." He created this from his own fertile imagination, with reference to the way in which he scattered eagle down when first travelling to the north in eagle form. It has since been used by his descendants when old. [551]

The descendants of Smaoan enjoy not only the prerogative of using this myth and the names included in it, but other privileges connected with it. If one of them gives a potlatch he carves the form of a mätsqus on the spoons to be used at it, and paints the wall of his house with a whale design. Omqomkilıka's descendants are more likely than others to receive supernatural good fortune from a mätsqus. The descendants of both 539* 424 [532]

* 539 brothers have the right, moreover, to hunt and collect food in the places 424 used by these first ancestors. The areas so authorized are:

Ałwalsqāmus: the mountain where they first came to earth.

Okqomāq: a valley leading into the main valley of the Kimsquit River where Omqomkilka was accustomed to hunt.

Nulqā-kil: a valley where Smaoan's wives used to pick berries.

Iyuuk: a level tract of country on the bank of the Kimsquit River twenty-eight miles from its mouth. No people landed here and Smaoan pre-empted it as a hunting-ground.

Nulqa-łwl: another valley where Smaoan's wives used to pick berries.

The place in the Kimsquit River where their salmon-weir was erected, and the spot where they caught olachen.

538 The length and wealth of detail embodied in this myth raises the 115 question of whether it is one of the usual type, or represents a combination of several stories strung together and related by a man eager to glorify the traditions of his own ancestors. It was received from Jim Pollard, a Kimsquit Indian, descended from Smaoan, and himself the user of this name, a valuable and reliable informant. Jim is a man of great ability, who has given more potlatches than any other Indian of either Bella Coola or Kimsquit, and who, accordingly, has been able to validate very fully his ancestral myths and the names embodied therein. Owing to the deaths of his relatives, Jim has been able to use designations and portions of this legend which otherwise would certainly have belonged to other people. In this respect it, therefore, represents an amalgamation, but one of a legitimate nature. Theoretically, every myth would be com-
[424] plete if it were not for the parts possessed by others, and the aim of every [581] wise Bella Coola is to seek the return of these pieces by judicious marriage. Jim has been able to achieve this by the death of his relatives and the assistance of his wife, herself a descendant of Smaoan. Before the coming of the white man and the consequent dwindling of population, it is unlikely that any one person would have the duly validated right to tell a myth of this length, but theoretically it was possible, and might have been done by anyone as superior to his fellows as this man is to the present inhabitants of Kimsquit.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Nałwalst[66]

* 539 Among the first people dispatched to this earth were four brothers, Hamot, Wałkis, Ałkeza, and Ałkałis, who came as eagles and settled in Nałwalst, the site of the present Manitou Cannery, Kimsquit. Before leaving Nuxmāx a, Hamcu had asked Ālqantim what they should do for a place to live and the deity had promised to provide them with one. The first night the brothers slept in the open, but the next morning they found a house completed for them on the shore of the fiord; it was of the semi-subterranean type with a central pit for the fire, surrounded by stagings. Ālqantim had made it peculiar in several respects. When the tide rose, water was forced up through passages in the rock so that it burst within the dwelling in miniature waterspouts. The upright posts were carved in representations of Thunder, and the paintings on the back-wall were of Snuq. Echo was there, invisible as usual, but repeating everyone's speech, while around the floor ran countless mice. The name of the house was Nanaqmāls, "Where Water Enters." 539* [776]

After a time, when the people had increased on the earth, Hamcu invited the chiefs, there were none other then, for a potlatch. The guests saw the wonders of the house and marvelled.

Three times Hamcu did this, but when he, or a descendant, attempted to do so for the fourth time, the supernatural power which had been present at the first potlatch had vanished; so carpenters were called upon to reproduce the original features. The painting of Snuq and the carving of Thunder presented no difficulties, though the latter was transferred from the house to the totem-pole without. Masks were made to represent the spouting water and manufactured mice ran on the floor by means of hidden strings. Whenever one of Hamcu's descendants gives a potlatch the carpenters are called upon to make realistic replicas, a form of dramatization responsible for features of potlatches not only among the Bella Coola but also, it is said, of the Bella Bella, Kitlobe, and the Tsimshian peoples. [532] [171]

ORIGIN MYTH OF AN UNIDENTIFIED TOWN*

In the beginning of time the supreme god sent down two brothers, Wātkū and Kuatwaxlu, to Mount Wa-pat, some thirty miles up the Bella Coola River not far from Snuc. They looked around, not knowing which way to go or what to do. Glancing down they saw smoke arising; it was from Ālkuī's fire, but this they did not know, because there were few people in the land, and no one knew anything about his neighbours. Kuatwaxlu travelled a short distance upstream until he heard the sound of beating, which puzzled him, so he advanced slowly until he saw a house, to the roof of which he cautiously climbed and looked down inside. Many people had assembled there; they were land-otters giving a dance,

* 539 aided by alder sticks which beat time of their own accord. From this sight Kwathwaiła became a shaman and used what he had seen when he was giving a dance of his own. His brother Wałkas went downstream until he came to a large house at Kâkałia[20] outside of which stood a huge bull-head. No one was in this house and Wałkas took possession of it.

A FRAGMENTARY ORIGIN MYTH[21]

Long ago at the time the world was first populated there were no rivers apparent, for such were confined underground in a cavern-like prison called Nuxmâtlîxwaix, the approach to which was barred by a huge boulder. Not only were the rivers shut up, but with them were their occupants, including the salmon. First Eagle tried to break this barrier, but without avail; then Raven succeeded. Since then the Bella Coola River has flowed in its present course. But the Tcemat River was still in bondage, to the disgust of the olachen who wished to travel up it to the home of the chief, Qmamaxa'ła. The Carpenter, ałłtulâk, took pity on them and by breaking the barrier permitted them to reach their destination.

Origin Myths of Other Tribes

177 As has been repeatedly stated, the Bella Coola have ob-538 tained many prerogatives by marriages with the members of [424] neighbouring tribes. Among these are, according to their belief, myths dealing with the peopling of distant localities. Ceremonially and sociologically, such traditions have the same importance as myths that describe Bella Coola as the final place of settlement of the first inhabitants. Accordingly, they can be given at this point.

177 In the previous section the original landing-places of some 538 of the individuals described is said to have been outside the
174 Bella Coola valley. Boas, discussing this fact (p. 122), sug-114 gests that such myths may reflect the movements of the ancestors of the Bella Coola from the parent Salish stock. Though this is a plausible hypothesis, it is also possible that a foreign myth, obtained by marriage, might have been altered in the course of generations to the Bella Coola pattern, preserving as the only foreign element that of settlement at a distance at the beginning of time.

ORIGIN MYTH OF Owikì[22]

539*

In the beginning of time Ālqantēm decreed that four brothers should be sent down to this earth. The eldest, whose name was Ālkālāli, came down from a hole in Nacmēqā and told his younger brothers to wait while he went ahead to reconnoitre. He took the form of a wolf and, as soon as he had reached the earth, went far to the east, where he obtained some abalone-shells. Then he returned to Ālqantēm's house, left his spoil with his brothers, and again went off alone to the west. This time he brought back some copper. After this he was ready to settle, so the four assumed the form of wolves and went down to Calvert Island, Owikì, as the Bella Bella call it. Here they assumed human form and their wolf cloaks floated back aloft.

Ālqantēm did not give them food to carry with them, but he told them they would find sea-lions waiting to be killed on Sea-lion Island. Accordingly they hunted on that island, as their descendants, the people of Owikì, have done to this day.

Ālqantēm had given Ālkālāli a box containing some of the cone-shaped whistles used in nanak dances. The three elder brothers decided that they alone should perform the nanak ceremonial and that, accordingly, the youngest should be kept in ignorance of the contents of the box, as uninitiated people are at the present time. He was a mere boy and his older brothers used to leave him at home when they went hunting, but they had given him the most explicit instructions not to open the carefully roped box, containing their treasures.

All went well for some time, but finally the boy yielded to temptation and opened the box. His brothers returned unexpectedly, and found him examining the whistles, with his head almost out of sight within. They decided to kill him at once. They crawled up, closed the cover on his head, and sat on the box until life was extinct. Then they laid the body on the ground before them as they sat behind the fire, and sent one of their number out to gather three small pliant sticks. When this was done they covered the corpse with eagle down and sat on the ground around it, raising and lowering the sticks as if they were throwing objects into the air. As they did so the feathers began to move, gradually rising in the air until some passed through the roof. It was as if a miniature whirlwind of gentle power were agitating them. As the three continued to use the sticks, the corpse itself began to move, finally disintegrating into the down and passing through the roof. As it did so the three said:

"Go back whence we came. Ty.....,"

Since that time the people of Owikt have disposed of their dead in this manner.

The first Ikhalalc brought with him from above not only the right to a xaxat dance, but also a Cannibal hamat dance (II, p. 71) with the Bella Bella name Lelwac. He had, moreover, the rare privilege of performing hamat and xaxat sons on alternate nights.

BC [766] [777]

This myth is important since it embodies an account of the disappearance of a corpse through a roof, a method of removal of the dead now practised by the Bella Coola in the case of chiefs. This means is recognized by the Bella Coola as have been a recent introduction from either Bella Bella or Rivers Inlet to Tal'is, and thence to Bella Coola. Judging from this account, it would appear that such a method of removal of a corpse must be considered as originally a prerogative embodied in a myth, although it has ceased to be regarded as such in Bella Coola. The man from whom this tradition was obtained said it was only one of the type current in Bella Coola, though such are common in Bella Bella. It was obtained by the marriage of one of his ancestors to a woman of Owikt, and was used as theme for a mourning-ceremony at the death of his sister.

AN EARLY BELLA BELLA MYTH TRANSMITTED BY MARRIAGE TO BELLA COOLA*

In the beginning of time, when the population of the earth consisted only of the few people who had come down from above, Ta'ititmat were to the Bella Bella town, Ewaxal, where, as was common at that period, people had no houses but were sheltered under huge trees which Ałqawlem had placed there for that purpose. Ta'ititmat was in the form of a man at the time and fell in love with a girl of the village. Her father, Nłaxi, agreed to the match and the two were married. The husband never slept with his wife; when he wished children, he willed that they should be born, and in time the couple had a large family. Tsilxtmar made many things for his father-in-law, who had descended from above ill-equipped with the necessities of life. Nûxûi asked his son-in-law for a canoe, and the carpenter agreed to make him a supernatural one by means of his great power. He built a large and strong craft that had the power of transforming itself into a salmon; when such a change was desired a salmon's back grew over the canoe.

Tsilxtmar had brought with him from above the ability to make models of creatures living in Nawait and to animate them on this earth. The salmon canoe was an awalxtalaxis, the supernatural canoe of the xsiaxl,* which latter designation was created by Tsilxtmar himself on earth. In his Bella Bella house there were wonderful carvings; house, rafters, door-posts, dishes, all were elaborately decorated.* Tsilxtmar also made the trees. The construction of these, and of so many boxes that they formed a house, became the theme of a Nuxalk coast myth, merely changed to a Sacian one. The Bella Bella have derived their great skill in carpentry from Tsilxtmar's residence among them at the beginning of time.

Tsilxtmar's father-in-law explained that he wanted a canoe in order to enable the world to see whether or not other people lived in it. [illegible] so, he proposed to study their customs and to transmit any of value to his numerous descendants. The canoe had the power of travelling in a straight line; if a mountain blocked its passage it tunnelled a way through, causing landslides. Nûxûi first travelled south. Whenever his canoe reached a village the inhabitants used to rush out to see it, but it would blink its xsiaxl eyes, which changed colour; whenever the earth would shake and the observers fall dead. This method of killing is Awalxtalaxis, which is consequently one of the xsiaxl's canoes in the land above. Finally Nûxûi reached the far south where Kimai'o had fled after abandoning Resurrection Bay (I, p. 41), owing to the numerous hornets she had found in that area. When the canoe came to the beach near the woman's house it blinked and the world reeled. Kimai'o emerged from her house, gazed everywhere but at the canoe, and then began to stagger. Summoning all her reserves of power she cast them at the interloper, but the canoe merely raised its back and became a salmon. Nûxûi projected his force against her, and she fell to the earth, overcome, crying out:

"Nûxûi, Nûxûi, stop, come ashore."

As soon as the salmon had taken on the form of a canoe again, Nū·ai went ashore and entered the woman's home.

She said, "I dwell in the ultimate south, beyond me there is nothing; I have none of the things which you seek except one, a life-box, containing liquid." Who made your canoe?"

He told her and she said, "I know Ya'ititmat, he is the greatest carpenter of all, the only one able to make such a craft as yours. But he has made it too strong and thereby killed all the people from whom you desired to learn useful arts. Take this life-box and return to the last village you visited. Dip your finger in the liquid and put it in each ear and nostril of those whom you have slain, and it will revive them."

Nū·ai carried out all her instructions at the next village and was able to restore all to life. In gratitude they gave him samples of their work and taught him all that he wanted to know. Then he retraced his route, stopping at each town, resuscitating the dead and learning their handicrafts, specimens of which he collected for the benefit of the Bella Bella. Finally he returned to his own village where he stored all his acquisitions in his own house, leaving the life-box, alone, in his canoe.

His next journey was to the east. As before, his canoe passed through every obstacle and he killed all the people in the villages which he visited. In the ultimate east he found a town where abalone-shells were used for everything; he killed the inhabitants, then revived them, and was given a supply of the shells. Then he repeated what he had done on his southern trip, returning to his starting-point and reviving his other victims, from whom he collected specimens of their handiwork and information as to their manufacture. He stored his samples in his house again and set out for the west, as before carrying only his life-box with him. Again he slew all whom he saw en route, until he reached the ultimate west where he found a village against which his canoe was powerless, because the houses, streets, and people were of copper.

Nū·ai said, "I shall take for myself the name Kitā"ōmat," which means copper in the Bella Bella language.

While returning to Bella Bella he restored his victims to life, and received what he wanted from them. His next expedition was to the north, where, after laying low the inhabitants of the villages through which he passed, he eventually reached one where people and houses were of tsimaing, a kind of copper. Here again his salmon-canoe was powerless. From this village he turned homewards, collecting information and reviving those he had killed as he went. This was his last expedition. When he returned to Bella Bella, Ya'ititmat told him not to use the canoe any more, and it moved away without human guidance in the shape of a salmon. It ranged over the world and in places dropped scales, which became sxiuil. This is why they are found in the mountains.

Not long after Yaltimat said to his father-in-law:

Then he returned above, whence he had come.

FRAGMENTARY MYTH OF A BELLA BELLA TOWN*

In the beginning the supreme god sent down to a grizzly bear a chief, uläälimlq, whose name means "Different from All Others." He wanted to travel to the south-west, but Mamoxälīna persuaded him to go north, to the land of copper. In that far country he found a woman, Tsemlīlaks, who wished to go to Bella Coola, so uläälimlq took her in his canoe. Several times on the return journey she wanted to leave him, but he prevailed on her to stay. They met Nuxkīla with whom they travelled to Bella Bella. When they came to the bad whirlpool at Meseche Nose, uläälimlq decided to slay it; so he plunged down into the sea, but was caught by a devil-fish and apparently killed. Tsemlīlaks continued her journey and built a house at Ḡwawi, near the Bella Bella lighthouse. That night an owl came near:

"I am uläälimlq," it hooted.

Tsemlīlaks accordingly summoned all the Bella Bella chiefs and they prepared to mourn his death, but instead uläälimlq himself came up from the sea to their ceremonial as a grizzly bear and killed many of them.

THE HOME OF THE DOGS

BC
539 *

In the beginning of time, when the earth was first being populated by Ālqunxīm, he sent down not only men, but animals as well. Among the latter were dogs, who came with their chief Ispiyaxīn·a and settled opposite Johnny Bay, near Ocean Falls. This place has since been called Āpa·i nas Wamalaks, "The Place Inhabited by Dogs." Here they multiplied rapidly, in spite of their continual quarrelling and fighting. The uläälq people living in the vicinity decided that it would be a great mistake to allow the dogs to increase out of all reason; so they banded together, attacked the town, and killed off its inhabitants. They pulled out the intestines of the slain dogs and threw them on the rocks, where they remain to this day, graved in the stone.

FRAGMENT OF A CREATION MYTH*

In the beginning Ayamim sent down to Smooth, a point west of Kwatna, two men with their respective wives. The men's names were Tlemdjiaw and Lagamnais, and those of the women, *Bakit and Sitmo.

CREEK MYTH OF SCHOONER PASS*

In the beginning there came down to Sumpmai, on Schooner Pass, a woman whose name was Sito-o. On the shore of a lake near there she became a shaman, through a vision of which the details are lost. To obtain the continued goodwill of the power residing in the lake Sito-o was wont to throw upon the water eagle down and fyrd cedar-bark, and said this water when ruffled patterns. One day when she was singing, she was overheard by Tsisbaada, Kwiliam; Wiam, Sinkamis, Sadi, and Wiis, who had come to earth on the Dean River, Kimkut, and were coming by canoe, looking for a suitable place to settle. The four first named were brothers, the remaining two their sisters. Attracted by the song the six landed and ultimately chose Sumpmai as their abode, where they lived amicably with the powerful Sito-o. In this they were fortunate, for she was so magically endowed that she had success in whatever she undertook.

Tsisbaada and his brothers built a large house of the kelp which grew abundantly in the vicinity. In course of time they were able to call people from far and near for a potlatch, at which a whale received grease down through the smoke vent on to the central fire causing it to blaze brightly, much to the amusement of the guests.

CREEK MYTH OF Bellabella

In the beginning, Ayamim sent down Sallika with a herald to Bellabella, near a lake in the country now occupied by the Carrier Indians. Sallika brought with him a sack containing the model of a house which, when he set it on the ground, expanded without visible cause into a fine, large dwelling. In front of it there was a towering totem-pole surmounted by an owl.

When Sedibe had prepared and collected a great deal of goods he went his herald in all directions with invitations to a potlatch. There were not many people living in those early days, so the guests were few in number. As each group approached, the owl turned its head, without moving its body, to inform Sedibe that strangers were coming, and who they were.[1]

MORE MYTH OF Sedibe[2]

One of the first people to come to this earth was a man who settled on Dean Channel below Kimsquit, the country of the Gimsy people. He lived there for a considerable period and became the father of many children, among them a son named Hkusa. He was a source of constant worry to his father, who wished him to become a hunter. He made him a bow and arrow, but Hkusa lost the arrow the day it was given to him, and then the one his father gave him to replace it. For some time his parent made an arrow every day, and every day the son lost it. This continuous or annoyed the father, who was also irritated at Hkusa for quarrelling with his brothers, that he decided to move away from the settlement, and have his workroom out there alone. With the help of his other children, he took down the side boards of the house, leaving only the frame standing, and put some glowing embers in a clam shell in the hearth of Hkusa; then all went away to their canoes.

Not long after the departure of his relatives Hkusa saw a mountain goat on a cliff above him. He had only one arrow, but decided to try to kill the animal. As he climbed after the goat, it moved down the mountain to meet him and presently he saw there was a man behind it; the latter was a supernatural being. Hkusa had until he could have after the creature spoke, when the supernatural being drew near, he asked him.

"I have come to see you," the latter replied, "I bring you the rock," indicating one which he was carrying. "When you want to kill mountain goats hold it in your hand and make the motion of throwing it, a mountain goat will fall dead. Big game is what you pray to Mouldar, asking him for whatever you desire, physical strength, success in your undertakings, or anything else. You must be generous and give away the riches which this rock will bring to you."[1]

Then the being gave him the rock and vanished. Hkusa went a little distance down the mountain, made the motion of casting the rock these cows, and these mountain goats appeared, dead, on the ground before him. He took the fat from the stomach of a yearling and carried it to his father, who had waited some distance away, as proof that he had had success in his hunting; then returned to the place where he had been abandoned.

Next morning, sick in bed, he went to the edge of the town where he stood looking away from the site of the settlement, as the supernatural being had instructed him, and prayed to Mindak for house. After praying he looked around and found four large buildings standing on the spot; on the first one an eagle, on the second a kingfisher, on the third a gull, and on the fourth an owl. The eagle screamed, as eagles are accustomed to do in the early morning, and at once the house on which it sat was filled with all manner of goods, including boxes containing the large cone-shaped whistles such as are used for scaré ceremonials. During the day the kingfisher settled, the gull called, the owl hooted, and as each arrived to cry the house on which it sat was filled with all kinds of goods, foods, skins, blankets, and household utensils. With the whistles so acquired Mindak gave a potlatch to which he summoned the people from far and near. The whistles sounded, imitating the voices of the four birds which had sat on the dwellings and through the aid of which they had been filled. The Bella Bella chief, Wigipamatin, covered his head with his blanket because he had nothing to equal the display, so Mindak gave him a whistle with its box. All the guests were witnesses of the transaction, and it was in this way that the scaré ceremonial reached Bella Bella.

Mindak lived to a great age, and during his lifetime moved to several places, in each of which he gave potlatches. His last camping-place was Qumsuk, where he held his largest rite, erecting for the purpose a new house with six rows of seats to hold the audience. It was there that he died.

In the beginning four brothers, Wadiks, Kumsa, Kitkitsit, Qamdidaw, and their sister Tidmadzis, came to earth on Swan Island, Qa'omsuna, to the west of Kumsa. They moved to Qwatsa, but often returned to their landing-place to have sections which they would visit to death. Qumkhlamat was the most prosperous of the brothers, so much had his wealth increased that he was able to call the people from all parts of the coast to a potlatch.

Ayamtim had given Tlitsmalila the honorable prerogative or duty of singing the mourning song whenever anyone died. When it was time for her to function she painted her face with a design representing a rough sea, and beat time on the floor with a stick, Spookalem, on which were jingling copper bangles. The chorus was how Raven had brought her help on all occasions.

The right to sing this song has since been preserved as a prerogative to the ancestral family descended from these four brothers. No name accompanies it, but the right must be validated by the giving of presents.

Eight Traditions Heard on Ceremonial Occasions or Origin Myths

The following are examples of myths which are used as authorization for potlatches even though they do not deal with the actual peopling of this earth. It will be noted that they describe the adventures of early ancestors, and only with non-Bella Coola. All are claimed to have been obtained by intermarriage with the descendants of individuals mentioned in them.

[illegible] [illegible] Myth*

Not long after the first people had come to this earth, Raven taught an ordinary chief, Ilp-pamil by name, how to catch black cod with hook and line. It was summer at the time, and Ilp-pamil began to make preparations for fishing early the following year. He instructed his wife to take three female assistants with her to the woods to collect a large quantity of cedar-bark for making the line, which had to be at least three hundred yards in length, owing to the depth at which black cod are found in Lekwiakum Channel. The four women returned four days later with a large amount of the material, out of which they worked all summer and the following winter. Meanwhile Ilp-pamil, with three other men to help him, was busy manufacturing hooks of the usual British Columbia type. They were made from the horns of dead and fallen bonebacks, the interior was first cut out, then into the desired shape, smoothed with sandstone gave goose, and tied. After a week the lashing was removed and the hooks retained the desired shape. By January all was ready, and the enormous task of fastening them to the line had been completed.

Ts̄ paxat set out from his home with a number of companions to Lekouciere Channel, where they caught for bait a large quantity of the small fish known as sardines, lleskaskhwal.[*] It was then evening and next morning the fisherman threw out the cod line before eating. Ts̄ paxat had great success, catching over a hundred fish at a single time, owing to the number of hooks on his line. During the winter he lowered his line only once a day, but he fished steadily, drying his spoil at intervals, and when April came and he could make three hauls daily, he had caught an enormous quantity. All who saw his success were amazed, and many copied his method; since that time the use of hook and line for cod has been a common practice.

Ie
[336]

When Raven taught Ts̄ paxat how to catch cod he also instructed his wife how to clean and prepare them in a certain manner and added that she must throw the entrails back into the ocean. The woman remembered the latter injunction, and her daughter regularly disposed of the remains in this way, but they were careless in the manner of cutting the fish. Ḵmayma, chief of the supernatural beings dwelling beneath the ocean, knew of this and was angry at the insult offered to Black Cod. The underwater beings hunt on behalf of their master, so the latter sent the blackfish with instructions to seize Ts̄ paxat's daughter, a pretty girl named Alkamka. This is a Bella Bella word, which probably means "Very Good." The blackfish watched her come to the edge of the sea, waited until she had gone a short distance into the water, and then carried her off. Since she was below the age of puberty the supernatural fish had no fears in approaching her. To those on shore it appeared as if she had been drowned; in reality the blackfish bore her away to Ḵmayma's house in their canoe, which, like that of the salmon, is invisible to mortal eyes. She found herself among many strange fish, and in the presence of the mighty Ḵmayma, who wore his usual broad-brimmed hat.

When those who had seen the kidnapping of Alkamka told Ts̄ paxat and his wife, they grieved for their daughter as for one dead. In mourning, they stopped fishing and tore their hair. From afar Raven saw their grief and came to ask its cause.

"For some unknown reason I have lost my daughter," Ts̄ paxat answered.

"I think it must be due to your having cut up Black Cod in some manner other than that in which I directed you," said Raven. "If you had followed my instructions this trouble would not have come upon you."

Meanwhile Xemoqwa had been questioning Ailsamka: "Why did you not obey Raven's instructions about cutting up Black Cod? You have been committing a very serious offence, but I shall return you to your parents tomorrow and you can tell them to be more careful in future about teaching people."

The land in which the little girl found herself was much like this earth, containing a river, with the ocean in place of the sky over it. An old woman, Snalqulpäls-di Xemoqwa, who was living in Xemoqwa's house, told Ailsamka not to eat any unfamiliar food which her captor-host might offer her, or she would be unable to return; whereas she would be all right if she maintained her customary diet. Presently someone asked her what she would like to eat; she named several of her favourite dishes and they were brought to her without demur. Next morning, it was really next year but she did not know that,* Xemoqwa prepared to send her back. From the doorway of his house she could see the cod lines hanging down through the water, and Xemoqwa asked her is she could see her father's.

"No," she replied, "he is not there."

In what seemed a few minutes, but in reality was several months, because Xi paaxi did not begin his fishing until March, she saw his canoe approaching.

She said to Xemoqwa, "That is he. I recognize his paddle."

Xi paaxi dropped his line, and as he did so began to cry, thinking of his dead daughter. Acting on Xemoqwa's instructions, Ailsamka grasped the lowest hook, while Xemoqwa sent a black cod to each of the others. After a while Xi paaxi recovered from his spasm of grief and hauled up his line, assisted by his two sons who were with him in the canoe. So great was their amazement at seeing Ailsamka on the line that they refused to believe their eyes and wanted to throw the line back, but she quickly called out:

"I am your daughter."

The father thankfully drew her into the boat, exclaiming at her long absence; this was the first she knew that she had been away for more than a single night.

Her two brothers called out, "Xi paaxi's daughter has returned, hauled in your lines."

The news was passed from canoe to canoe, the fishermen drew up their lines and hurried ashore to Xi paaxi's house, eager to hear what had happened. Fresh sand was spread on the floor, as is always done when a person has been in contact with supernatural beings to enable him to enter.

Ailamka told them everything, that her mother had failed to teach her how to cut up black cod, "so Xmaqma sent blackfish to catch me so that I could be taught," she said. "You must be very careful to cut them up properly or trouble will come upon you."

The correct method, as taught by Raven, is to split the fish cleanly without severing the bones. Xi-paxa's daughter had erred by cutting the one which is equivalent in a fish to the human collar-bone. She told them of the fish that abounded in Xmaqma's house; of the red-fish, which disobeyed their mother by playing outside the house so that their stomachs were often forced out from their mouths* and they floated up to the surface; of Xmaqma himself and his large hat; and of the other denizens of the underworld. The people listened attentively and ever after cut up black cod in the prescribed fashion, though if Ailamka had not been carried off to Xmaqma's house Raven's teaching would undoubtedly have been forgotten.

Not long after his daughter's safe return Xi-paxa gave a potlatch. He took for himself the name Xmaqma, and at the same time reproduced in his own house as much as possible of what his daughter had described. Thus there were imitation fishes, especially the halibut, around the house, while the red-fish were shown as wooden models that could be drawn up to the roof by hidden strings representing the manner in which the fish float up to the surface of the ocean. Xmaqma, himself, was shown wearing his large bell capped hat, of the type known as hipul.*

While Ailamka was under the water Xmaqma had shown her xaxa whistles, and at this potlatch they were used while the girl was concealed within the back-room as a xaxa initiate.

BC [177] [556]

This was the* origin of the xaxa ceremonial, which spread in time from the xaxmy people to the Bella Coola. The name Xmaqma passed to one of Xi-paxa's descendants who, when he gave a potlatch, arranged

*This style was always worn by Xmaqma and Hipulim and, as many of the first people obtained their power from one or other of these beings, the propriety of using such hats at potlatches is quite common. They are made of cedar roots, are waterproof, and are usually painted with one of the wearer's ancestral crests. When either Xmaqma or Hipulim is shown on a totem-pole he is displayed with one of these hats.

*It will be noted that the narrator tacitly assumes any origin recorded in his myth to be the sole, or authentic one.

The narrator obtained this myth through the marriage of his mother's mother with an ustmy man.

A MYTH OF SEA-LION ISLAND[19]

In the beginning of time the sea-lions came down to earth at an island outside Rivers Inlet where they bred and multiplied. The place is still known as Sea-Lion Island and hunters from all parts of the coast used to go there, as the animals were not only good food but easy to kill.

On one occasion a man had wandered apart from his companions and met a stranger who invited him home. He accepted and followed his host into a nearby house, though he had never known before that there was one in the vicinity. Once within, the door closed with a metallic crash and the rash explorer vanished from the sight of his companions, who thought that he must have been drowned. But he had really entered a sea-lion house. The animals were sitting around their fires exactly as human beings are accustomed to do; in fact, the only strange thing was that they were using human knee-caps as dishes. He listened to their conversation.

"Lend your dish to Nupaqa," he heard one of the animals say to a friend.

Nupaqa was an old woman who was sitting in one corner of the house.

"The dish will be too small to hold a meal," thought the mortal.

The sea-lions could understand his thoughts.

"Don't say this," said one of them. "Nupaqa has the power of making the food inexhaustible."

Presently one of the beasts gave the man a knee-cap dish containing a minute morsel of halibut soaked in oil.

"That won't be enough for me," he thought.

But again a sea-lion comprehended what was in his mind. It was true. The man ate and ate until he could eat no more, but the amount of food on his plate did not diminish.

He stayed with them for several months, but at last grew homesick and lonely. The sea-lions read his unvoiced desires.

"Your home is not far away," said one of them. "We will send you there whenever you like. You can travel on a wave; would you prefer one that will carry you at one swoop, at two, at three, or at four?"

The man thought of the jolt with which he would strike the beach if he travelled the whole distance on a single billow, so asked to be sent on a four-billow wave. His canoe was a sea-lion's stomach, into which he climbed through the mouth and which he made watertight by tying up the entrance with the animal's entrails. Whether or not the creature was alive is not clear, but at any rate the man set off in the strange craft. He felt as if he were on the back of an animal which made long, easy, slow bounds; it was the slow surging of a gigantic Pacific comber. After four bounds he untied the sack and found himself at home.

Certain names have been preserved from this myth. The name Nqaqa is now used by a dog, as the owner is the last of her family. Another name is Tkwumpmist, "The Crack," derived from the metallic sound of the closing door of the sea-lion house. The name Nemaxtu was also obtained inside the house, but the details of its significance are lost.

AN EARLY MYTH OF Kilde-i[a]

As has been said, ambitious individuals, especially if they lack origin myths of the customary kind, sometimes claim ordinary stories as such. The following is almost certainly a case in point. It was obtained from an unreliable informant, who claimed it as a family myth, and said he had used it at a potlatch. He asserted that it was a Bella Bella story, transmitted through the marriage of one of his ancestors with a Bella Bella woman. Another informant, well versed in Bella Bella folk-lore, recounted another version of the same myth as a mere tale. There seems little doubt that the first narrator had merely laid claim to a common story to supply the deficiency of a true myth.

In the beginning, there came down to earth at the head of Gus Bay, Kilde-i, a solitary man whose name was Kilde-a. He was so lonely that he made for himself from soft punky wood a woman, dressed her in blankets and clothing, and gave her the name, Qual'ioac, which is in the Bella Bella language. Kilde-a was a great hunter; every day he went out to seek mountain goats, which provided him with great quantities of grease, as well as yarn that he wove into blankets. Before leaving the house he always placed Qual'ioac in front of a loom, put food beside her and told her to eat as much as she liked and to work diligently.

Other people had come down to earth at the same time as Kásán·a, and among them a man and his wife who had landed at the mouth of Gee Bay. They had two daughters who, walking one day at the head of the bay, were surprised to find a house. They looked in and saw a woman, so entered, and laughed heartily to find her made of rotten wood. They kicked over the figure and the head fell into the fire and was burnt. Then they seated themselves in her place, worked diligently at the blanket and ate a large amount of the food. Towards dusk they put the figure back in place and hid themselves.

Soon Kásán·a entered. He embraced the figure, called her a good wife, and thanked her for weaving so diligently and for having eaten so much of the food. Then he saw that she had burnt her head, and chided her, saying that she must take better care of herself. At this the two girls who were hiding burst out laughing and showed themselves. They suggested to Kásán·a that he choose one of them for his wife; he agreed, selected the elder and married her. He built a house on a hilltop where they lived and to which he called people from far and near when he gave a potlatch.

Xusaá Origin Myths

As already stated, many xusaá names are believed to have come down from above with the first Bella Coola, or to have been created by them on this earth. In such cases, the xusaá origin myth is the same as the ancestral myth. Theoretically, names of the same type can also be received through visions in which a beholder is given his new designation by some supernatural being, or taken it from the apparition. In either case, of course, it must be duly validated by the giving of presents. Only three myths were obtained which deal solely with the acquisition of a xusaá prerogative. No doubt this is chiefly to be explained by the fact that most xusaá rites have been derived from the Bella Bella.

*539 609 424 that he was unable to return home. A young Bella Coola woman charitably took the injured man into her house, but though she tended him with care, the injury did not heal properly, and he was crippled for life. He used to work around the house at light chores, but was unable to perform any hard work, and was virtually adopted into the family, though, lacking land in Bella Coola, he could never acquire any real status there. After remaining for more than five years the cripple became ill, and realized that he was about to die. In gratitude to the woman who had sheltered him, he asked her to use his sisaok name, Spuxpuxä-mpdimut, for one of her children, if she ever had any. Soon afterwards, the stranger died. The woman's family paid for his burial, and it was recognized that the name, with myth attached, belonged to them. In later years it was duly validated with presents at a potlatch, for the benefit of her son from whom this account was obtained.

The myth is as follows:

*539 Long, long ago, a number of the sons of chiefs were playing on the shore of Ootsa Lake, not far from a village. One of them, happening to look upwards, was surprised to see drifting down from a great height a spuxpux, one of the long feathers which grow on the upper leg of an eagle. They idly wondered who would get it, and pressed close together, ready to struggle, boy-like, for the prize, but it eluded their upstretched hands, and lit on the head of one of the boys. Then, to the amazement of all, he was lifted from the ground, as if the feather had been a magnet drawing him aloft. One of his friends seized his ankles and tried to pull him down, but in vain; moreover, he found that he could not release his grasp. A third lad grasped the feet of the would-be rescuer, but he, too, was lifted from the ground. One after another tried to pull down his friends, but none could do so, until finally all the lads were drawn aloft by the feather, each holding the legs of the one above him. Nothing was ever heard of their fate.

A few years later the father of the boy on whom the feather had fallen gave a potlatch, at which he used this event as a sisaok theme for one of his surviving children. A mask representing the sun was used in the belief that this supernatural being alone could have caused such an event.

A Sinxí Sisaok MYTH

It is doubtful whether the following tradition is a true sisaok myth or merely an explanation for a dramatic performance carried out at potlatches. 539* 575

About 1880 a man of Sinxí was made a shaman by the supernatural being Tlaqmai·ás, a woman who normally lives in the land above. She is made almost entirely of copper so that whenever she walks there is the sound of clashing metal. The visionary was given the shaman's name of Sisnaklis. It was not generally known how he obtained his power, but as his wealth increased in an amazing manner, it was assumed that he must have received something from Tlaqmai·ás which, kept in his box, acted as a magnet to wealth.*

Sisnaklis laid down four laws for behaviour in his house, which were obeyed, since he was a person of influence both as a shaman and as a man of wealth. He said that Tlaqmai·ás had instructed him in the following:

(1) No brand was to be taken from the central fire, lest the supernatural ones who were watching it should be offended at the removal.

(2) No ceremonial woman was to be allowed within the house.

(3) No pounding of cedar-bark was to be allowed within the house.

(4) Since his power was in some manner connected with the fire he decreed that while his songs were being sung, there was to be no obstruction of any kind between the singers and it. Accordingly, they did not arrange themselves in the usual circle, but sat in a row with a sloping mat stretched between them and the fire, as if it were a connecting causeway.

Whenever Sisnaklis gave a dance, six holes were cut through the wall of the back-room, at a height of about seven feet from the floor. While actually dancing, six assistants pulled eagle down through these holes on to his head, in time to the music. Moreover, instead of standing on the floor, Sisnaklis used to perform within a large box, which concealed him below the thighs and which was moved to and fro by assistants, as if it had been on castors. After dancing in time to two songs, a metallic clashing would be heard without, and Sisnaklis would rush forth, returning with a small, masked girl whose clothing was entirely covered with tiny copper ornaments. She represented Tlaqmai·ás. Sisnaklis

A BELLA BELLA Sisaxé MYTH[30]

Years ago, when white men first came to the coast, a schooner was surprised and captured by some ustmy Indians near whose village it was anchored in Johnston Channel. The crew was massacred with the exception of one man who crawled ashore on a mooring rope; his name was given as Kimpa, probably an attempt to pronounce Campbell. For over a year he was hunted by the ustmy people without success, and it was assumed that he must have died. Four years later, however, a Bella Bella canoe was cautiously rounding a point when the bow man saw a strange figure collecting clams. He went ashore armed with his musket and stalked the creature, which turned out to be the white man, clad in woven bark and moss. The latter made friendly signals, and the Bella Bella treated him kindly, giving him food and clothing. He remained with them for years and learnt their language. On one occasion when his rescuers' supply of powder was exhausted, this man said that he was going away, and left early one morning at high tide, to return in the afternoon with some powder he had made himself. He refused to share with the Bella Bella his knowledge of how to make it, but kept them well supplied, and also furnished much game. When at length a white man's craft came to Bella Bella the survivor sent a message written in charcoal on cedar wood to the captain, and he was taken off. Presents were given to his rescuers for their kindness in aiding him, as well as a paper setting forth the particulars of their friendliness to the whites.

Many years later the son of Kimpa's rescuer made a sisaxé mask, and used a mask representing the white man. The myth used in connection with it told of the manner in which the father of the dancer had found a strange creature who brought him good fortune, first by providing him with powder, and then by bringing him into friendly relations with the white man. The only incorrect part of the rite was the postponement of its inauguration until many years after the event.

If this tale has an historical basis, it must be assumed that the survivor of the massacre had been able to conceal some powder which he claimed to have made in order to increase his reputation.

CHAPTER VII

BIRTH, ADOLESCENCE, MARRIAGE

Birth—Childhood Instruction—Puberty Rites—Marriage

Birth

IT was impossible to obtain definite data on the fertility of Bella Coola women, or on the period elapsing between marriage and the birth of the first child. Sterility is rare, though by no means unknown; on the other hand, there are several families with as many as eight or nine children. The changed conditions which have followed the advent of the white man seem to have had little influence on the high birth-rate, although infant mortality has increased enormously. Within the last few years this has diminished, so that the Bella Coola are now holding their own. Children are always desired, and although methods of abortion and infanticide have been known for many years, neither practice seems to have been sufficiently common to have produced an appreciable effect on the population.

Pregnancy usually occurs during the year following marriage. Though its actual dependence upon coition is fully realized, yet the Bella Coola, religiously minded in this as in all other aspects of life, ascribe the condition to the four Mamoxálitsa acting on the behest of Alpaxúlu. It is believed that the Carpenters carve out the child who is to be born in the same way that a human craftsman manufactures some complicated object. Most individuals do not theorize to any extent upon the course of biological development, but are content to assume that Alpaxúlu has made the coming birth possible.

During pregnancy the expectant mother must observe certain restrictions. If she chews gum, she will have a difficult delivery; if she eats salmon tails, the feet of the infant will appear before the head, and although skilled assistants can usually rotate a child, this is a painful process which should be avoided.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

843 be avoided. If she walks on a beaver dam, or dips her head 825 into a pool made by this animal, the birth of her infant will be blocked in the same way that the dam restrains a stream. This difficulty can be obviated, however, by dipping up the water with her hands instead of bending her head to the surface to drink. As far as possible, she must avoid being startled by [774] small animals or reptiles; even if the excitement so caused is too slight to expel her own spirit, it may be sufficient to damage that of the foetus. Such dangers can be countered by means of magical rites (I, p. 700). Her husband is also subject to certain injunctions and prohibitions. If he eats beaver meat his wife's delivery will be difficult. He must preserve a small piece of the skin or an eye of every animal that he kills; a few [844] days after birth the child is steeped in the smoke of a fire on which these articles have been thrown. This prevents injury from the father's quarry.[1]

A pregnant woman continues to reside in her own house, where her condition is a source of interest to her friends and relatives. There are no midwives with inheritable professional 844 prerogatives, but as the time for delivery draws near, arrange-[424] ments are made for the mother or some other experienced female relative to be in attendance. It is quite proper for the husband to attend to this point, though it is customary for elderly female relations to do so, sometimes those of the wife, sometimes those of her husband. A woman who, having herself borne children, has assisted at many births with success, is often requested to be present, and it is taken as a matter of course that she will be rewarded for her services.

When the pains of labour begin, the patient leaves the house with her assistant or assistants. In summer the party goes to some lonely spot in the woods where a rude wind-break may have been erected; in winter, to a sheltered spot beneath a house. No man can be present, a point in which the Bella [811] Coola state that their culture differs from that of the Kwakiutl. The midwife manipulates the infant so that the birth is made as easy as possible. Women seldom experience difficulty and 844 suffer, on the whole, less than do white mothers. It is believed [776] that Sxaiarwax, though invisible, is present on every occasion; the rendering of assistance at childbirth is his one kindly act.

The umbilical cord was formerly cut with a mussel shell, [177] but for many years the use of a metal knife has been customary. The after-birth usually comes away easily, but if there is delay [845] hot ashes are placed around the feet and at the back of the woman to accelerate its expulsion. It is immediately buried or placed beneath a large tree in the forest; if burnt, the infant will always be weakly. While one of the assistants disposes of it, another washes the new-born child. The cloths and dishes used for this purpose are burnt; failure to do so is believed to [826] cause the child to become blind through a white film forming over the eyeballs. Then the mother and midwives return to the house with the infant, who is a source of tremendous interest to the community. It is proper for the father to recompense the attendants at once, in accordance with their skill and his generosity. A woman who has had several children often assists the daughter of a friend, then, as she gains more experience, her reputation grows and her help is more com- [445] monly sought. At the time of this study, 1922, the sum of $2.50 was considered suitable recompense for a fairly proficient midwife.

A new-born child takes the breast readily and a mother 853 would be considered harsh indeed if she failed to suckle her infant whenever it cried, since scientific hours for feeding are not known. A child is wrapped in a shawl or a blanket and 854 carried by the mother wherever she goes; when in the house it sprawls contentedly on the floor, unhampered by clothing. When the umbilical cord falls, it is preserved by the mother [846] Soon after birth, the parents make provision for their child's welfare by magical means (I, p. 706). The heavy infantile death-rate of the Bella Coola cannot be attributed to lack of [165] love or care on the part of parents, but the attention lavished is commonly not of the kind that assists a weakly child to survive the perils of infancy.

the perils of infancy. During this period, the mother observes various magical taboos to ensure the welfare of her offspring, and endeavours to strengthen herself by rubbing her own body with non-odoriferous oils obtained from dog-fish, goose, or fresh eulachon. Soft pounded salmon and water are added to an infant's diet as soon as possible, though nourishment from the breast frequently continues until a child is two, or even three years of age. It is not uncommon to delay weaning until the mother is again pregnant, when the child is deserted by the application of soot to the breasts. Marital relations are recommenced as soon as the mother is strong enough; there is no specified period of abstinence, nor does it matter whether or not the woman is lactative.

Occasionally, an infant is born with teeth; such an one is thought to be the reincarnation of a dead ancestor, though no one knows which. A similar belief is held respecting a child with dimples in the lobes of its ears; these are regarded as remnants of the holes pierced for ear-rings. A child that cries in the womb is said to have great intellect.

In former times infanticide was practised for various reasons. If a woman died in giving birth, it was customary for her mother to kill the child unless one of her relatives was able to suckle the motherless infant who was then given to her. It was not unknown for the mother of a large family to ask the midwife to kill the child in order to avoid an addition to her responsibilities. An unmarried girl who became pregnant often went alone to the forest, delivered herself without assistance, and killed her infant. This was considered to be the kindest act, since an illegitimate child was said to be, "Like a Dog." In some cases the prospective mother requested a friend to cause abortion by kneading the stomach and uterus, a method said to be effective and seldom fatal. How to do so is common knowledge, but to practise it is considered disgraceful, and the term cowat, applied to such an one, is among the most foul of Bella Coola opprobriums. It is believed that a woman who has had several children can in some way prevent further conceptions by wriggling her body on her haunches immediately after the delivery of a child. 842

NES Bellacoola NES

To the Bella Coola religious concepts of birth are as important as the physiological aspects. The blood discharged at birth, and the mother from whom it has come, is cwáix, a word difficult to translate. It is applied to a person or thing which is taboo, and combines the significance of "uncanny," "abhorred," "to be avoided," "feared"; perhaps "unclean," in the biblical sense, is the best synonym. Essentially human, this blood is not only potent against supernatural beings, but is dangerous to man as well. For this reason a mother must never be delivered within a house. The smell of the unclean blood might kill all resident within, or at least prevent them receiving presents of any kind. Supernatural beings and inferior supernatural powers are alike repelled by it. 826 844 783

A recent mother is taboo and must exercise due precautions to prevent her baneful influence from affecting her associates, but this power is most strongly present in one who has borne twins. Even younger people, sophisticated in most matters, shudder when speaking of twins; fortunately, double births are not common. They are attributed to the entry of a salmon into the body, so that a twin is half salmon, half human. Occasionally a woman who is pregnant with twins discovers her condition in a dream and avoids the perils of a multiple birth by calling upon a shaman to remove the spirit from one foetus so that the infant will be born dead and deformed. If this is not done, the two infants arrive in due course, to the horror and grief of parents and relatives. Though abhorred, no case is known of the killing of a twin at birth. 845 [825] [787] [756] [847]

Instead of the two children being brought back to the village, word is sent to the father who must join his wife in the temporary shelter in the woods where delivery took place. For one year, they must not return home, and during this period must not eat salmon. Four times during the year they must shift from one shelter to another, each built on the bank of a small creek. The mother can draw water from this stream 845 alone, and when she leaves it, it dries up immediately. When a year has elapsed, the parents return home with their children and the father resumes the ordinary routine of life. For three years more the mother must remain in the house, leaving it only at night through a hole in the floor. Above all else, she must keep away from the river; she cannot draw water from it, nor can she cut salmon on its bank. One instance is remembered in which the parents of twins failed to observe these restrictions; their legs became swollen and they soon died. In addition to punishment of the offenders in cases such as this, there is danger that if they fail to obey the customary taboos the salmon will be insulted and avoid the Bella Coola River.

After four years a mother of twins resumes her normal life, but she is henceforth endowed with special powers. If she wishes to see anyone who is absent, she has only to think of the person, and in her dreams she will be able to see him. She must never try to start up a dying fire by blowing upon it, since to do so would cause a gale. When a person sets out on any kind of an expedition from the house in which a mother of twins is living, the latter must chew a little food and spit it out towards the departing guest, otherwise he will fail in his venture.

845 Twins themselves, being akin to salmon, have miraculous 825 ability to see their fish-kinsmen and read their thoughts. Bella Coola mythology contains many stories of the way in which twins could talk with, and change into, salmon. Such knowledge is not limited to tales of the distant past. An elderly Bella Coola described the manner in which her grandmother, a twin related to Sockeye Salmon, was consulted by a man who had been unlucky with his weir. Going down into the water, this woman saw that the fish were avoiding his dam because of the charred uprights used in its construction; when these were changed he was successful in his fishing.

845 Twins are believed to possess remarkable ability from earliest childhood, and even to remember incidents occurring

before their birth. When the mother of the twin described in the last paragraph was awaiting delivery in a temporary shelter in the woods, its roof fell, cutting her head. The old woman who mentioned this occurrence stated that both her grandmother, the Sockeye Salmon, and her sister, a Spring Salmon, though still unborn, were aware of the accident and remembered the comments of the midwife. 845

On account of their uncanny power, twins are considered weaklings and usually die young in spite of the care lavished upon them and the taboos observed by their parents.[9] A dead twin, instead of being buried, is put in a box which is placed in a tree far away from the village. Every year the river changes its course, eating into its banks in order to reach the tree containing the body, and this continues until it reaches its goal and sweeps away tree and coffin. 966 [823]

Childhood Instruction

When working in the field, an anthropologist almost inevitably concentrates upon ceremonials and other epochs in an individual's life, to the detriment of the daily routine which in Bella Coola, as everywhere else, is fundamentally important although it defies description on account of its intangibility. A child grows up in a large house, occupied by several families, in which there is little privacy. The parents provide food and clothing, but more distant relatives take a greater share of responsibility for this than do white people. When food is being given out, a child soon learns that he will be given some of it, and that he will have his portion in any distribution of presents. Furniture, bedding, and other necessities are reduced to a minimum, but a boy or girl is welcome to sleep with relatives should his own parents wish to go hunting or fishing. The sense of power possessed by a Bella Coola with many relations is largely intangible, but it has practical applications as 114 855 [867] [867]

[9] It is probable that the arduous life led by a twin and its parents during the first year after birth lessens its chances of survival. Needless to say, this explanation does not find favour with the Bella Coola.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEB Bellacoola NEB

855 well, and these are soon learnt by the child who is fortunate [847] enough to have many kinsmen. Primarily, responsibility rests with the parents for the care and support of their offspring, but they have the advice, assistance, and material aid of their relatives. Nor are these limited to the near kindred of either father or mother; all members of the ancestral family take their part. Housemates, also, even if unrelated, take an interest in any child who shares their habitation, irrespective of his rank.

Much of the care bestowed on children is of a magical nature and must be reserved until a later chapter. Little boys 868 follow their fathers on hunting expeditions and so acquire knowledge by practical experience, as do girls from their mothers with regard to household tasks and feminine occupations.
867 Even small children are quick to notice the attention paid to the orders of chiefs, and carry out their commands without demur. A disobedient child is beaten or thrown into cold 861 water; the parents usually act in such cases, though a near relative does not hesitate to do so, especially if he is a chief.
857 Like all other children, Bella Coola boys and girls are fond of 867 stories and listen eagerly to the tales told in the long evenings by some old man or woman. Many of these are somewhat 538 obscene, but they serve to teach much ancient lore, and at the same time to emphasize many taboos and restrictions which are thus assimilated without definite schooling. They illu-
[626] trate the laws of morality, as does the public disapproval shown to anyone who infringes some point of etiquette or behaviour.
[825] If a child makes fun of a cat-fish or a bull-head, he is not told to stop doing so; instead, one of his elders tells him how, in the distant past, there was a famine, and advises him not to scoff at the fish which alone saved his ancestors from starvation at that time. If a rude little boy laughs at a maimed or deformed [732] man, he is told of Ałałał, a Bella Bella urchin who repeatedly mocked a one-eyed man and presently, himself, lost the sight of an eye.

867 "Don't laugh at cripples, blind people, or those who are poverty-stricken," say the elders. "If you do, you will become like them yourself."

As a boy grows older, his father insists that he wash, pray, and practise other ritual acts likely to win approval from supernatural beings. He is frequently beaten to inure him to hardship. By the time a youth is eleven or twelve years of age he has become fully acquainted with the principles of the patriarch system and a wise parent teaches him to remember debts. Taking his son to some quiet spot in the woods, he makes a small bundle of cedar twigs, for example, and tells him:

"So-and-so at Bella Bella gave you fifteen beaver skins. When you see this bundle you must think of those skins."

Then he takes another bunch, perhaps of spruce twigs, to represent a present from a Kitsilas Inlet chief. A bundle of nettle fibre may stand for a Kitsequit debt; one ornamented with a tuft of undyed cedar-bark, a gift from a Tsi'ts chief; a solid piece of alder stem, a local debt; another section of alder stem with a notch in it, another local debt, and so on. The son is expected to listen attentively, and to repeat after his father what each represents. Then the pupil turns his back and the instructor alters the positions of the bundles. His father tells him to look at them and repeat what each signifies. This is repeated time after time until a boy becomes familiar with remembering debts by means of symbols. In later years, if he becomes a chief, he will use this method for keeping his indebtedness in mind. No system of conventional signs has been evolved, each individual merely designates what he wishes by a mark which he alone can recognize.

A child grows up in the community, absorbing information and law without conscious effort, learning the activities which he will later practise, fearing the supernatural beings that are dreaded by his parents, marvelling at the power of those endowed with supernatural ability, and generally fitting himself for the struggle of life. If his parents are wealthy, he may be fortunate enough to be given a noble name and to partake in [illegible] initiation perfection, but he cannot himself carry out a cere[illegible] many until he has reached manhood.

Puberty Rites

[illegible] The change from childhood to adult age is, of course, more obvious with girls than with boys, and the former alone must observe strict taboos. Menstrual blood, like that which follows delivery, is unclean, especially that contrast on the first discharge. A woman who has just given birth is a cousin; an adolescent girl, a spoiled, that is, "A Person Not Fully Developed"; the attitude with which the former is regarded is bold, to a lesser extent, for the latter.

[illegible]

As the first indication, the girl who a woman to inform her mother of her condition, and goes home immediately if she happens to be away at the time. The parents at once make a small enclosure or bedroom of plastic or matting in either of the front corners of the house, providing it with a cupboard and bedding by which she can leave without passing through the front door. There the girl must lie for four days, with legs close together and lean on the knees, never stretched out straight. She is not allowed to drink anything, and must not sprinkle. If she should consume much food, she would be greatly when an adult. When necessary for her to leave the enclosure, a woman must always accompany her. The mother, or some other female relative, provides her with the usual soft-rubber back pads. On the fifth day, she leaves her shelter early in the morning with one feminine friend and goes to a secluded pool back in the forest, where she washes for the first time. Then she runs rapidly through the woods, which has the effect of making her a strong woman. Should a girl fail to do this, she would be afflicted with an illness caused by the salmon, become blind, and die young.

[illegible] For one year an adolescent girl is subject to many restrictions. The near approach to the river would affect the salmon and cause them to avoid Bella Coola, so she is not allowed to draw water, or even to appear on the beach. She may not use the front door facing the river, but has to leave the house through the way towards the enclosure where she sleeps. The Bella Coola consider it unthinkable for a girl to disregard these prohibitions, but if this should happen, she would be chased home by her parents, by the Guardian of the River, or, in fact, by any elderly member of the community. The strongest reason for respecting these regulations is the belief that the shadows bringe death; no one knows how it is inflicted, but a useless girl can die. During this period the women are fresh salmon, though she is allowed them if they have been smoked for four or five days. The scanty meals are brought to her in the enclosure where she is virtually a prisoner. It is true that she can leave it and wander in the woods, but her companions avoid her as being in an unclean condition of which they are afraid, and she is barred from taking part in all activities by the river which constitute so large a part of the life of the Bella Coola. A girl cannot pick berries during this time, as no more would grow in the valley which she had thus tilled; she must not touch anyone, nor allow anyone to touch her; she must not pass in front of a man; she must go to bed before everyone else in the house, and to the bed to match. The danger of breaking some taboo is so great that it is safer for a girl to remain within her enclosure where her mother, and other old women, gather to tell her the many things which it is fitting for an adult woman to know. This seclusion is not pleasant, but it unquestionably serves to emphasize the importance of mature life to which it is a prelude. The writer remembers on occasion when a Bella Coola family was using very fresh salmon while one of the daughters, who had recently reached adolescence, watched anxiously. Her grandfather was and gave the child an orange, something that in his youth little girls did not receive such dainties to sweetness their lot.

Adolescent girls wear certain distinctive articles of clothing and ornaments. The most noticeable is a skullcap beaded with grass. This is the only time in a woman's life that a hat is worn. She also wears earrings, each consisting of a cone bands of four concentric-shaped shells, probably Tonatiuh, which are said to have been imported from the north in early times. These marks serve to indicate the position of the girl, who is both feared and respected, possessed of supernatural power, and yet beneficial. Many Hopi Clans evolve despite how adolescent girls have been able to vanquish supernatural beings; perhaps the most striking of these is the manner in which they were saved manifest when the sun came too close to the earth. At the end of a year, or eleven months according to one old woman, the seclusion is terminated, and the girl resumes her normal activities. The first time she goes to the river she must throw on the water four pieces of food, and four pieces of unfired coiled-cloth. This is especially important if the salmon are running at the time, although no explanation of this ritual is given.

The assumption of her freedom indicates that a girl has reached marriageable age. Clans sometimes confine their daughters for even longer than a year, and usually delay their marriages for several years to demonstrate their importance, but this is not necessary, and is a practice to other than wealthy individuals. It is not uncommon for a girl to wed before her year is over, in fact one her restrictions automatically lapse. Clans never allow such a curtailment for their daughters, as it would diminish the prestige of the latter, and be detrimental to the status of their children when they marry and have families. Their intercourse with a suitable adolescent is considered not only illegal but disgusting as well. Between the period of confinement and marriage, intercourse is prohibited and guarded against by the parents of a girl, but is not considered immoral and seems to have been fairly common in former times with the daughters of poor people and slaves. This sanctions took place before the first menstruation in spite of the disapproval with which this was regarded.

Although the menstrual blood which appears at the first discharge is considered more beneficial than that emitted on later occasions, it is always regarded as unsavory or unclean. It is the most famous of all substances, and, therefore, a potent protection against supernatural beings. It is valuable as a defense against evil monsters, but it is equally deadly to demons and other human beings with supernatural powers. In the distant past, Raven taught mankind that to sleep with a menstruating woman would so blind a man that he would be unsuccessful in hunting. The belief is that animals, knowing everything that takes place, avoid one who is so unclean. One old man mentioned that he had failed to obey this injunction and considered it loss of virility as a punishment, overlooking the fact that he was over seventy years of age.

The coming of adolescence in a boy is recognized by change in voice and another usual indications. He is neither taboo nor unclean, so consequently does not have to undergo any restrictions in his actions. There is no ceremony to mark the entry of a positive adult membership of the tribe; instead, the coming puberty is no more than an indication of increasing age and strength.

Marriage

Like most so-called "primitive" peoples, the Bella Coola regard the married state as the normal condition of man. Persons unwilling to wed is considered unnatural. Since the number of the sexes is approximately equal, the only persons forced to live alone are elderly widows and widowers, and those crippled, either mentally or physically. Such individuals are looked upon as unfortunate; in fact, they have failed in one of the most fundamental of life's struggles. Men provide fish and game, build houses and canoes, while women collect berries, make tobacco, cooks, and perform the multitudinous small housekeeping.

"Is it not better benefit of each to marry?" say the Bella Coola.

Marriage is not a mere economic arrangement, nor is its sole function to regulate relations between the sexes. Its most important force is that it governs the status of the child.

[581] [151] Confidently believing that he has descended from ancestors who came to this earth in the beginning of time, a Bella Coola wishes to have his children firmly established in the path of his forbears. This can be accomplished only with the aid of a suitable mother. It follows that marriage is not primarily a matter of affection, but of the ancestral eligibility of the contracting parties.

CHOICE OF MATE

[564] [58] Since the initiative for marriage is taken by the man in almost all cases, it will be convenient and proper to describe the factors which enter into the search for a wife, remembering that the concerns govern the decision of the woman and her relatives. The choice of the woman who is to be the mother of the children who will carry on the traditions of the ancestral family is a matter of no great importance to be entrusted to any young person. Accordingly, while their son is yet a child, his parents often discuss who would be a suitable wife for him. They view the matter from a strictly business standpoint. [581] Proud of their own ancient lineage, they would not demean themselves by allowing their son to marry a girl who could not trace her ancestry back to the first people, or with one whose forbears had disgraced themselves by marriage with slaves. Instead, it is a matter of pride for parents to have as daughter-in-law the child of a powerful chief. Nor can they choose a [582] woman too closely related to their son. Marriage with a sister, or aunt, a niece, or any first cousin is strictly prohibited. No reason for these laws could be obtained; the Bella Coola consider that it would be "indecent" or unclean so to marry, but have theorized no further about the matter. An adopted child is regarded in the same light as an own child. The Bella Coola [577] [526] [171] know, and are amused by, the regulation of marriage according to totem among the northern tribes, but practise nothing of the same nature themselves. In fact, marriages usually take place among those who are descended from one ancestor and who have, accordingly, the same crest, though the significance of the sons is very different from its use among the northern tribes.

3:46 Dewalt E-5 (1922-1924)948

Having eliminated those girls who are too closely related, or who are omitted on account of the poverty of their parents, the father and mother can concentrate on others of about the same age as their son. The most desirable is a member of the ancestral family of one of the parents. This obviates the dangers and difficulties of marriage with a stranger, and any children will be born into the close-knit circle of related ancestors stretching back to the beginning of time. They consider that such a child is fortunate, as if he were held close to the spiritual embrace of his powerful forefathers of antiquity. Each ancestral family is jealously proud of its ancient traditions and prerogatives, and as some of these are maintained at marriage, it follows that a mating within its ranks is desirable from a business standpoint. Moreover, it is recognized that the husband obtains more prestige than the wife at the wedding and that her relatives are more likely to be generous when their son-in-law is one to whom they are related. Indeed, some ancestral families are as "stingy," (to use the Bella Coola expression), that for generations they have habitually married endogamously. In such cases it is not unknown for the children of first cousins to mate, though this is usually regarded as not quite proper. The most common marriages are between the great-children and great-great-children of first cousins, or between the child and great-child of a first cousin when of suitable age. According to mythology, unions have sometimes taken place between brother and sister in order to preserve the traditions within the family, and it appears highly probable that marriages have occasionally occurred between first cousins, although no specific instance of this could be learned. As long as the laws against incest are observed, any girl of appropriate age who is addressed as nemas (1, p. 122) is a fit person. Since ancestral families have usually become localized in certain villages, there is a strong leaning to local endogamy, though this is not compulsory. The restrictions on marriage are of a bilateral nature, and the preferences are equally bilateral, with a tendency to become patrilineal, in accordance with the patrilineal tendency of the ancestral family as already described.

[illegible] (1922-1924) 1968
[illegible]

Although these considerations greatly restrict the selection of a suitable daughter-in-law, a number of choices always remain. The parents of the prospective bridegroom consider the material advantages of each of them. Since the ability of a man to give potlatches depends largely on the wealth contributed by his wife's matrilineal family, she parents eliminate a girl whose brothers are lazy. Moreover, they know that their son's children will receive prerogatives from their maternal grandparents, hence it is desirable to choose those who have great Bella Coola dances, or other valuable rights. Personal names are not so important, because these are the personal property of all members of the ancestral family. A great consideration is the industriousness of the girl herself, though this is of less moment than the working-ability of her father and brothers. Marriage was discussed with a very old man who had had four wives. After describing the disposition of the four, he continued:

"My last wife was by far the best. Her family gave me many presents."

Frequently the choice of a wife is simplified by an institution which may be termed "return marriage." If, for example, a few generations ago a woman was married into another ancestral family, or into a distant branch of her own, it was considered proper for a man of her family to marry a wife a woman of the family into which she had married. During the previous wedding then the woman's family bestowed much wealth and valuable prerogatives, it is proper that the latter should be returned to the ancestral family of their owners. A return marriage also binds two families together, with consequent strength to the children. A few examples will make the matter clear.

In the beginning of time it is believed that a son of [illegible] married the daughter of a [illegible] chief ([illegible], p. [illegible]). He from the brought her husband several [illegible] names, which were transmitted in time to her children and which remained in [illegible]'s home, [illegible], for many generations. The [illegible] believe that it was remembered for hundreds of years that these designations did not belong there. Whenever one was conferred, the earth was mounted to tell how it first came to [illegible], whereas in [illegible] when the earth from which the name were taken was stated, it was always added that there to position could not be said since they were now in [illegible]. About one hundred and fifty years ago, [illegible], a [illegible] woman, was married to a [illegible] man in order to repay the debt, and remain friendly between the two villages. The [illegible] to know the names long ago brought from [illegible]. Similarly, if any name or other prerogative of an ancestral earth has been discovered from the ancestral family to which it belongs, a father searches for a woman who will be able to receive it in his son as a marriage gift. The word used for searching is "hunt," the term applied to nothing for hearing animals.

The accompanying pedigree illustrates a return marriage. [illegible]'s daughter was married to a [illegible] man and took with her as dower several [illegible] name and other prerogatives. The son of these was remembered and they were brought back by the marriage of [illegible], a member of [illegible]'s ancestral family, with a daughter of the woman who had gone to [illegible]. Usually several generations elapse before a return marriage is made. This incident was perfectly well known to the son of [illegible].

If parents who are seeking a wife for their son have also a daughter approaching marriageable age, they may try to avoid a later return marriage by arranging that their daughter shall be married to a brother, or other near relative, of their son's wife. Exchange marriage was formerly more common than [illegible] as possible, though even more is considered highly desirable. The sentiment is that already described: the more closely the parents are bound together by ties of common ancestry, the greater will be their children ceremonial strength. Further, reciprocal alliances of this type obviate all danger of feuds, since certain marriages are so required.

In recent years it has become fashionable, or socially "smart," with some Bella Coola families to seek wives from unrelated ancestral families, and even from other tribes. It is said that this practice was initiated by Pathc, an important chief who died between 1870 and 1880. He sought foreign marriages on account of dispensations which were brought to dowers by his wives, and considered that such rights, transmissible to his children, more than compensated for the lack of strength provided by other ancestors. Many have followed his example, with the result that some ancestral families have entirely abandoned the exogamic tendency. Boas (p. 154) has made the same observation. Although this exogamic principle is directly contrary to that which has already been described, one is should bearing that each has the same explanation—the search for wife able to bring most to her or her authors children.

Should the parents consider a foreign woman as wife for their son, then her worth is discussed from every angle. One woman may have the right to good hunting grounds, the family of another may bestowe valuable coast prerogatives, a third some factor-ries. Serious thought is put on the relative values of these. One has had heard of the French system of dot, and emphasized simply how far superior to, and more sensible is was than the Coolian practice. In recent years the younger Bella Coola has been arranging their own marriages, and the elder men insist bitterly that they are influenced only by the beauty of working ability of the girl, not by her real worth, the prerogatives which she can bring to her children.

Although parents consider chiefly the ancestry of their future daughter-in-law, yet they are not entirely oblivious to the girl herself. She must be of about the same age as their son, preferably a year or two older. Should the wife be the younger, it is thought that she ages rapidly until she appears as old as her husband. Boys usually marry at seventeen or eighteen, and it is essential that the woman chosen for wife must have been concealed for at least a year following puberty. Nor is a weakly girl chosen, or one of notoriously bad temper. As their son reaches the age of marriage, his parents usually consult him, though it is not usual for him to primary their wishes. A girl who has been leading a notoriously lax life is not desired, though this is most unusual for the daughter of a chief. The feeling is that such a girl would be a faithless and fickle wife, rather than any objection to her sins as such.

[582]

Realizing the importance of marriage, the parents of a boy discuss and plan the event for years, weighing the relative value of girls whom they think they could obtain for their son. By the time he has reached the age of fourteen or fifteen, they have decided on the most suitable partner, and it then becomes necessary to consult her parents and win their approval.

584

PERIOD OF ENGAGEMENT

When the parents of the young man (whom it will be convenient to term X) have at last decided on a suitable partner, they next choose an intermediary for the first proposal. In all these discussions the elderly relatives of the parents take a leading part, and especially their own parents if alive. Sometimes X's father himself interviews the father of the girl (here termed Y), at other times he asks some friend to do so. The matter is not supposed to be generally known, and the intermediary goes to Y's father's house, and quietly tells his parents that X's family would like their daughter to become X's wife. This preliminary asking is done unostentatiously, at any time and in any place, and the messenger withdrawn after giving his message. In all probability Y's family have already en-

584 cional information of the proposed marriage, but they always plead ignorance, and deliberate for several days. Y's parents and other relatives take part in the discussion, and Y herself may likewise be taken into confidence. Although a daughter has, theoretically, little choice, in practice she exercises a great deal of influence. The mother and father weigh the suitor's eligibility not only with regard to wealth and ancestral pretensions, but consider his character. An immoral young man is not desirable, though neither is one who is impotent.

[581] If Y's relatives agree to the proposal, some one of them informs the intermediary, or X's father, and the young people are considered to be engaged. The fact is supposed to be kept secret for several days, although the news usually becomes known sooner. X's relatives as soon as possible take a number of presents to Y's family. These are given in private, and are termed "secret gifts"; they are said to give strength to the future children. Since no witnesses are present it follows that no social prestige accrues from the transaction. The relatives included in the "family" of either X or Y are not always the same; uncles, aunts, grandparents, may or may not take part in the giving and receiving of presents, the parents alone always do so. Sometimes distant relatives take a leading part in the arrangements, either in hope of receiving valuable gifts, or of obtaining social influence by lavish giving. If X's relatives have reason to believe that Y's family will accept their proposal, several of them may go in company and actually carry the "secret gifts" to Y's house at the time of making the first proposal. Should this be rejected, they merely carry away their goods, and as the affair has been private, no one's vanity is hurt.

583 584

The acceptance of "secret gifts" binds the engagement of X and Y, but a few days elapse before this is made public. If X's family is wealthy, his father, or other near relative, personally invites all the inhabitants of the village to his house. The singers, in their usual sections behind the fire, strike up the tune of some feasting and the owner of the song, then warned, dances to come to it. Using their own discretion, the musicians proceed to beat out the time for dasiai after dasiai, and each performs. In like fashion they then beat out the time of one wandi after another, and each member of that society gives his dance. Since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is non-sacred. The singers consult with the host as to the number of songs to be used. When they stop at last, X's father, aided by his younger relatives, gives valuable presents of food. No mention of the coming marriage is made, but the dasi gives the donor an opportunity of displaying his generosity as a chief and indirectly increases the importance of the wedding because the value of the food will have to remunerated in connection with it.

582 584 585 586

If X's father is very wealthy, he may recall the people for several nights, always providing the same type of entertainment, and always giving food. He uses his own judgment as to the number of such entertainments, but at that which he decides shall be the last, he announces:

"Tomorrow we shall go to Y's father's house."[1]

If X's father does not wish to give away such large quantities of food he may unite the dancing in his own house and make this announcement at a potlatch, a dasiai dance,[1] or any other public gathering. But the more elaborate the ceremonial, the greater is the importance of the marriage in the eyes of the Bella Coola, which in turn increases the strength of the children who may result from it.

On the morning after this declaration, X's father calls to his house those whom he wishes to be witnesses of the alliance that has been planned. These include as many of his relatives and those of his wife as he desires, and often intimate friends. These individuals comprise the group interested, on behalf of X, in the marriage; they provide the goods which are given for him, and receive the presents from the corresponding group of Y's relatives. Anyone having the necessary financial ability is glad of the opportunity to demonstrate it, but a poor man can decline without loss of social status.

Carrying presents, the specific value of which is immaterial, they set out for Y's house. The father, accompanied by his relatives, has been warned and is waiting at the door. A herald, or other eloquent speaker, addresses them on behalf of Y's father. He says in effect:

"We do not come secretly or wrongfully to steal something from you. We come with the fairest intentions. Great is our affection for your child. When we are about to do [illegible] long been a practice of our two families (if the two families have intermarried in past generations), let us do according to our wishes. I am the opening."[1]

Then Y's father throws on the ground several stones, representing those who will have to give to Y's relatives. These are said to "open the door," that is, to make clear the entrance of Y and his relatives into Y's house. There is the added sign: Stones that they once upon a time used the children whom it is hoped will result from the marriage. This thought finds expression in many rites both during engagement and at the wedding ceremony itself. After throwing the stones, Y's father gives gifts to Y, to her father, her mother, and to her other relatives assembled. These are of such great value that Y's father sometimes almost impoverishes himself, but he knows that though these will never actually be returned, Y's family will be proud to uphold their dignity, and the importance of Y, by equally lavish gifts.

Y's father now invites his guests to enter his house, and adjourn them to their duly reserved seats where the food that has been prepared is served with all solemnity in the usual food-boxes. Then Y's family give presents to Y's family, that is to all who have come to share in the marriage. These goods are known as "working clothes"; they are usually of less value

[1] Opening, literally: The term is applied to the stone, because in Y's house and, that is, has a double significance, in opening the way to the marriage and during the gift to the Green children.

[illegible]

that the presents just given by X's relatives, though necessarily they may exceed them. Y's father, or a herald, or an elsewhere friend on his behalf, speaks to the following effect: [illegible]

"Be bold. Henceforth you will have to work a very long time for us. We will let you know when we need your services."

The significance of this speech lies in the fact that X, and to a certain extent his relatives, are expected to perform almost menial tasks for Y's father during the period of engagement, which has now been duly verified. Y's father and his followers now leave Y's house. It is immaterial whether or not X and Y themselves have been present. It is important that this formal acknowledgment of the engagement should take place during the day, otherwise any children resulting from the marriage would be shamed by having it said to them: "Your parents were not married in the open light of day." [illegible]

For a varying length of time X now acts almost as a servant to Y's father. He does not live with her family, but he cuts wood, draws water, and performs other menial tasks. Whenever a member of X's family gives a ceremony, he takes care to give lavish presents to Y's relatives. If it is impossible to hold a sacred rite, Y's father is no longer expected to invite Y's family to a ceremonial feast, and she is shown with them any grace that he may will. Meanwhile, X and Y are not subject to any restrictions as to seeing each other. In theory if they should subsequently wish "quit" the engagement, but in practice where this occurs, as it often does, the matter is simply hushed up. [illegible]

Children whose parents were long engaged are said to be "heavy"; their entry into life having been prepared with careful thought and due ceremony, as their death-birds are chosen to travel with success to the position of chief. When such a child is born, the relatives are eager to call their fellow-villagers to render a name-gift after birth, and the father starts life with this advantage. There is no specific length of time for engagements; if X and Y are the children of influential chiefs, the [illegible]

584 preliminary agreement may have been made while they were only seven or eight years old, though marriage seldom occurs before the age of seventeen or eighteen. More often the agreement is made when X and Y have passed the age of puberty, and they wait for about two years before marrying.

583 Throughout this period, X's relatives are expected to give at 425 least one feast at which Y's relatives are the guests of honour, 553 and always receive presents. At one of these times X's father, 584 with the concurrence of his relatives, may mark his approval of the coming event by bestowing on Y's father, or one of her other relatives, an ancestral name from his family myth. This does not become the absolute property of Y's family, since the myth in which it is embedded does not belong to them, unless, of course, they are members of the same ancestral family. It is fitting that a name of this kind be bestowed by the recipient on one of Y's children, or returned to X's family a few generations later by a return marriage. If this is not done, in course of time the designation is apt to be regarded by Y's family as their own. If there are no children, Y's relatives should give back the name to X's
[527] family, but there are many instances of feuds caused by failure
[773] to do so. According to mythology, prerogatives may sometimes be given outright, without thought of their use by the resultant children, or of their being restored by return marriages. It is claimed that the people of the Kimsquit River
[548] have, through such a present, the inalienable title to use a certain spot in the Kitlala River for their chiefs' rest, and likewise the Kitlala people have an irrevocable right to the Kimsquit name Sathong. These two prerogatives were transferred at the beginning of time. At present, anyone bestowing outright his family prerogatives would be considered weak-[970] minded and the other members of the ancestral family would unanimously object. Considerations of this sort make it desirable to seek a wife within the ranks of the ancestral family.

During the period of engagement, Y's family may present a name, or names, to X's father, with the same conditions as those just described.

HRA Collection NEB

these just described. The giving of these at this time is not obligatory, nor does it affect the validity of the coming marriage. It is merely a mark of friendly feeling between the two groups of relatives, and, by adding to the importance of the event, increases the potential strength of the unborn children. [58]

If either X or Y should die during the period of engagement, the presents, or their equivalent, must be returned to the donors. No formal methods are employed to ensure this, but the force of public opinion suffices to compel a man to do that which is proper, in fact, he is anxious to do so. If Y should die, an effort is made to replace her with a sister, cousin, or other near relative, so that the friendly relations entered upon by the two families may not be lost. The gifts mutually given by the two families may be returned and re-donated or the relatives simply take Y's place without further arrangement. Sometimes, in spite of the wishes of their parents and the elaborate rites carried out, either X or Y breaks the engagement by going to live with somebody else. It is then a mark of pride for the family of the offender to return the gifts they have received, and almost equally a mark of honour for the aggrieved party to give back what has been bestowed upon them, in order to demonstrate how little value they place on the possession of goods. [58½] [59] [59½]

Though a lengthy engagement is desirable, it may be curtailed. If, for example, one of X's relatives should die before the usual period has elapsed, Y's father may suggest an immediate wedding. He knows that X's family will have heavy expenses in connection with the burial and mourning rites, hence it is courteous to offer a quick marriage with the financial advantages accruing to them at the ceremony. In this case, X either does not work at all for Y's family, or for only a short time. Moreover, if Y reaches marriageable age without her father receiving suitable proposals, he can himself take the initiative by consulting the parents of an eligible young man. If the suggestion is agreeable, the engagement is announced in the manner already described, and the marriage takes place [64]

584 as soon as possible. Though strictly legal, and commonly practised even long ago, this is not considered a desirable proceeding, since the children lack the strength which would have been theirs if their parents had been long engaged. In recent years the custom of short engagements has become popular, though the older Bella Coola feel resentment, saying that the woman is simply "bought" with goods or money at the actual wedding. The return of such sums in due course does not compensate for the omission of the lengthy period of engagement. A few years ago a powerful chief even "bought" husbands for his grand-daughters. His influence was so great that by bestowing large sums on the families of the youths they accepted the young women as wives. The girls in question were desirable in every way, according to Bella Coola standards, but by marrying without a long engagement and suitable presents the husbands, and their families, failed to live up to the dignity of their ancestry. These are breakings down of the ancient rites, and as such are lamented by the older people.

583 584 Sometimes, despite the wishes of their parents, a boy and girl announce their desire to marry by living together. After much scanning, the parents usually decide to make the best of a bad business by performing the marriage rites as soon as possible and by lavish expenditure on them to lessen the impediment placed against the future offspring by lack of long engagement of their parents. But such a child can never be called an alpm, which has the significance of something good that has long been sought for, such as a smoothed-grained tree that carpenters like. It will thus be seen that the marriage ceremony must be carried out, irrespective of whether or not it has been preceded by a lengthy period of engagement in which the first proposal was made by the boy's family, by a shorter one in which the girl's family took the initiative, or by no period of engagement whatever. These rites can now be described.

MARRIAGE RITES

Y's family decide when the period of engagement shall be 584 terminated. Although it is considered undignified for X or his relatives to hurry them in this matter, there is always a certain amount of urging. Y's father has strong reasons for procrastination. A long engagement strengthens the status of the children whom his daughter may bear, and besides, he frequently receives presents from X's relatives. As Y's relatives will have to bear the heavier part of the expenses of the wedding, it may be necessary for them to delay it for years while saving the requisite goods. The ceremony may take 585 place at any time of the year. Foreign guests are occasionally invited, but usually only the members of X's and Y's village are present. If the marriage should be with the child of a foreign chief his relatives and friends are present to take part. When Y's relatives decide that they are ready, they choose the actual day after consultation with X's family, though the assumption is that Y's father merely informs X's father of the date.

It is incumbent on X's family to proclaim the event on the 585 day preceding the ceremony. In the late afternoon his father 203 sends a herald through the village calling out:

"Qwiwap, ye chiefs! Qwiwap, ye wives of chiefs! Qwiwap, ye commoners!"

The actual meaning of qwiwap is unknown, though it is well understood to be an invitation to gather for the announcement of a wedding. In conjunction with the summons, X's [551] ceremonial name is used, although all in the village are probably well aware of what is about to take place. It is noteworthy 585 that at a marriage the guests, as well as the participants, are called by the ceremonial names, as opposed to the kaciut names [551] by which individuals who own such are generally known. Red [302] coloring is much in evidence at weddings; heralds smear their faces with red paint and the guests similarly tint themselves. They wear collars, wristlets, and anklets of undyed cedar-bark, [301] and cover themselves with eagle down.

585 In the gathering dusk all assemble in X's house; Y's relatives attend or not as they wish. X's father would feel insulted if anyone else should stay away without a valid excuse, but in point of fact everyone is eager for an evening's entertainment. The singers take their accustomed places behind the fire and the guests arrange themselves in the house without reference to rank. The musicians strike up the kwiat song of anyone present, and the person so indicated dances. The first tune used is frequently that of X's father, and then that of his mother, but there is no fixed rule about this. The singers choose and beat out tune after tune, and guest after guest dances, but, since none of the supernatural beings is present, the affair is of a non-sacred nature. After exhausting the most popular kwiat songs, the musicians beat out the nsaok songs of many of the guests who, in succession, dance to them; the songs of shamans are used in like fashion. Sometimes the singers continue until everyone present has danced, at other times they curtail the ceremony, as they think fit. When they decide to stop, they intimate this to X's father, who superintends the distribution to the guests of whatever kind of food has been provided.

[535]

During the meal, a fluent speaker stands up and expounds on behalf of X's father the ancestral myth in which his son's ancestral name is embodied. Sometimes X's father acts as his own orator, but usually a herald is called upon. Only sufficient details are given to show the importance of X. The myth may either be one of the most ancient type dealing with the first settlement of this earth, or one of later date describing the exploits of X's famous ancestors; but in either case, as shown by the examples given in the last chapter, each contains an account of a marriage. It is always known, although not generally described, that at each of these several dancers performed, their number varying between two and eighteen. The orator, when outlining the myth, stresses this part of it, and always announces how many danced at that time; with the statement that there will be a like number on the morrow. In the same manner the fluent speaker outlines a myth belonging to the ancestral family of X's mother, again with emphasis on the dancers used by her ancestors. X, as a member of both ancestral families, can combine his rights from both sides, but it is customary for him to use no more than five or six performers. Should X have no claim to this privilege from either mother or father, an almost unthinkable situation, he is able to borrow the prerogative of using some from friends. The sentiment on which this oration of myths is based is the one so often mentioned; it marks the close relationship between the future children and their noble ancestors of old, a source of strength to the former. 537 585 [426]

X's father now names those whom he wishes to assist him on the following day. These are the dancers, who are chosen primarily for their skill in dancing, and secondarily in accordance with their rank. With them he selects a number of persons to stand near and help or "cherish" them as they perform. He also asks the services of some of the women who are professional droners; of the keeper of the marriage song of his ancestral family; and, finally, of a number of men to sit near the singers and assist them with suggestions. It would be most exceptional for anyone so called upon to decline the honour. It is near morning by this time and the guests depart. 585 [595] [614]

On the following morning, the actual wedding day, X's father calls to his house those selected the previous evening as dancers and their assistants. The former wear blankets decorated with small copper ornaments[8] and carry circular wooden rattles provided with handles. Their clothing and rattles may be their own, but if they do not possess suitable attire, it is incumbent on X's father to provide them. Skins are piled up within the house, and some of these are said to "make soft the [534]

[8]At the present time there is uncertainty as to the proper clothing of a marriage dancer. Several informants stated that it was a copper-decorated blanket, whereas others said that there was no special attire; one man claimed that an attempt was made to imitate the form and costume of X's first ancestor, and another that casual costume was used. Probably there was no uniformity in custom. [292] [535] [184]

585 handles of the rattles"; symbolizing that they are made to protect the hands, though the dancers derive no benefit from the palm, which are stacked with others for later distribution to Y's family. A large amount of provisions has been prepared and placed in boxes, one for each member of Y's family. In many cases it is difficult to estimate how much food will be required, and if there is a surplus, it is eaten by the performers and other ministers.

When all are ready they rush forth; dancers, dancers' ministers, and young relatives of X, followed more sedately by his father. The rest of the villagers watch with interest, but do not take part in the ceremony. Choosing a position outside Y's house, the singers beat the time of the marriage [533] song used by X's ancestors; if the words are known they sing [424] them. Like the prerogative of marriage dances, there may [426] not be a marriage song embodied in every origin myth, but if X lacks such he is usually able to borrow one.[9] The keeper of the song is stationed near the singers, ready to help them with the words or the tune, if necessary. Meanwhile the [535] dancers are performing on the sidewalk outside Y's house. Each uses whatever type of dance he chooses, facial, sexual, o'ali, or even shaman's, but all dance simultaneously, though without paying greater attention to each other than is necessary to avoid collisions. The professional dancers ac- [533] company the singing with their high-pitched quavers.

Meanwhile Y's father, surrounded by his relatives and friends, waits in readiness within their house. Y herself is

[9] The reported origin of marriage songs has been described in vol. 1, chap. vi. They are less strongly preserved as prerogatives than some elements of origin myths. In fact some keepers of the songs are willing to perform at any wedding, although this may be a modern development. The keeper, either man or woman, is chosen by the senior members of the ancestral family, after discussion with the singers. It is his duty to remember text and tune, and the only pecuniary advantage is from the presents made by those to whom he teaches it. Some songs have words, others only a tune. The tune of a song brought down by Algaxstan is made of so-

[614] "Hello, friendship! We do as we have done before. Please make good the path for those who are about to marry."

Algaxstan obtained this song from his heavenly ancestor and used it at his own marriage, as his male descendants have since done.

dum, taking as inconspicuous a part as X does in the whole affair. As the singers start the marriage song, some of X's relatives carry into Y's house a part of the goods which X's relatives have assumed for the occasion, deposit them on the floor near the door, and then withdraw. These goods are said, "to sweep the house." Long ago they are said to have been of great value, though nowadays small presents are considered ample. Any member of Y's family can accept one by picking it from the floor, but he is expected to return the gift with something of greater value, sometimes nothing is taken. Should none of his relatives appear willing to do so, it devolves on Y's father to accept the present.

When the marriage song has ended, X's father gives to some strong youth narrow strips of gunnies with the wool still attached. Carrying these in one hand the young man runs up and down the sidewalk, waving his arms, and at intervals throwing one of the strips into the air, away from himself. All the younger people of the village pursue him, and a wild scramble takes place for each strip. Sometimes, instead of running up and down, the running is done in a clear space near Y's house. Only the sons of important chiefs are prohibited from this sport, since it is thought to be beneath their dignity. It is an animated scene, in which the participants thoroughly enjoy themselves. Should have the right to ask any dancer for his clothing, and unless he is willing to lose this, he must give a present to the one who has demanded it. This is a constant source of amusement to the onlookers. Nothing is known of the origin or meaning of the wholesale giving away of strips of gunnies, nor why the lowville should be able to demand clothing on this occasion.

"It has always been done," the Bella Coola say simply.

When the noise has somewhat subsided, the singers again beat out the time of the marriage song, and again the dancers begin to perform. Y's father then sends out one of his male relatives, with gifts, "to stop the dance." The latter gives a present to one of the dancers, who ceases his gyrations, then [illegible] to the others in succession. If Ø's father is not wealthy, he may dispense with presents to the dancers, who bring some of their own accord. When the song is finished, more strips of green skin are thrown to the women already described. Then the song is sung for the third time, accompanied by the dancers who have not been "stopped" by the receipt of gifts. Again Ø's father's friend brings out presents to "stop" more of the dancers. After another dispense of green skin, and a fourth singing, all have been "stopped." Care is taken that no man has not dancer [illegible] to accompany the fourth singing of the song.

Ø's relatives are used to valuable presents to Ø, his father, mother, and other relatives, and also to those who wish to associate themselves with Ø's father in the marriage transaction, prompted by kindly feelings towards him, or, it may be, through a desire to display publicly their wealth and importance. The number of these individuals has been commissioned secretly to Ø's kinsmen, who are then able to send a present to each, such as a canoe, a slave, a mortar, lyre, or green skin blanket, or some equally treasured object. These gifts are called "weapons of war," since the assumption is that Ø is acting like a warrior in taking something of value from Ø's family. At the same time the goods that Ø's father has given to sing the dancers are returned to him commensurately.

Ø's father now invites Ø's party into his house by calling out:

"Come women, come relatives," "Come you men-party, come on chiefs."

They go into the house and sit in a group in the place of honour behind the fire. Some of the other villagers may come in to watch, remaining near the front door, but having no part in the proceedings. Ø's father experiments a distribution of food to his guests, sometimes a lavish feast, at other times a small meal, depending on the food supply and time of year.

[illegible] In many cases, though not always, Ø's father stage a sing-sing at this juncture, emphasizing the importance of his [illegible] kin.

[illegible]

[illegible]

If a grandchild be born they will give him a certain name if a boy, or another if a girl, so that henceforth no one can take that name for himself, even though it is not in use. In already mentioned, even when a name has duly passed to one of the children it can be recalled in future generations by a return exchange. The transmission of names, or the promising of them to children yet unborn, is perhaps the most binding feature of the whole marriage rite. Mythology contains innumerable which names, and other prerogatives, have been given my moiety. Cases are cited by the Bella Coola where a father gives hunting-grounds as "food" for the use of the otherwise his son- or daughter-in-law, but it is usual merely to secure the use of them to the grandchildren.

For the transference of names, or other prerogatives, to the Tsimshian sense of Bella Coola marriages, it is necessary to digress still further in an attempt to analyze the concepts of the use of the connection. If the contracting parties are members of different unrelated families, or even of different branches of the same family, there is a feeling of strain and unfamiliarness at the intimate relations into which they are brought. There is a conflict of desires. On one hand is the wish to keep the family prerogatives from going afield; on the other, wish that they should go afield to show the respect due to a bride or bridegroom. If children result, the matter is over, since they are equally members of the unrelated families' mother and father and form a bond which draws the unrelated units into the closer community of interest. Intermarriages will then be sought by successive generations, until the prerogatives of the two families become so closely intertwined that a child will, indeed, be born into the midst of advantageous from both parents. But when there are no children the matter is complicated, since the recipients of gifts or ceremonially try to keep them entirely. They may do so with the best intentions, feeling that it would be a slight to the donors to give them back. Bella Coola etiquette is not sufficiently exact to stipulate when should be done. If the [illegible] is not concerned, the donors may be offended at its being kept. If it is concerned, they may be offended that it has not been kept.

The following example will help to explain this rather complex point.

[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] one of the family relatives was accident or [illegible]. The dance was [illegible] but none of the Bella Coola believe that it was due to one of Qaqaxa's relatives, and that the dance about [illegible] was quite sufficient to furnish an excuse for the deed.

It is hoped that these two instances will serve to emphasize why the Bella Coola prefer marriages within the ranks of the ancestral family. When the other place names are usually given outright, and are merely presented for the use of the future children.

After this digression, to return to the marriage of ♀ and ♀. The ceremony is taking place in the house of ♀'s father, and the parents of each participant have impersonated parts of their origin myths, and provided names for the resultant children.

Then ♀'s relatives give numerous presents to ♀'s family, to each one including those who are associating themselves with the contract. Canoes, slaves, blankets, and other articles of great worth are given; they are said to be "bed covering" for ♀. The greater their value, the greater her prestige. The father calls a Raven chief to address the assemblage, speaking as though he were ♀. He says to effect:

"My father, my mother, my brothers, my uncles, and their associates have given me my bed covering."

These presents are the binding factors of the wedding. They are said to lock the girl to her husband's house, and accordingly are sometimes called, "rope harnesses." This is only done when a woman is married for the first time.

Another orator now holds forth on behalf of ♀'s father:

"What we do today is in good manner. We have done today what was done in former times, and what shall be done in the future."

One of Ṽ's relatives now whispers to Ṽ's father that it is time to lead away the bride. One of Ṽ's party, either man or woman, comes forward, takes Ṽ by the hand and guides her to a place among Ṽ's people, close to Ṽ himself. Ṽ's father gives the conductor presents, which are not numerous. With, not further ceremony, Ṽ's party returns to his house, taking the bride with them. She and Ṽ usually sit down together for the rest of the day, but their actions are really of slight importance.

At least an or after the return from Ṽ's home, a messenger is sent to invite her father and other relatives to Ṽ's house. The guests are themselves behind the fire, and a number of other events is to watch and listen. Ṽ and Ṽ are both present, but do not take any leading part in the ceremony. A large amount of food is given to the guests, provided, of course, by Ṽ's father, and, as they are eating, a few gifts, termed "food," may be given. Then an elegant chief appears to take over the manner in which Ṽ's ancestors were married in the days of antiquity. As soon as his speech is ended, Ṽ's father distributes to Ṽ's relatives presents, which are spoken of as "clothing." Theoretically, the presents "become nothing" for this purpose, but in reality they are received here as a means of increasing the prestige of each recipient. In consequence, care is taken to ensure that relatives not entitled receive more than others. These presents are often of considerable value, since they not only mark the noble sentiments of Ṽ's family with regard to him, but they are also a sound financial investment on behalf of Ṽ, whose wife will help him in future prosperities. Goods received as "food" or the meal are received in the same fashion as the "clothing." This completes the marriage ceremony. Ṽ's relatives often may for some time longer in Ṽ's house, but gradually go home as they think fit.

That night Ṽ and Ṽ sleep together.

It is contrary to custom for Ṽ's relatives to hand the goods which they have received from Ṽ's relatives as "food [illegible] evening" or "rope dancing" for fun. Within a few days or weeks, they must invite their fellow-villagers to a ceremony of same kind. If it is winter this can be a social dance, but in summer it must be a non-sexual affair. Y's father and other relatives attend, furnished with the usual gifts. When the ceremony is over and the time has come for the distribution of presents, a family rule can that Y has no son. If he has already been established to one he rule can that it is not free.[illegible] Y or one brings forward some of the goods provided by the relatives, and places them with the goods which Y's family received at the wedding and are about to give away. The whole is then divided among the guests, together with presents provided by Y for Y's relatives. The usual purpose of the rite may be to obtain money for some of Y's young relatives or to establish ours for them. It is immaterial to Y's people to what end they are applied. Within recent years the two ceremonies often place at a Social dance, but such overlapping between the two types of ceremonial is probably an innovation due to dance.

When [illegible] an effort was made to introduce a marriage ceremony of the Kwakiutl. According to the Bella Coola, among them the gifts given to the husband's relatives are at most merely credited with each of the receivers. This makes such for the bride, so that if the two quarrels with another woman the one does back her for her and shows her that by saying:

"What can you do? You have no work, while I have two sons," or as many hands as have been given to the marriage.

The grandson of a Fort Rupert Kwakiutl, living in Bella Coola and considered a member of the tribe, owned one of these hands and used it at the marriage of his daughter in 1914. It was first given to the mother of the bridegroom, and exchanged with a copper; then given to the bridegroom, and exchanged; finally given, and again exchanged, from the father of the groom. The woman for whom the one dance was [illegible] children. They grow up in the open environment of the [illegible] houses, absorbing most of their lore by watching and imitat-[illegible] ing them by actual instruction. Their care devolves chiefly [illegible] on the mother, although on any ceremony the father will be seen arriving with the baby in his arms, while his wife leads another child. Nurses are unknown and the parents take their children with them on all occasions. If it is necessary for a mother to be absent on some arduous call, her child will be entrusted to a grandmother or other elderly relative.

[illegible] There are no avoidances between the young people and their parents-in-law.

[illegible] The obligation of present-giving does not stop with the [illegible] marriage ceremony. Whenever X gives a burial dance or other [illegible] ceremony, Y's relatives are expected to contribute. It is felt that the weight of the presents given them during the period of engagement and at the wedding has become too heavy, and they throw this off by lavish giving. No count is kept of the value of gifts bestowed or received, though it is known that the family of the nurses loses financially in the end. The father of many daughters is regarded as an unfortunate individual, [illegible] who is always poor and overwhelmed through the necessity of providing for them. By so doing, however, he increases his own prestige, and the Bella Coola have the happy sentiment that such a man manages to get along some way, perhaps necessity means his ambition. Likewise Y's relatives contribute to any ritual carried out by Y's father. If, for example, one of his wife's relatives dies, X and his friends may wish to contribute towards the funeral expenses. In fact, any cere[illegible] monial serves as an excuse for relatives by marriage to donate goods and thus demonstrate publicly their influence, importance, and generosity.

[illegible] The concept of mutual help between families who have [illegible] intermarried is one that lasts for generations. In view there [illegible] was in Bella Coola an old Kwagiutl man who had left home some forty years earlier and had since lived in Bella Coola where he married and had a boy. On the death of his wife, this all was soon back to Sulu Costa with his son, a man about twenty-five years of age. During his absence all his relatives had died, and he was forgotten. He went to the house of a man with whom his ancestors had intermarried generations ago, explained who he was, and was welcomed. The old man and his son have since lived there, although it is doubtful if the owner of the house had ever heard of their existence, and the son cannot even speak the Sulu Costa language.

X and Y themselves are not entirely overlooked in the exchange of presents between their two families. If Y's father is well pleased with his son-in-law he may show his not only publicly, which redounds to his own credit, but by the communication of secrets has such as a special number of rights for ceremonial display. Conversely, if Y should not be a favorite, her father-in-law often asks her father's permission to make her a member of his society. The women's father is naturally pleased and makes no objections, as she is interred, using a name and prerogative unknown to her husband's family. Commonly too, they give her one of their ancestral names or any convenient ceremony here that he wishes. In conformity with the rules already explained, if Y should die children the name reverts to Y's relatives, but if there are children they pass to them. It is said that could names not never be transferred in this manner.

Y's father and other relatives continue to take an interest in her ceremonial welfare and in her general comfort. If Y fears or otherwise shows her, they remonstrate, and if her cruelty becomes unbearable they shelter their daughter after she runs away from her husband. If Y should murder Y, she would be revenged by her family. Only one instance of this was known, when the murderer evaded his pursuers by fleeing from the country. As a rule a wife is fairly well treated, though this depends on the character of the husband, the importance of her relatives, and the amount of goods expended to validate the marriage. Among slaves and persons of no influence, it is unusual that a husband may sell his wife as a

[illegible] THE [illegible] CIRCLE [illegible]

[illegible] alone, and this is believed to have occurred on one occasion to the daughter of a chief.

[illegible] Once, more hundred years ago, the daughter of a Bella Coola chief was married to the son of Tsalmoun, a Bella Bella chief, living in Rupert. The marriage, in Bella Coola, valuable presents were given to Bella Bella, and the girl went to live in Bella Bella with her husband. Soon her uncle died. Tsalmoun gave a long potlatch in which he had invited guests from all parts of the coast. In it he then found the daughter-in-law's relatives gave a certain amount of goods in return. This was not enough, so the contribution was distributed. Tsalmoun had received a large present, and not from himself could even a small fraction be made to have the [illegible]. He is not considered. Now he continues, he now intervenes with the daughter-in-law to [illegible] a Bella Bella chief. The Bella Coola men call, indignant, but could not [illegible] the girl intervenes, escapes and [illegible] the Bella Bella [illegible]. The girl intervenes, escapes and [illegible] the Bella Bella [illegible] (1, p. 91).

[illegible] A husband demands satisfaction on the part of his wife, though he himself is often rather [illegible]. This [illegible] is regarded, not as a [illegible], but as an infringement of the husband's prerogatives. But if a woman should have a child or a time when it was impossible for the husband to have been the father, then in absence, he would probably accept it as his own and do as more than administer a beating. Though some Indians men would divorce a wife for this. Bella Coola [illegible] on such matters rather with the individual. It is universally considered to be a matter that concerns the husband alone and he can do as he thinks fit. The daughters of chiefs are usually faithful to their husbands, whatever their of parentage, notwithstanding the valuables expended at their marriages, are more [illegible]. If the husband should catch an adulterer, he can, if [illegible], slay him on the spot and the question of blood revenge could be avoided [illegible]. Usually a light [illegible] the matter, though the offender's family may give presents to the aggrieved husband, and his wife's relatives may also make [illegible] to atone for their daughter's failings. A husband does not share his wife with anyone, and a question as to the leaving of a wife to a point that regarded as amusing. In recent years, however, some husbands have made a practice of taking their wives to white men. This is not considered creditable, but the Bella Coola do not strongly condemn breaches of the moral code, which are regarded as the affair of the husband alone. There is said to be a Bella Bella custom by which a wife takes an acquaintance, preferably one of the friends of her husband who is thought not only to know of his lot to receive the presents which he have given his wife. The relationship is to friends and often lasts together. In fact, this mutual interest is the reason to a lord between them. No case of this practice could be found in Bella Coola.

[illegible]

It has thus far been assumed that the Bella Coola are monogamous, an assumption correct only since the period of white dominance. Previous to that time it was quite common for wealthy men to have three, four, or more wives. Polly, the important chief as often mentioned, had nine, ten, or eleven, the exact number is not known. A man willing to take a second wife could do so in the manner already described, although the period of engagement was usually much shorter, and nothing for the parents-in-law was not expected. The reason for this was obvious to the Bella Coola. There for a chief of importance could affect more than a single wife, and such as one could not be expected to do-man himself by nothing for anyone else. Besides, parents were glad to have their daughters married to a great chief, so willingly waived the customary period of servitude. Men attained the distinction of having several wives. So far as could be learned the number of the same seems always to have been about equal, in half a dozen to polygamy in a community where practically every adult had a wife. A number of males were always due to war, and it is to be assumed that polygamy was made possible only through the surplus of women thus caused. The great majority of men had a single wife, some chiefs had

A chief's wives always lived in the same houses, and it is said that disputes were frequent. Paris endeavoured to prevent jealousy by providing each woman with a special hut, room and sleeping for a single night with each in order. One informant had two wives when a young man, and he found that the only way to avoid constant bickering was by sleeping in one hut, between them. The evidence seems clear that plurality of wives was usually the cause of considerable friction, though this never deterred a man from taking a second wife if he could. The only special rule of tact in this regard was that two sisters could not be married at the same time.

In answer to questions about polyandry, we were told of a fourteen woman who had two husbands, husbands between whom she used to sleep. The whole affair was considered disgusting, but public opinion did not [illegible] the offenders since a person's marital affairs were considered to concern the individual only. It was accordingly [illegible] that the instances of true polyandry did not exist, [illegible] generally, information was volunteered about to [illegible] the families of influential men. A very powerful chief, if his only child was a daughter, quite frequently married her [illegible] relatives to the exclusion of other chiefs. He was then considered [illegible] man fortunate, since only a wealthy man could provide for a daughter in this way, and expend the large quantities of goods necessary to secure her proper marriage to such a man. The husbands were never brothers, and whether [illegible], since the prohibitive parent wished to ally his daughter with different families. The [illegible] for the benefit of any resulting children. The [illegible] was accustomed to live for a number of months in the house of one of her husbands, with her other husbands [illegible] the farming part of his household. She would then [illegible] to the house of another, who assumed the leadership of the group.

with the others, including the one who had just been leader, as follows. It is said that there was rarely fighting among the joint husbands, since each realized that his turn would come as head of the household, and moreover the wife endeavoured to share her favours indiscriminately. The children were considered equally the offspring of each husband, thus automatically acquiring membership in several economic families. Such were regarded as indeed fortunate, provided with every potential means of assistance in the struggle of life.

Recognizing its importance, every effort was made to verify this information. Further questioning elicited the comments that the informant had never seen a case of this, though he asserted that when a young man he had often heard of it and that the custom had then only recently died out. Another old man and an elderly woman confirmed the above comments almost word for word, and each added that it was well known when they were young, though they had never actually seen it in practice. One man believed that the custom had formerly prevailed in several parts of the coast, and said that he had heard of its occurrence among the "Ewaxiw" people near Newitti. Considering the reliability of his informants, the writer gives as his personal belief that the institution of polyandry among the daughters of chiefs occurred in Bella Coola not many years ago. Knowledge of the term of address for co-husband, already given, is strong evidence in support of this view.

[illegible]

Since it has been assumed that Y is the daughter of a chief, properly married with due formality, it is necessary to digress still further from the account of her relations with X to describe connections of a less creditable nature. The most common of these was with slaves. Though frowned upon by all Bella Coola tribes, such alliances, of a permanent nature, do not appear to have been rare. In some cases it was a man who thus dishonoured himself, in some a woman. Since no slave could provide the goods necessary for an elaborate wedding, the [547] [548] ceremony usually consisted simply of the man and woman living together. In theory, this prevented the children from ever obtaining a name or other prerogative embodied in the ancestral myth of the free-born parent, and so effort was always made to conceal from them the details of the ancestral family's origin myth. But, as already described in the section dealing with slaves, the expenditure of valuable presents served to ameliorate, or at least to cover, the blot. If the child succeeded in giving many potlatches, the stain was generally forgotten. On the other hand, if the child of a slave married to a free man was not "washed," he could always be shamed by a reminder of the disgrace of his parents' wedding.

[551] [552] [553] [554] In case of murder, the son or other near relative of the victim sometimes accepts a daughter or other member of the offender's family instead of exacting blood revenge. The bride is delivered to her husband with valuable goods "to wash away the blood," but these never suffice entirely to remove the disgrace from her or her children. The latter may inherit names and prerogatives from their father, but even if they attain to the position of chiefs, they can always be put to shame by reference to their mother's marriage as an atonement for murder. Of course the influence of a great chief makes it impolitic to refer to his ancestry, and there are a few instances of men having reached such a position of eminence that the blot has been practically forgotten. [555] The wife's family must continue to give presents to the husband for years after marriage, otherwise her lot is miserable indeed, and her children have the status of the unwanted offspring of a slave and a free-born. In some cases a marriage of this type is entered upon years after a murder, if a son or other descendant wishes to end the anxiety of constantly expecting blood revenge.

REPURCHASE OF THE WIFE

[556] [557] Repurchase of a wife is the necessary consequence of every reputable Bella Coola marriage. It is assumed that the pre-amts given by X's relations up to the time of the wedding have exceeded in value those which they have received. Later, whenever, and as often as X gives a potlatch, Y's relations are expected to relay her from her husband. Although this is the expression used by the Bella Coola, it has only a ceremonial significance, since Y remains X's wife.

Whenever X intimates that he is going to give a potlatch, Y and her relations begin to hoard goods irrespective of whether or not children have been born. Their value is unregulated by custom, although the individuals concerned always try to give as much as they can; usually X does not know exactly how much will be provided until their actual delivery. Moreover, this is the occasion most preferred by the relatives of a wife to present to her husband ancestral names or other prerogatives embodied in origin myths. The exact rights of X with respect to such gifts have already been defined so need not be repeated here. Even if Y has taken an ancient name to her husband when she was married, she may bring him another when repurchased. This is an event of even greater importance to a woman than marriage, so no effort is spared to add to the dignity of the occasion.

On the second night of a potlatch Y's father announces what prerogatives he proposes to grant to X. These may include the right to a certain totem-pole design, the carving of a spoon, a painting for the wall of the house, or any other elements embodied in the origin myth. These privileges are displayed by X at the coming potlatch. If, as is usual, Y's father wishes to give his son-in-law an ancestral name, it is announced on this occasion, and is the designation by which X is known during the ceremony. It is always said that such a name is an "honor," in the sense of "an importance" that it must be "dragged across" to her husband by Y. Earlier names are commonly transferred to presents, but without any public honoring, and one or two instances are known of the similar acquisition of ancestral prerogatives and whistles; it was in this way that Pudur was able to import ancestral ritual from Bella Bella. After announcing the

S.McIlwraith R-5 (1922-1924) 1948

556 prerogatives he is transmitting, Y's father usually takes the 583 opportunity of stating that he wishes to hunt on X's hunting-[425] grounds, or fish in his fishing-grounds. Permission is never refused, though it is only for the period of the potlatch. Since Y's father is to assist X, it is considered fitting to grant him facilities for obtaining pelts and food.

It is on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch that the goods are delivered. They serve six purposes, which can be described separately, although the Bella Coola usually think of them as being too closely associated for division.

(1) They increase the dignity, influence, and prestige of the donors. This theme needs no further elaboration. When X later gives these presents to his foreign guests, he announces the person from whom he has received them and in this way knowledge of the manner in which Y's relatives have upheld the dignity of the marriage is spread far and wide, to their immense gratification.

(2) They help X to rise to a position of influence in the community by the credit which comes to him from their large distribution. Though a man may acquire goods in various ways, the Bella Coola affirm that without contributions from his wife's relatives no man can become a chief.

(3) They validate the transmission of names, or other prerogatives, taken by Y to her husband. Even presents given [426] directly from father-in-law to son-in-law are always said to have been taken by the daughter to her husband.

(4) Indirectly, they increase the prestige of the children, [554] either born at that time or who may appear later. None of the goods used for repurchasing their mother can actually be used for their benefit, but the whole rite gives them strength to succeed in life. A child whose mother has not been repurchased is said to be unable to walk, as if his legs were powerless; he lacks intelligence, and the ability to prosper. From the petty quarrels of childhood until old age, a person is proud to [576] recall the number of times his mother was rebought, and to thrust this statement in the teeth of those less fortunate.

I:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

(5) They govern Y's status in this world. When women quarrel, as they often do, the most common boast to shame a less wealthy rival is a reminder of the number of times the speaker was repurchased and the value of the goods used. 556 583 [578]

"I can sit down on fifteen canoes," or "I am carried by five slaves," says the angry woman, mentioning whatever goods were used for her repurchase.

(6) Finally, these goods serve a more definite purpose in obtaining for Y a name, or names, of which the value is directly proportionate to the expenditure, precisely as the importance of a chief's designation depends on the goods used to validate it. [553]

As with men's names, some women's appellations were given by Alquntam to the first arrivals; others were created on this earth with regard to peculiar events, and still others are names which can be used either by men or women. Theoretically, the dignity of the first type of name is greater than either of the others, but in practice the importance of the owner depends on the number of times she has bought herself from her husband; the principles governing the rank of women are thus the same as those already described for men. The term yutsalt, applied to a woman who has many times rebought herself and so reached a position of eminence, is the feminine equivalent to stálkmy. The creation of women's names in reference to personal characteristics or incidents connected with their married life is more common than similar creations for men. The ritual of the bestowal of a name on Y, here given, was omitted from the description of the potlatch in order to lessen the complexity of that ceremony. It will be remembered that on the afternoon of the second day of the potlatch Y's relatives appear outside X's house, carrying valuable presents. 551 556 583 [554] [562] 553 556 583

The announcer calls out that Y's father has come to give "food" to X and his relatives. By food, presents are meant, which are the return, with interest, of the gifts given by X's relatives on various occasions. The giver is announced, for other relatives than Y's father contribute, and to whom the

553 present is made. The recipient may either be X himself or 556 one of his relatives who has conferred a gift on one of Y's 583 family. The goods are taken inside, counted, displayed, and the same announcement made. These presents are given away by X the same evening, so that the only practical advantage that he receives is that the ultimate recipients make their returns, if any, to him. He makes no recompense to Y's relatives for these.

[537] A fluent orator next speaks on behalf of Y's father to the following effect:

"Please, ye people, listen to my words. This is an important occasion, hearken to what I have to say. Long ago our first ancestors were married, as X and Y have been, and it is fitting that we should make the name ..... live again in Y. Three years [or as long as the name has been dormant] it has been dead, as if living with the ghosts beneath the earth. Now it shall stand up again in Y; henceforth we use it for her. Come forth ..... [using Y's new name], your father rebuys you from X for fifty blankets [for example]."

Y may be anywhere; the statement "come forth" is merely symbolical. The fifty blankets are piled outside the house and the spectators, of whom many have gathered to witness the transaction, know that that number of blankets has been given with reference to that name. In some cases the wife is rebought three, four, or even more times for one name, either repeatedly by her father, or successively by her father and other relatives, or several names may be acquired by the different repurchasings. For instance, at one potlatch not many years ago a woman obtained the names Łäliäks, Xwulkon, Smaiu·a, and Ailsamka. As with men, some women prefer to have one very strong name, rather than diffuse their importance over a number. In this particular case the four designations were received from different relatives. At each repurchase the call is raised:

"Come forth ..... your brother [uncle, or whatever relative it may be] rebuys you from X for ....."

NEB Bellacoola NEB

In one case where an orphan woman, without relatives, repurchased herself by her own arduous labours, the announcement was made: 553 556 553

"Y's belt has come to rebuy her."

The reference was to the manner in which she had looped up her clothing with a belt when working. If Y's father should die after amassing goods to repurchase her, they are used for the purpose intended and the announcement is:

"Y's father's anus has come to rebuy her."

The ancestral family descended from the first settlers at Swalk'al have the prerogative of singing a special song as they rebuy one of their daughters. This was used by their first ancestors on a like occasion. The theme is: [124] [583]

"I, I, I am the highest of you all. No one of you is capable of doing what I can accomplish. You all live on what I void."

The significance of this last sentence is that the village of Swalk'al is farthest up the Bella Coola River. Its inhabitants used to claim that the people of the other villages lived on the refuse which they threw into the river, a source of pride to them. [186]

After announcing the various relatives who have rebought Y, the presents are counted and carried into X's house. The statement concerning their number, who has given them, and for what purpose, is repeated to the foreign guests there assembled, and they are then piled indiscriminately in a large heap for future distribution. At this juncture X calls out:

"Come in, come in," as though he were welcoming arrivals from a distance.

Y's relatives enter, and the ritual of the potlatch continues in the manner already described. The origin myth in which Y's new name is embodied is related in considerable detail, especially its recent history, that is, by whom it was last used and any pertinent items connected with its transmission. If she has received several names from different myths, each is similarly expounded.

As has been said, many women's names have been created 551 553

551 with respect to their appearance or actions on this earth. So [557] far as could be learned, the procedure of borrowed is identical with that just described. The following examples illustrate designations of this type:

Ts'ilkulitsimlain, "The Rainbow Maker." In the begin-[773] ning of time the wife of Tsisiwale had twins so often that the village rapidly increased in population. Accordingly she took this name for herself when she relaughed herself from her husband. It was transmitted for generations in the ancestral family of Tsisiwale's descendants until less than one hundred years ago. The recipients claimed it as their own and passed it to a certain Omponkilda, recently deceased, who gave it to her brother's daughter at the time of her marriage. Since this woman's husband has not yet given a potlatch the name is accordingly in a degraded condition at the present time (1923).

551 Ollipaiya, "I Am the Worthless One." The mother-in-law
578 of this woman had been in the habit of insulting her daughter-606 in-law by saying, even when strangers were present:

"We have a worthless daughter-in-law."

On rebuying herself the woman advertised the rudeness of her husband's mother by throwing her words back in her teeth.

Nakalalak, "I Am the One Whose Eyes Are Hungry." The mother-in-law of this woman used to eat without offering food to her son's wife.

Nakstwindjis, "The One Whose Haunches Are Dusty." Her mother-in-law did not give her a place to sit in the house so that she was forced to stay close to the fire in the ashes.

Kwiktelais, "The One Who Sits Where There Is No Space." Her mother-in-law objected to this woman sitting near her husband when he took his ceremonial seat, and insulted her with the above remark.

551 Nawaas'as, "The Stingy One." It was said that this 578 woman restrained her husband's generosity until he gained an unpleasant reputation for parsimony. She publicly shamed her husband's estate by taking this name for herself when she relinquished herself from him.

Ba'ma, "The Inhospitable One." The husband received this reputation owing to his wife's manners, as she advertised what had been said about him.

Bagbalizhin, "Shamelessly Dead." This woman's mother-in-law claimed that she deliberately failed to bear when she was told to do, and applied the above epithet to her. The daughter-in-law confounded her by taking it as her own name.

When a name of this type is assumed it is always announced when, where, and for what purpose it was first created.

A description has already been given of the usual ritual by which X borrows the goods required from the repurchase of Y, but it is necessary to enlarge on the prohibition against their use for the direct benefit of one of the children of the couple. The theory is that the goods bind the marriage contract and express in a practical and lofty form the kindly sentiments with which Y's relatives regard her husband, and the bond between the two families, hence they must be used solely for the benefit of him and his relatives. A man usually applies these goods to initiate the children of his brothers or sisters into the ranks of the nawé or Sacrist. It is unthinkable for goods to be delivered without an exposition of Y's family's glories, but if this should ever take place, there would be no difficulty in applying them to the direct benefit of her children. When used, for example, to make a child of X's brother a nawé, he is a living testimony of the noble way in which Y's relatives have done that which is fitting for the family of her husband. Due to accidents in amassing and storing of presents, it sometimes happens that those obtained by the repurchasing of Y are used for the benefit of her own children. Unless this error is corrected, the child could always be shamed by having it said:

"You are a mere nobody. The goods expended in the 555 555 [illegible] repurchase of your mother have become nothing beneath your feet."

When such an accident occurs, the relatives of X who were forced occasion to give presents to relatives his child, with the announcement:

"The goods used from the repurchase of his mother have become nothing beneath his feet. We hereby supply their deficiency."

Thus it is demonstrated that the relatives of both parents are interested in his welfare, so that his path is clear before him.

555 556 557 Many women are only repurchased once, but an effort is made to do this frequently since the more times, the greater her prestige. After several repurchasings it is felt that the names and other prerogatives "dragged away" by Y have become valueless. But since new names have been taken to her husband on each occasion, the marks of friendship between the two families are still plain. Thus it is that these four transactions can be termed by relatives of Y, unless, of course, X has validated them for his children. If there is only one repurchasing, the names remain the definite property of X. This is not a clearly formulated law, merely a sentiment that the earlier names have been covered by those later given, and that accordingly Y's relatives, having done what was proper, can now use the titles once more. There is a constant interchange of names and privileges between families related by marriage.

556 557 [182] It is virtually impossible to over-estimate the importance of this rite of repurchase among the Bella Coola, one of the few customs preserved unanimously amid the ruins of their ancient culture. The writer was forcibly struck with the following instance which occurred while he was in Bella Coola:

About fifteen years before, a young man and woman had married with due formality. After three children had been born, the mother took to drink and vice until her husband at last repudiated her, retaining possession of the children. The woman, weakened by disease, divorced by her husband, and [516]

[illegible] with contempt by her family, was yet determined that within she had done should ruin her children's chances in life. Accordingly she donated $300 to her ex-husband to other head. Marriage is accepted as a matter of course, but to be very often repurchased is the goal of every ambitious woman. In Tsi'ic the custom prevails of depicting on the rock the number of coppers paid for repurchasing a wife. Thus her fame is displayed to all.

It is somewhat difficult for a white man to realize what a privilege the family of a wife considers it to repurchase her from her husband. If the latter is unwilling to give a potlatch, his relatives-in-law may urge him to do so, and if he still declines to meet himself they take the drastic step of inviting their fellow-villagers to assemble in his house where, with these guests as witnesses, the wife's relatives give presents to her husband and his relations. They may make this presentation at any gathering where they are assured of a large audience. In so doing the donors have demonstrated their proper sentiments, in spite of the increase of the husband.

The assistance which the relatives of a wife have given her husband is a matter about which they can boast for the rest of their lives, a fact impressed upon the writer by listening to a quarrel between two Bella Coola men. One of them owned a horse and waggon which the other had hired to move some goods. The latter became very angry, claiming that the former had overcharged him and must be poor and greedy to be so eager to acquire money. The teamster, thus deeply insulted, silenced the other man by reminding him that the only reason he was wealthy was by means of the goods used to repurchase his, the teamster's, sister from her husband, brother of the man with whom he was disputing. To the observer the dispute was made more interesting by the fact that both the husband and wife had been dead for at least fifteen years, but their families had not ceased to remember the financial obligations connected with the marriage.

A man who is giving a ceremony of any kind can offer his greatest insults to his wife's relatives that remains to ask their assistance. The following is a good instance of such an insult:

About 1900 a man and woman were married and had three children. Then the mother died, before being repurchased from her husband. In addition, the husband had assisted his wife's father when one of his younger children had died, so that it was most fitting that the wife's relatives should contribute to any ceremony given by the husband. Four years later the husband proposed to marry once more, and to have the wedding occur at a potlatch. But on the day of ceremony, he insulted the relatives of his dead wife by failing to invite them. The cause of the feud was not disclosed, but the husband increased it by again failing to invite her family when, during the potlatch, they should have alongside him for the benefit of his young relatives about to be initiated into the ranks of the cloak. The father of the dead woman came forward concerned with a large pounce for such, saying in effect:

"I, too, have a right to contribute to add prestige to my daughter and her children."

In this way he defeated the wiles of his son-in-law who had hoped to shame his father-in-law by the failure of the latter to contribute to his potlatch. The son-in-law endeavoured to excuse himself by saying that his late wife's relatives had not assisted for so long that he thought they would not wish to do so. This errant further increased the father of the dead woman so that next day he and his wife publicly gave the dance of the potlatch $300 "to make clear where we sit."

This somewhat lengthy description has been necessary to explain the important part which the repurchase of wives plays in the lives of the Bella Coola; it is one of the fundamentals of society and is, therefore, worthy of attention.

DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE

[586]

Either death or divorce can terminate marriage. The decease of a wife is an unfortunate affair, quite apart from the grief which it may cause her husband. Two families have been brought into peculiarly close relations through her, and now the bond itself has snapped; delicate financial arrangements have been undertaken, and it is not easy to settle these without ill-feeling, particularly if the alliance was a return marriage. If no child has been born, and no repurchasing of the wife married out, her relatives are expected to return to her husband's family the goods received during the engagement and at the wedding. The matter is then settled. If the deceased has a younger sister, cousin, or other near relative, an effort is usually made to have this individual replace the dead wife.* No further goods are given, except perhaps a few to add dignity to the ceremonies; the new wife merely replaces her dead sister and the bond between the two families continues unbroken. If the husband should die, his wife's relatives are considered honorable and endowed with the minds of chiefs if they return to his relatives the presents which they have received. But if the wife can be remarried to one of his relatives, there is no need for this and the two families continue to enjoy the mutual strength acquired by the long period of engagement and exchange of benefits and presents.

If death takes place after the repurchasing of the wife, there is no need to return presents, since the rebuying has cancelled the expenditures by the husband. If children have been born and the woman has long become practically a member of her husband's family, she is buried by them as a matter of course, but should she die soon after marriage, her own family usually performs the obsequies.

With the passing of many years of married life, the repurchasing several times of the woman, and the birth of children, she becomes so much a member of her husband's family that his death seldom ends the arrangement. The widow is by no means a slave and usually is master of her own destiny, especially if she has children and has reached a position of eminence in the community. Since the desirability of preserving the bond between the two families is fully realized, it is accordingly customary for a widow to wed her husband's brother, or a husband his deceased wife's sister. But in each case the ritual of marriage and exchange of presents must be

*The native term emphasizes the fact that the new wife is virtually inherited by her husband.

[illegible] married can in one, since the repurchasing has wiped out the original expenditure. This is not necessary in the case of elderly widows or widowers. It is considered fitting for a widow or widower to wait for at least six months before remarrying. The Bella Coola say that in Bella Bella sixes are willed, as if they were slaves.

In spite of the efforts made to ensure the stability of marriage by elaborate ceremonies and repeated exchanges of presents by the two families, divorce is not unknown. Due to the decay of Bella Coola culture, it is now the rule and not the exception. It was difficult to obtain satisfactory data concerning its prevalence in the old days. Unquestionably every effort was made by both families to keep together a husband and wife who had been wed with due ceremony, but it is evident that these attempts were not always successful. If a husband deserts his wife, or she him, and refuses to return, it is considered that the marriage contract is at an end. The usual grounds for desertion on his part are childlessness, inability of the wife to help at potlatches, and habitual faithlessness. Continued cruelty and neglect are the usual reasons for a woman abandoning her husband. These factors seem to have governed divorce in years gone by, as well as at the present time. The most unfortunate consequence, in the eyes of the Bella Coola, is the stigma it casts on the children. The younger ones normally remain with the mother, those older use their own discretion, and sometimes pass back and forth from one parent to the other. Both mother and father continue to take an interest in their welfare, and a child can receive prerogatives from either, irrespective of which he is living with. None the less, there is a sentimental bar against the children of a divorced couple who can be shamed by a reference to the marital faithlessness of a parent. This factor, combined with the difficulties, financial and otherwise, between the two families, explains the efforts made to prevent divorce and the odium with which it is regarded. Of course, if husband and wife are poor persons or slaves, married without elaborate ceremony, they can part at discretion without anyone being affected.

When a wife runs away and seeks refuge with another man, her husband sometimes tries to kill his rival, but frequently both families endeavour to heal the breach amicably. Some of her relatives, particularly those who played an influential part in the marriage, first ask the husband whether or not he is willing to take her back. If the answer is in the affirmative, they next try to persuade her to return. Every argument is used, in many cases continued with threats against her relatives, and the reconciliation often succeeds. But she must never go back without presents, "to dry with his the tears that has covered the marriage." The husband invites all his fellow-villagers to his house to a ceremony which is said "to sprinkle the house [of conflict]." The singers are in attendance and sing in succession many bazia songs, followed by ausel songs, and to which the owner of the song dances, but since the supernatural beings are not present, the effect is of a non-sacred nature. The goods received from the family of the erring wife are distributed and the matter is at an end. Those who persuaded the wife to return are especially rewarded.

If the faithless wife should refuse to return, or if she should bear a child to her lover, reconciliation is not possible. Then it is incumbent on the woman's relatives to return to the husband as much goods as he has expended, with additions if they wish to uphold their own reputation. If the husband is clearly to blame, or if he is the deserting partner, his wife's family are not required to return the gifts they have received. There is no judicial tribunal of any kind, the force of public opinion alone impels restitution if the offender wishes to maintain his reputation in the community. Acting on this principle, the relatives of a deserted wife sometimes restore to her husband's family the presents they have received, thereby demonstrating their nobility and at the same time shaming the offender.

Formerly there was an elaborate ceremony to shame the husband or wife who betrayed a marriage by deserting him, or her, partner for a lover. Our informant, aged about seventy, never took part in this or when a young man, but probably did not know the full details of it. He stated that it followed a divorce of two persons who had been married with full ceremony, whereas another, lightly younger informant, who remembered having seen the ceremony once when a mere lad, believed that it was only in the families of commoners. It appears certain that the rite has not been practised since about 1880, consequently there is an element of doubt as to the actual details, and even as to whether it was an affair of chiefs or commoners. It is probable that it was among the former.

When a woman deserted her husband one of the leading chiefs would take this opportunity of giving a ceremony of the type known as tsayulhem.* After consulting with his fellows to ensure that no one had any objections, and rarely including the deserted husband, he summoned the singers to his house. He would tell them his plans, and they would prepare the songs for the occasion. Five or six were always composed, with an effort to include as many foul remarks and allusions as possible, particularly with regard to the organs of the woman and her lover.

The singers spent about a week composing the songs, and meanwhile the chief who was giving the ceremony prepared food and made other necessary arrangements. When these were ready, the donor invited to his house all the members of the nuxnit and kwiat societies for a rehearsal. The singers sang over the airs for the instruction of the guests. They were always worded as if it were the deserted husband speaking in foul terms of his ex-wife. The theme of one was:

"My wife has pudenda like those of a black bear."

The guests joined in the singing and also supplied foul themes by calling out observations about the organs of women in general, and of the deserting wife in particular. The singers tried to incorporate as many of these as possible, so that the rite soon became a chorus of obscenities. The songs were sung and sung until all present were familiar with them, then the donor of the rite distributed food and all departed.

*The relation of this to the s'nlk dance of the same name is obscure, cf. I, p. 279.

The following abusive everyone, including those unincumbered into either society, were invited to the donor's house. Probably the only abusives from the village were the deserting wife and her lover, while guests from neighbouring settlements were also in attendance. On this occasion, for the first time, the deserted husband used to take the leading part. When the singers struck up the tune of the first song, he used to appear, supported by four or five assistants. His face was blackened with soot, he wore a lynx-skin belt, and above his head was fashioned some insulting object, usually a representation of the female organs made of wood, cedar-bark and berries, as realistic as possible. As the singers sang, aided by those who had learnt the songs on the previous day, the husband danced, moving his body so that the ornament on top of his head was shaken suggestively. Meanwhile the spectators kept calling out filthy epithets of any kind on his ex-wife and her lover. Sometimes the dancer was able to insert some obscene remarks into the display. On one occasion, for example, he pulled some lynx fur from his belt and threw it in the face of a Tāl-ēs man who happened to be present, and who had once seduced a married woman and accordingly been the butt of a similar rite, with the remark:

"All Tāl-ēs women have hairy pudenda like that."

The guests were invited to suggest foul nick-names for the man with whom the dancer's wife had eloped. One of these was adopted by general agreement of opinion, and the man was commonly called by it henceforth. Two names so created were:

Skulsos, "The One Whose Face is Wrinkled like a Woman's Organs," and, Emolsaik, "The One Who Cohabited Publicly."

586 One very old man is still, 1923, commonly called by this 626 last designation, much to his annoyance.

When the songs had been sung, each accompanied by the 837 dancing of the deserted husband, the dance of the ceremony
796 discontinued food and the guests departed. The only advantage [556] to the giver of the rite was that it enabled him to show his wealth in an apparently disinterested fashion by gifts of food.
Usually he was a friend of the aggrieved husband.

When a husband deserted his wife, the other women of the village used to perform an exactly similar ceremony. The same type of songs were composed, and during their singing [342] the deserted wife used to dance, wearing above her head representations of a penis and testicles. By means of hidden strings she was able to cause the former to become erect.

On other occasions the ceremony was varied by an announcer asking the offended party about the appearance of the deserter. There followed a minute and highly coloured description about the unpleasantness of his genital organs, a description which was swiftly incorporated into the songs.

It can be taken as a matter of course that the above description is little more than an outline of the Bella Coola ceremony of shaming. In spite of its deficiencies, it is important, as evidence of the former sentiment with regard to divorce. Obscene though the ceremony must have been, both in acting and in the free use of personalities, it must have been a powerful deterrent to divorce.[11] Indeed it would be difficult to imagine a stronger one in a community where a man's position is judged by public opinion and where his greatest aversion is to public ridicule. It is unfortunate that we shall probably never know whether the rite was associated with chiefs or commoners.

CEREMONIAL MARRIAGE

Since marriage gains much of its importance from the complicated business transactions between the two families, with

[848]

[11] A similar rite was occasionally carried out for unmarried mothers.

the usual rule neglected, it is perhaps not surprising that the Bella Coola have not a ceremonial form entirely dissociated from marital rights. It is believed that such ceremonial marriages were performed by the first inhabitants of this earth, and that they have been customary ever since. A careful father or uncle always endeavours to arrange such a rite for a girl when she is two or three years of age. The relatives decide on some influential chief whom they would like to have as their daughter's fictitious husband, considering his wealth and prestige, but not his age. They interview the proposed bridegroom, who may consult his wife or other relatives before accepting, although he rarely refuses, as this would be an insult to the petitioners as well as a financial loss to himself. No period of engagement is necessary, as the wedding is arranged for the near future. Among important chiefs the ritual is identical with that of real marriage, though usually it is somewhat curtailed. The relatives of the bride welcome her husband and his relatives in their house and receive from him rather larger presents than they give; the same remark is made about it being the proper time to take the bride to her new home, and the husband and his party depart, without the girl. Presents of names or prerogatives may likewise be transmitted. The two are now considered as married, although there is no necessity for husband and wife even to see one another; on the other hand, there is no reason for avoidance since the marriage is essentially a business affair and not a sexual one. Whenever the husband gives a potlatch or other ceremony, he is assisted by the relatives of his fictitious wife, sometimes to a greater extent than by the relatives of his real one. This ceremonial wedlock may last for three or four years, until the relatives of the wife relieve her from her husband. On this occasion it is essential that he receive from the relations of his fictitious wife presents of greater value than he himself has given, otherwise she would be disgraced. Ceremonial marriage differs from real marriage in that one repurchasing terminates [553] [554] is, although it is customary for the parents of a wife to exhibit their wealth on several occasions.

What are the advantages of such an agreement to the two parties? The husband receives considerable assistance, both in actual goods and in ceremonial prerogatives. Moreover, his vanity is gratified by the desire shown by others to have him as husband of their daughters. The advantages to the wife are more difficult to describe. Financially, her relatives always lose, yet they consider that the prestige gained by their daughter as wife of a mighty chief fully compensates for their monetary loss. Accordingly, they take pains to have a daughter married several times before puberty, either simultaneously or in succession. Thus there is a form of ceremonial polyandry [555] existing in Bella Coola at the present day. No ceremonial marriage takes place after puberty. In later years, when the wife grows up, marries, and has children of her own, their status [556] is increased materially by the pre-puberty marriages of their mother. They address her fictitious husband as "father," and his children as brother or sister, although there are no incest prohibitions with regard to them. A chief sometimes arranges the bestowal of names or other prerogatives on the children of a fictitious ex-wife, but such favours are too uncertain to provide a motive for the prevalence of the rite. Its value rests on the esteem attached to a woman whose relatives have shown their wealth and prowess by marrying her several times. When her children quarrel with their playfellows, it is common to hear one boast:

"I have three fathers. How many have you?"

[557] Occasionally the relatives of a fictitious bride are unable to provide the goods to repurchase her from her husband and the girl remains disgraced for life. In no circumstances has her husband any claims to marital rights with her, and in due course she can marry someone else; but it is never forgotten that she was not rebought from her husband. In 1916 a girl about four years of age was married to a man of sixty, who at the time gave her relatives $80 and a motor boat. She had not yet been experienced in 1929 and the Bella Coola were beginning to look askance at her. It is doubtful whether the child realized that she was married, certainly the fact had not the slightest effect on her behaviour. Unless the wife is adoptée, any name which she took on her husband or her fictitious marriage remains his property.

Ceremonial marriages are sometimes carried out for special reasons. If the husband of a real marriage feels that he is over-indebted to his wife's relatives through the names and prerogatives they have brought him, he sometimes arranges to marry some of them and thus even the transaction by ceremonially marrying one of his young female relatives to one of his wife's family. She takes back some of the acquired names to her fictitious husband and the matter is amicably arranged. Realizing the difficulties experienced by the father of many daughters, one of his son-in-law may, if his father-in-law has many times sacrificed his daughter and so demonstrated his stability, try to arrange a fictitious marriage between the old man and one of his son-in-law's relatives. It often happens that the proud old chief will decline such assistance, confident in his own ability and prestige. Revenge is often settled by a fictitious marriage, arranged in the same manner and with the same attached origins as that already described. Sometimes the infant is ceremonially married to the son of a chief, instead of to the chief himself, though no true wedlock follows.

It is not even necessary to have a small girl to act as bride. If a man wishes to ally himself by marriage to a famous chief and lacks a daughter, he can perform the marriage rite with a "bride" consisting of his finger, leg, hand, or other part of the body. In a case in 1915 the "wife" was a favourite dog, which was duly married to a chief. In fact, ceremonial marriage is merely one of the many methods used by the Bella Coola to enter into financial dealings with an influential chief; it provides an honourable means of displaying the wealth of the bride's family; it increases the prestige of a girl and her relatives, or the prestige of her relatives alone if "she" is an inani-

588 556 more object. Bella Coola financiers are always seeking to arrange such undertakings; the potlatch is the culminating point, but the same principle pervades their whole life.

It is to the advantage of the intending donor of a potlatch to become the fictitious husband of as many children as possible. Accordingly he sometimes take the initial step, as is customary for the relatives of the husband in real marriage, but not in ceremonial. In such a case it is necessary for him to offer some inducement, perhaps in the form of one of the few women's names brought to earth in the beginning of time. He approaches a suitable father-in-law, suggesting that at a fictitious marriage he would be willing to give his wife a noble woman's name. If this is agreeable, the rite is carried out accordingly. The wife is in many cases a son of the person to [551] whom the proposal was made; he duly receives a woman's name, the only circumstance under which this is possible. The actual designation will probably be returned through many repurchasings, but the boy has reached an enviable position. In later years he can always silence a person with whom he is quarrelling by saying:

"I need not answer you. You cannot even approach my body, so thickly am I padded with the goods which my father used when he rebought me."

556 608 858 Another business transaction of a similar nature is the giving of a small infant to an old person to "hold." This appears to be uncommon, and the only instance about which information was available occurred under the following circumstances:

A man and a woman were married with full ceremony and the best of feelings prevailed between the two families. The wife was several times rebought until she and her relatives had fully maintained their dignity, in fact the relations of the husband felt that they were being out-shone. Then the wife's father died. To mark their sympathy, the husband's family gave the widow one of her daughter's children to "hold." Valuable non-returnable presents were transmitted as "soft blankets" for the child. The advantages to the donors were that they had an opportunity of showing their dignity, and it would always be a mark of pride for the child to be able to boast of the way in which she had been "held." 556 621 858

Ceremonial marriage clearly demonstrates two strong Bella Coola characteristics, namely, the desire publicly to enter into financial undertakings to demonstrate the wealth of the contracting party, and the desire to increase the prestige of children by means of this wealth expended indirectly on their behalf.

EXTRA-MARITAL RELATIONS

Although the Bella Coola do not regard marriage primarily as a means of regulating relations between the sexes, yet the connection between the two is sufficiently close to warrant description in this chapter. A man considers intercourse as one of the normal phenomena of life: by marrying he has exclusive rights to his wife, but few moral restraints deter him from anyone else to whom he can gain access without infringing the prerogatives of some other husband. Moreover, sexual intercourse is not regarded solely as a gratification of desires; it has a significance which can be described, not inaptly, as holy. As already explained, two favourite methods of obtaining success in any undertaking are by preserving lengthy continence or by observing ceremonial chastity. If a young unmarried man or widower should wish to make use of this latter means, he is compelled to have relations with a woman to whom he has no just claims. This is universally recognized, nor is there the slightest odium attached to the man. The only essential is that he neither violate another's wife, nor force a young girl against her will. 581 821 897

At the present time there is great laxity in Bella Coola, a condition which makes it difficult to judge the state of affairs in former times. Every effort was made to obtain satisfactory evidence, and the following was verified and re-verified with the older men. [128]

A wife, properly married with full ceremony, was usually 837 839

837 faithful and cases of rape were either unknown or very rare.
[839] The daughters of chiefs, too, were guarded with great care and 622 any effort to seduce one of them would be punished by her 836 father. The parents of a girl used to watch her carefully, and the opportunity for immorality was not great in the days when everyone went to bed at sundown except on the occasion of a ceremonial dance. As one informant described it:

"The daughters of chiefs used to be looked after as if they were in boxes, cherished and guarded by their parents and relatives. No one would dream of molesting them. And a chief's daughter used to be proud and look after herself. Nowadays, girls don't care, and everything has become degraded."

[586] If the daughter of a chief did demean herself, the parents lost interest in her, as one who was spoilt. It was always assumed that a girl of rank was a virgin at marriage, and if it was discovered that she had been living an immoral life, her husband in many cases returned her in disgrace to her parents who, equally ashamed, were expected to send back to him the 622 goods he had expended for their daughter. Loss of virtue was 848 judged only from indirect information. If the daughter of a chief was found pregnant before marriage, she was almost ostracized by her family. No ceremonial marriage could be arranged for her, and the child could not be cleansed from the stigma of illegitimacy.

836 On the other hand, it appears certain that there was a good 567 deal of intercourse in the old days between chiefs and slave women, or even between slaves and the daughters of chiefs.
[43] In the latter case the woman was often cast aside by her relatives though they sometimes yielded to the inevitable and tried to wash away the disgrace with gifts. At the same time, public opinion was unfavourable to a man who consorted with many women, or to a woman who allowed herself to be at the disposal of many men. Any regular union of masters with their slave women for the deliberate purpose of having children was unknown. A girl's consent was always necessary, given either personally or through an intermediary. Even a chief hesitated

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

to force his attentions on a slave woman if she objected, 836 although her refusal would be most unusual on account of his [567] prestige. There were no professional prostitutes; a man [548] usually gave a small present to a girl from whom he had received favours, and she was expected to give him a little, dainty basket filled with undyed cedar-bark to use as a sponge. Such relations appear always to have been of common occurrence. Today, as formerly, a man's morality is considered to 836 be his own affair; laxity may lower his prestige, but no law is 522 broken, and his neighbours laugh and chaff him about it. In fact, sexual matters are discussed with the greatest freedom, and a person who has been caught is mocked mercilessly. When visiting a foreign tribe, a man sometimes lives with a [648] woman and, on parting, composes and sings a song describing her charms. One man did this after living with a Kitlobe woman, and on his return to Bella Coola found that some of his fellows had learnt it in some unexplained manner; they used to sing it to him, much to their amusement, in part to his own, and somewhat to the annoyance of his wife. This perhaps illustrates rather clearly the attitude of the Bella Coola to an infraction of morality—where no marriage rite has been broken; it is amusing rather than disgusting. There 836 are no times when the moral code ceases to function. At potlatches, and also at hamat dances, there appears always to [834] have been a certain amount of laxity, although this was strictly prohibited within the house where the ceremony was taking place. Such behaviour is due to the excitement and stimulus of a large gathering, not to anything connected with the rites themselves.

Perverted sexual desires, like other matters connected with 834 the relations of the sexes, are regarded as concerning the individual alone. Sodomy appears to be unknown. Intercourse 836 by pre-adolescents is held to be disgusting, but carries with it no social ostracism. Incestuous union, however, is mildly anti- 835 social; it exposes the offender to secret contempt, but does not interfere with his attainment of whatever position his wealth 556

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEB Bellacoola NEB

and influence may have won for him. One or two instances are known of contact between parent and child, a matter in which it is the duty of no one to interfere; if a person thus flouts public opinion, it is his own affair.

In view of the firmness of the marriage bond and the absence of professional prostitutes, it is difficult to explain the wholesale exodus of Bella Coola women to Victoria in the last century. In some peculiar manner this came to be regarded as socially proper. The daughters both of chiefs and commoners trooped off for a varying period of months or years and those who returned brought back venereal diseases which appear to have been unknown before that date. Few of them bore children afterwards, a factor of prime importance in estimating the reasons for the decline of the Bella Coola. The motives which led the women to the city seem to have been: (1) the desire for wealth; (2) the influence of strong liquor; (3) the lure of a strange environment; (4) the attraction of the white men, on account of their higher culture.

It is fortunate for the Bella Coola that this fatal custom has ceased to be considered estimable, although the harm already done may be irremediable.

CHAPTER VIII

DEATH

Death Rites—Memorial Rites—Fate of the Dead

Death Rites

DEATH is marked by even more complicated and prolonged rites than marriage. Like so many primitive peoples, the Bella Coola not only carry out elaborate rituals soon after the actual decease, but hold lengthy commemorative and mourning ceremonials in later years. As these require the co-operation of a large number of people, the death of an individual affects a wider circle than his own relatives, and the celebrations have, therefore, an important social as well as religious significance. 196 196 [182]

OMENS OF DEATH

It is not surprising that the Bella Coola, believing in the omnipresence of the supernatural, should consider various peculiar occurrences to be omens of death. One of the simplest of these is to hear the falling of a tree when there is neither wind nor other reason to account for it. Such a fall is audible only to the person whom it warns of approaching death, either to himself or to one of his relatives. A number of men may be in the forest together, when one of them hears the crash of a tree and notices that his companions are unaware of it; he realizes that this is an omen and protects himself by calling out: 763

"Let this evil react against whoever has been plotting evil against me."

The basis of this custom is the belief that someone has been practising black magic against the hearer, who, by this answer, is able to cause the sorcery to recoil upon the malefactor. Even more dangerous than to hear a falling tree, is to have one crash [154] [824]

Ishmilwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

963 to earth close by. In the winter of 1921-2 three Bella Coola [124] were almost crushed in this manner; within a year the deaths took place of the wife of one, the mother of the second, and the daughter of the third. This was considered definite confirmation of their belief.

963 When a chief dies, a supernatural woman, Skwanät·ăn·ā, 776 "The Weeper," comes to earth to lament the loss. Crying piteously, she walks to and fro in the woods near the village where the death has taken place, but can be heard or seen only by a person in whose family there will soon be a fatality. This [124] can be counteracted by going boldly to her and collecting some of the clotted mucus that drips from her nose as she weeps. If this is wrapped in the finder's clothing and stored for a year, it brings him good fortune and probably deflects the impending death, but to see "The Weeper" without knowledge of the proper procedure is to court disaster. A prominent Bella Coola woman died in June, 1922, and her son believed that he heard the lamentation of the supernatural visitor about six the next morning in the woods behind the missionary's house. He rushed forth to find her, but was unsuccessful. Within a few days, one of his nieces died, as was to be expected.

963 A comparatively common bird in Bella Coola is the 825 kwakwas, which is about the size of a robin and dark, greenish brown.[1] Its whistle is frequently heard and no significance is attached to it, but it is an omen of death if a kwakwas comes close to a house and chirps out, "Isi·t." On the night of February 10, 1924, one called beneath the window of a man who was about to start on a journey in his motor-boat. Next morning, although the bird lay dead beside his house, he insisted on starting. He camped at Restoration Bay where he was awakened by a voice calling his name, but could see no one. This was probably an owl, a bird which often foretells disaster by calling the name of the person to whom it will occur. Even this did not deter him and within twenty-four hours his boat caught fire, his goods were destroyed, and he, himself, 763 barely escaped. The Bella Coola regard coincidences of this 825 kind as confirmation of their beliefs.

[1] The bird could not be identified, although it belongs to fact, not mythology.

As in the last instance, death does not always follow the hearing or seeing of an omen; it may simply presage some calamity. It is dangerous for a person to be addressed by a dog, although it is well known that dogs understand human speech and can talk if they desire. At the time of the writer's visit, it was a matter of general knowledge that a dog had spoken to a middle-aged Bella Coola woman a few years earlier. The animal was shot immediately, and the woman never revealed what it had said, but in spite of these pre- [158] cautions she became insane and has never fully recovered.

The stone man, Yuyulmxl, near Kimsquit, who figures so 763 prominently in Bella Coola mythology, is another death omen. [773]
In early times, all who passed his station used to call out to him, and it was thought that those whom he failed to answer would die within a year. In that case, the voice was welcome, [825] but the speech of an owl is still regarded with dread. If one of these birds utters the name of a dead person, the individual hearing it will soon die.

Besides these well-recognized omens, the Bella Coola be- 763 lieve that any peculiar visitation or hallucination is a probable 828 precursor of disaster. In many cases these fears are unjustified, but there are always sufficient accidents and misfortunes to corroborate their belief. An old Kimsquit man told of the manner in which his son had once come rushing into the house saying that he had seen a strange, black-faced creature. His father feared that it might have been Sxaiarwax.

"Perhaps it was," continued the old man, "for my boy soon died."

Irrespective of the actual cause of death, about which the father is uncertain, he is convinced that he knew of its coming by his son's omen-apparition.

CAUSES OF DEATH

761 The Bella Coola know that sickness, accident, wilful murder, old age, and a host of other factors may at any time terminate a man's life, but they consider that any one of these direct causes is possible only in conjunction with an indirect reason of a religious or supernatural nature; in the last analysis they attribute death to supernatural, not to natural causes. [773] As described in a previous chapter, an ancient myth attributes the origin of death to the stupidity of Raven, but this belief, even if its historical accuracy is accepted, belongs to the realm of philosophy and ancient history rather than to everyday life. 761 When a canoe is capsized on the ocean and its occupants are drowned,—the Bella Coola do not consider a drowning a mere 776 accident—it is because Qemoqwa was hungry and desired human flesh. This indirect reason is quite as important as the direct one. So, too, the death of a man beneath a falling tree or a land-slide is no accident; Sä·lma caused the tree to crash to earth or the slide to roll downwards. Most individuals believe that this supernatural being is responsible when an animal kills a hunter. He delights in death and always sits on [756] a coffin before it is taken to the grave, although none but shamans can see him. Any supernatural being can cause death, but it must not be imagined that the Bella Coola go through life in a state of constant fear; death may vanquish them in the forests, but the probabilities are against it. Nor does 753 sickness appear to them as a natural phenomenon. Its cause is either the intrusion of some foreign object into the body, or the weakness of one of the patient's supernatural elements. The only remedy in the latter case is an appeal to the super- [755] natural, sometimes through the medium of a shaman, whereas a foreign object in the body can often be extracted by a skilled [754] practitioner. A disease of this type is often brought on by the machinations of a sorcerer, and if death results it is attributed 761 to the potency of his charms, not to a natural ailment. Even [775] ghosts are able to cause death. In war, one man may be able [726]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

to kill an enemy, but his success is accredited to his super- 761 natural possessions which have given him skill as a warrior 726 rather than to his own ability.

It is felt that no ordinary explanation is sufficient to ac- 761 count for the death of a great chief. No matter what may have 622 been the actual cause, it is always said that the supernatural Carpenters, who in the beginning of time created mankind, [773] came down and "seized" or "called back" the deceased, thinking him too good for this world. It is believed that these beings are keen hunters, and that Alquntäm allows them to pursue influential people. This sentiment is always expressed in [533] mourning songs for a dead chief, but although accepted as a matter of fact, it is little more than a formalized belief which serves to comfort the mourners. The infraction of a taboo is another reason frequently given for a chief's death.
It is said that there was a loud crash and the earth shook before the death of Pothu; he became ill immediately, and his stomach began to swell. The stricken chief said that Sonq' itself had fallen upon him, but the common belief was that he had erred in some ritual act. At any rate, he died within a few hours.

RITES FOLLOWING DEATH

News of a critical illness spreads rapidly through the village 763 and the house in which the sufferer is lying becomes a rendezvous for friends asking about his condition. Failure to do so would be considered ungracious, with the result that there is such a constant coming and going that rest is denied the sick person. Shamans are called upon to practise their powers in [756] a noisy manner, and female relatives weep and wail. The din is indescribable.

When the patient shows no further indication of life, the shamans cease, but the women redouble their cries. Relatives, friends, and sympathizers all crowd into the house and begin to weep, often adding verbal lamentations. The progress of the news from house to house can be traced by the wailings. Mean- 764

764 while the relatives are preparing the body for disposal. For a child, these services are performed by the parents; for a married man whose parents are dead, by his brothers and other kindred; for a married woman, by her husband or the members of her own family. If she has borne no children, it is customary for her relatives to carry out the funeral rites, especially if she has been many times rebought from her husband. If such repayment has not been made, it is considered correct for a husband to bury his wife, although it is a point of honour for her relatives to reimburse him later for his expenditure. On the other hand, when children have been born and financial assistance mutually given and received several times, it is proper for the husband to perform the funeral rites, although he may receive assistance from his wife's kinsmen. There is no rigid ruling on the point, but bickerings seldom occur in connection with disposal of the dead. Members of the ancestral family are ready to assist in every case, both on account of the disgrace that would follow a niggardly funeral, and also as a means of displaying their wealth. [614] [550]

The first essential is to wash the body, a rite performed by men for a man, by women for a woman. It is immaterial who does this though some of the relatives usually volunteer. Neither husband nor wife touches a dead consort, though it is said that long ago a man would hold intercourse with a deceased wife to indicate his excessive grief. The most influential member of the immediate family takes the lead in the various necessary acts, although there is always endless discussion and advice from members of the ancestral family and others interested. A nose-ring is placed in the septum of the corpse; if this is omitted, the body will not be able to dissolve into its elements but will range the earth as a walking phantom, causing injury to anyone who observes it. If the deceased has just eaten some of the first run of spring salmon or olachen, a shaman washes out his mouth with a sponge of undyed cedar-bark which he throws into the river. The essence of the salmon is thus extracted from the body; if [839] [301] [975] [925]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

this rite is neglected no more salmon will come to the river. No precautions are necessary after the food has been digested. 764 [825]

Many men prepare their coffins before death. If this has not been done, a large, wooden box is provided by a kinsman of the deceased. The body is dressed in good clothing and bound into a squatting position, head between knees, hands clasped around shins, and the haunches just above the level of the soles of the feet. In this posture it is thrust into the coffin. Particularly if the corpse has been brought from some distance and rigor mortis has set in, it may be necessary to break the back-bone and even to crush the skull before the box can be closed. A stone is placed on the back of the neck, within the coffin, to prevent the ghost from returning to haunt the survivors. A little choice food is placed beside the body of a dearly loved child for nourishment during the journey to the next world. [763] [602] [775]

From this point onwards, the funeral rites differ according to the rank of the deceased. On the death of an influential ɔɔaak, the senior members of that society meet as soon as possible to arrange the dramatization of the coming of Mulakila. A ɔɔaak son, brother, or other near relative is always present even if he has little importance in the affairs of the society. If the death has taken place during the night, the conference is held the following morning and the rites begin at noon. There may be delay until all have gathered, but about the middle of the first possible day two ɔɔaak are sent up one of the mountains behind the village. They carry large, cone-shaped whistles which they blow twice. The sound is plainly audible in the village and all, whether or not members of the ɔɔaak society, recognize that a supernatural being is drawing near. After a short interval, another whistle is blown by a ɔɔaak concealed on the roof of the house in which the corpse is lying, and after another pause the same sound comes from within, beside the body itself. Most of the uninitiated know that this is the voice of Mulakila (also called Sisiutwam), 575 766 [776]

766 575 but even if unaware of the fact, they realize that some super-[776] natural, invisible visitor has arrived.

Heralds go from house to house, and sometimes to adjacent [203] villages as well,[3] inviting the people to pay a farewell visit to [628] the dead man who will soon leave them; in this invitation the susaok name of the deceased is used. The guests assemble at once, irrespective of their rank or membership in the susaok society. To mark their grief, female relatives pull out tufts of their hair, and both men and women of the immediate family [302] cut their hair short. The body, either in its coffin or covered with blankets, is placed between the central fire and the back-room, immediately behind the place where the singers take their stations. When all are present, a son or other near rela-
[537] tive who is also a fluent speaker, stands up and expounds how the Chief, meaning Mstlakila, has come to visit the dead man, 533 and how all should try to understand the song he has brought.[3]
575 A hidden susaok has been blowing a whistle intermittently, and 766 the singers pretend to be able to understand words of a song in its notes. In reality they have prepared in advance the new one which they now beat out, accompanied by their voices. The theme either describes the coming of the supernatural visitor, or recounts the number of potlatches given by the deceased, and the manner in which these will make smooth the path whither he is going in the same way that distributed goods validate a chief's seat in this world. This song is practised and improved upon amid the booming of the whistle as if the singers were constantly gaining new ideas and embellishments from the words of the supernatural visitor. Sometimes a few incidents are added from the susaok myth. After several repetitions, a relative of the dead man asks the singers to beat out the latter's susaok songs, as many of them as are remembered from the time he was first initiated into the so-

[3]The Bella Bella are said to invite foreign guests to this ceremony.

[3]Sometimes the people are present when the coming of Mstlakila, heralded by [184] whistling and a thump on the roof, takes place. There are variations in this, as in all other susaok rites.

ciety. These are given several times, serving to recall the 533 ceremonies in which the chief took part during his life. At 575 intervals, the new song is repeated and sisaok members of the 766 audience join in as they become familiar with the words. Frequently one or more relatives of the deceased dance in his [535] stead during the singing. The details of this rite, especially of the songs used at it, differ considerably according to the actions of the person during life; if a mighty chief, the donor of many potlatches, this fact is described in the song, whereas only an incident from the ancestral myth can be used for a young sisaok. If some of his female relatives are professional [767] wailers, they function during the ceremony. In all circumstances, the rite aims to comfort the grieving kinsmen, an end which it usually achieves.

As already described, sisaok ceremonial was in a state of 575 transition at the time of the coming of the white man. Pre- 766 vious to that date, a spectacular funeral prerogative had been 177 adopted from Rivers Inlet,[4] which has since been claimed by a 424 number of sisaok. All the Bella Coola know of this ceremony, [178] and most of them desire to perform it at the death of a dearly loved relative; at the present time this is possible owing to the slight regard paid to prerogatives, but it is certain that a few years ago it would have been forbidden to most people, and that it was never a universal Bella Coola rite.

When this rite is performed, the corpse is allowed to remain 575 in its coffin for at least one night after the day on which 766 Mstlakila came and the sisaok songs were sung. Meanwhile 532 the carpenters have prepared an imitation body, usually of rags on a light framework, and a wooden representation of the deceased's crest. Since this figure is to come through the roof and carry aloft the corpse, stout hooks are attached to its feet.
In theory, the bird or animal disguise used by the first ancestor

[4]One old Bella Coola stated that this prerogative was obtained during his own life-time from a Rivers Inlet chief who moved to Tal-ia. It is impossible to state accurately when this ritual was adopted by the Bella Coola, though it is unquestionably of recent origin.

575 766 [532] of the deceased, traced patrilineally, should come for the body, but this is difficult to arrange in case of whale, bear, and other marine or land mammals. Consequently, it has been customary to use only raven or eagle for this purpose, and it is assumed that at least one of these birds is present in the ancestral history of every individual as a result of the marriage of some of his forbears with a woman possessing one of these crests.[1] It is a common practice for an influential ɬɩsaok to prepare a figure of this kind during his life-time and tell a son or other trusted relative where it has been hidden; if this has been done, it obviates the necessity of carpenters manufacturing one at short notice.

Several days are often required to complete these arrangements, but on the first evening possible, which may be two or three days after the death, the people are summoned to the dead man's house. The singers take their usual positions behind the fire and beat out the song used at the mourning ceremony already described; then, as on that occasion, they follow it with a number of the deceased's ɬɩsaok songs. Once more they strike up the one newly composed and, as it is proceeding, whistling is heard, accompanied by the screaming of an eagle or the croaking of a raven. Those who are not members of the ɬɩsaok society do not understand that these sounds are produced by hidden members blowing whistles on the roof. There is a crash on the planking and, through a space opened by the removal of several boards, the face of the bird crest can be seen peering in. It is a dramatic spectacle and the audience gasps appreciatively, especially those who see in it a manifestation of the supernatural, testifying to the importance of the deceased. If the stage management has been accurate, the figure appears at the termination of the song, but if it has arrived during the actual singing, the singers beat time slowly and cease to use their voices. The eagle, or raven, keeps squealing repeatedly and gradually comes through [178] [1] The use of only raven or eagle is probably a degeneration due to recent decay of custom.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

the hole in the roof, ponderously and slowly, until its talons grip the "body." In the same gradual fashion it carries this upwards until, just before the burden disappears through the roof, one of the principal singers leads his fellows and the audience in calling out: 575 766

"Ye··," which has the significance of, "May you have a safe passage whence you came and whither you are going."

As soon as the bird has disappeared, its notes are heard from above, growing gradually fainter as the actors blow their whistles less violently. An eloquent ɬɩaak stands up and expounds how the deceased's crest has come down from above to carry away his body, and often mentions incidents in the ancestral myth to explain why this bird had appeared. A young man is sent up to replace the roof boards and the hidden accomplices rejoin the audience unostentatiously. The corpse itself remains hidden in some back corner of the house where it was concealed at the time the dummy was seized, so that nothing indicates what has taken place.

The relatives must give presents to all who have witnessed this ceremonial prerogative. These are now distributed without regard to the rank of the recipient; such gifts are not returnable and are said to be, "What Has Been Shaken Off," like dust from the departing body. A meal, likewise provided by the kinsmen of the deceased, is next served, and as the people are eating, it is customary for senior ɬɩaak to make laudatory speeches, extolling the dead chief and comforting the survivors by reminding them of the way in which he will be looked after in virtue of his ancestral traditions. This procedure may continue for several hours, and it is only when no one else wishes to speak that the people disperse. [556] [537]

It is not easy to comprehend the attitude of the Bella Coola to this rite. Some influential ɬɩaak state emphatically that in former days it was possible to carry it out so realistically that the uninitiated were deceived, and never suspected that the actual corpse was later on buried in secret by the singers, carpenters, and ɬɩaak. On the other hand, those who do not 575 766 781

575 766 981 wish to emphasize the importance of this society, state that the deception was always apparent, and that even the hooks and ropes by which the figure was manipulated could be seen. Still others regard the ceremony as a symbolic means of portraying the manner in which a man's crest comes to carry away his spirit and life. It seems clear that different interpretations must always have been accepted by different [184] members of the community. A young and ingenuous uninitiated, steeped in the atmosphere of the supernatural, may well have believed that he was gazing upon an actual supernatural being, as the senior nuaaè desired him to do; others must have recognized that a deception of some kind was being practised, but dramatization is such an important factor in Bella Coola life that individuals often disregard the difference between semblance and reality, and it is contrary to custom for a person to cast aspersions upon the prerogative of another. It is easy for such an one to accept the drama as a symbol or representation of the manner in which the crest carries off the intangible elements of the dead. This is certainly the attitude of the Bella Coola at the present time. Everyone realizes that the crest is of human manufacture and that the corpse itself is not carried away, but the rite is still performed and gratifies the survivors by giving them an opportunity to display their prerogative and the cloak of the deceased's ancestor.

575 766 Perhaps because of its relatively recent introduction, details of the performance of this rite are not fully standardized In some cases, the crest is made to appear at the same time as Mulakila, instead of at a subsequent ceremony. It is [424] assumed that the origin of the rite is in some ancient myth in which the body was actually taken above by the crest, an act copied, with the aid of carpenters, by the descendants [773] of the person to whom this occurred. There are no myths of this nature current in Bella Coola, although it is thought that such must have been common among the peoples of the outer coast to explain the prevalence of the practice in that area. [424] One old man mentioned that an Owikì myth in which a body became eagle down and was wafted upwards is psychologically of the type which might serve as basis for a rite of this kind. If the descendants of the person to whom this had happened had dramatized the incident at subsequent deaths, a custom analogous to the one here described would have arisen. 575 766 424 [773]

DISPOSAL OF THE BODY

There is no fixed time for the disposal of a corpse. When possible, it takes place on the day following death, but as many as four days may elapse if delay is necessary for the performance of the rite just described. Another reason for postponement is the absence of near relatives; if they can be summoned within four or five days, the funeral may be delayed until their arrival. There is always endless discussion concerning the exact details; all relatives and members of the ancestral family take part, though the wishes of a son, brother, or other near kinsman are usually followed. In this, as in so many points of Bella Coola ritual, an influential chief often overrules the desires even of those who are more closely related to the deceased. 764 [796] [554]

Heralds announce the hour chosen,[8] usually about noon, and the people begin to assemble in the deceased's house, even strangers being welcome. Women wail dolorously, and another indication of the occasion is the bundles containing clothing, cooking utensils, and other articles belonging to the dead person. The lid of the coffin has been left open, but when everything is ready, an elderly man is asked to strike it, once, with a stone; then the lid is closed. Planks have been removed and a hole made in one of the front corners of the house, through which the man throws out the stone. The women redouble their lamentations as an old woman, previously asked to do so, lights a bundle of dyed and undyed cedar-bark and climbs through the opening carrying this. No request has been made for pall-bearers, but any strong men, especially [203] [609]

[8] This is done at present, even after the carrying away of the "body." In former times it was omitted when the corpse was secretly buried by the sisaek. [178]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

764 friends of the deceased, pick up the coffin and carry it through the hole. In former times it was frequently difficult to obtain [766] pall-bearers for a slave or friendless person on account of the [784] taboos to which a person performing this service was subject.
[761] If a dead person should be taken through a doorway, others using it would soon follow the corpse to the next world. For the same reason, a body must never be moved across the central line of a house; the passage is, therefore, made from the side where it happens to be lying. As soon as the corpse has been taken through, the removed planks are quickly replaced. Mourners and guests stream out through the doorway and follow the coffin, some of them carrying the bundles containing part of the goods of the deceased. Meanwhile the pall-bearers follow the woman with the torch to the cemetery, taking care to carry their burden so that it faces the direction [761] in which they are going; if a dead person is allowed to look backwards, he will beckon some relative to accompany him and the one so summoned will soon die.

There is a cemetery near every village, usually fifty to a hundred yards behind the row of houses in a place from which the heavy timber has been cleared. On arrival, the pall-bearers set down their burden close to the spot where the guide has placed her flaming bark on the ground. The personal possessions of the deceased are likewise deposited near the fire, which is kept alight by female relatives throwing on it small quantities of the dead person's clothing and utensils. The near kinsmen of the deceased choose the exact site of the grave, which must never be dug before the bringing of the corpse.
[423] There is no ownership of plots within the cemetery, so that the hole can be made wherever desired. A favourite location is close to the grave of a mother, father, or other near relative, but this is optional; bones are sometimes uncovered when digging, and in that case earth is thrown in once more and a new site selected. There are no professional grave-diggers, [767] nor are arrangements made in advance for men to perform this duty, but friends, especially strong young men, are willing to

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

underwater the rash and bring with them rocks for the purpose. 764
When the location has been chosen, they start their work [767] without further instructions, taking care that the corpse shall face east. It is said that this is done because the sun rises in that quarter, a statement that is probably a mere rationalization. Graves are usually about five feet deep, so that the digging requires some little time, especially in winter when the ground is frozen. All the young men are willing to help and relieve one another at intervals. Meanwhile the women are squatting on the ground near the coffin, some of them throwing objects on the fire, and all wailing intermittently in a high-pitched, tuneless sob into which a mourner sometimes inserts words as if her agony had overcome her.

"Please return whence you came," moans one woman, while another sobs out:

"Perhaps you were unhappy with us and wanted something we could not give you on earth."

The sun sent down the people of Sinxl and Snulle·tl, who [773] accordingly regard that being as their crest. Mourners of those villages, as well as other individuals to whom the sun stands in the same relationship, are accustomed to address him, saying:

"Please increase your light to guide the way. Our child returns to you."

One woman, whose relatives had been killed by jealous rivals owing to their success in giving potlatches, prayed:

"Come no more. Those for whom you gave light have gone; henceforth shine only whither they have departed."

In some cases such doleful lamentations are mere lip service, but they often express very real grief at the loss of a friend or relative. It is also felt that such sympathy affords comfort to the mourning kindred.

As the grave grows deeper, the relatives keep measuring it and the coffin to insure a close fit and avoid unnecessary digging. As soon as it is ready, an elderly man who has been requested to perform the rite, steps to the north side of the 764 grave carrying a spruce bough in his hand. He touches with it the edge where he is standing, then, in sunwise order, the east, south, and west margins. This circuit is repeated four times and the branch tossed away to westward. This essential [774] ceremony is based on a belief that the lives, or perhaps the spirits, of the grave-diggers have been drawn from them into the grave and are in danger of being pressed down by the coffin. Should this occur, they would have short lives. The spruce branch enables the supernatural elements to leave the cavity and return to their owners who suffer no ill effects. Anyone, other than a grave-digger, can perform this rite.

The coffin is now lifted into the grave, care being taken that the corpse faces east. As already described, it is in a squatting position with haunches almost on the ground. Boards have been prepared in advance, and with these the grave-diggers make a roof-like covering, placing at each corner [775] a stone weighing from ten to fifteen pounds, to prevent the ghost from returning to trouble the survivors. Earth is thrown in on top of the boards, and as it falls the wailing breaks out dolorously in a final crescendo of mourning. [766] If a chief has been buried, his fellows sometimes sing a xe·tla [533] song. At this time it is proper for one or more chiefs to rise and speak. No one is required to do so, nor is there any rule 537 as to the order in which they make their remarks. The first 764 speaker is usually a prominent man related to the survivors, though seldom a son, brother, or other near relative of the deceased. A speech is generally addressed in part to the spirit of the dead person, telling it where to go; in part, to the mourners. For a dead child, emphasis is laid on the fact that although he did not live long enough to be incorporated into his ancestral myths on earth, this will be done for him in his future home. In conclusion, an appeal is often made to [775] Alquntäm, under the name of Smaialotla, to take pains that [773] the spirit of the dead is given its rightful place in Nusmät·a, in the section where its first forbears were created, and whither the spirits of its dead ancestors have returned since the beginning of time.

ning of time. The following speech was made by an elderly Bella Coola chief at the funeral of his great-granddaughter in June, 1922: 764 537

"Granddaughter![7] Go with your grandmother[8] to the mountain above Tcumotl where my first [patrilineal] ancestor came to earth. Go to the mountain across the river where Qeil[9] descended; go to the north where your ancestor found a copper house with a raven inside; go to the Skeena where another of your early ancestors found a whale; go to all the places where your forefathers experienced the incidents recorded in our myths; go and be happy.[10] I do not want these ever-recurring deaths in my family, but I am helpless. I hope that Sixsixqwtnam will cease hunting us." [773]

Turning to the Carrier Indians who were present, the old man continued: "Thank you for coming twice within two days to share our grief." [648]

Turning back towards the grave, he went on:

"I have made ready the road for you.[11] Your grandfather[12] and I are grieved; our families became united when your parents married, and the bond was cemented by your birth. Now it is lost. When you were born, I rejoiced; now I am sorry. You are all right; you cannot fall because you are supported[13] by the names and fame of your father and mother, your grandfather and grandmother, your uncles and aunts, and your other ancestors who have passed away here in Qomqo·ts. You rest with them in your own village where is located your power from the experiences of your forefathers.

[7]The term, slemts, was used, although the child was really a great-grandchild.

They will look after you and, being chiefs, they will be able to do so properly. You will be strong indeed. I am heavy with grief. My grandchildren alone serve to anchor me to Qomqo·ts; otherwise I would go to Tcimotl.[14] Now that you have gone I may become light-headed and depart. No. I have other grandchildren and great-grandchildren. I will bear up and be a man, and show myself the chief that I am by right."

During this speech the mourners remained seated on the ground, many of the women wailing at intervals and the men listening with more or less attention except those who were filling in the grave. Once or twice the speaker hesitated for a suitable word and suggestions were called out to him.

As the old man finished speaking and sat down, another chief arose.[15]

"Children," he said, addressing the parents of the dead child, "You have indeed suffered misfortunes. A few days ago, your mother[16] died; today, your daughter. Perhaps it is all for the best. Remember how many ancestors who have gone before will be waiting to receive the child; she will be well cared for. Death passes no one, chief or commoner, but do not despair even at this double visitation. Your mother[17] never did an evil action to anyone, never said a harsh word to anyone; try to imitate her. See! I have neither father nor mother. They are both dead; we all go the same way."

In conclusion he urged the step-father of the grieving father, husband of the woman who had died a few days previously, to bear up.

As the second speaker finished, a third arose and spoke briefly.

"I am sorry," he said, "for Joe[18] in his grief today. We have put his granddaughter into the ground beside her grandmother but it may all be for the best."[19] 764 537

There is no doubt that condolences of this nature assist the mourning relatives to bear up under their grief. This fact was emphasized by several Bella Coola, and in addition the writer was able to observe it on several occasions. They readily respond to suggestions of any kind and undoubtedly derive comfort from the laudatory comments of influential chiefs.

Speeches of this general nature are always delivered as the grave is being filled in. Sometimes this work is finished before all who wish to do so have expressed themselves, sometimes the remarks are so short that they are ended before all the earth has been thrown back. When the hole has been filled to ground level, it is stamped down and the surplus earth scattered out of sight among the bushes, no mound being thrown up. 764

Great care is always taken to prevent the return of the ghost. In addition to the weighting with stones already described, other methods are used before the funeral party leaves the cemetery. Heavy boards are usually laid flat over the grave and rocks piled on these bar the way up from below. A further precaution is the setting upright of four stakes, one at each corner of the hole, and fastening ropes of cedar-bark between them along the east and west sides of the grave. The significance of this is not fully understood, except that the ghost cannot pass the strands. Four spruce saplings are cut and placed either between the grave and the village, or one on each side of the hole; their sharp needles form an effective barrier. 764 775 [824]

While these precautions are being taken, any clothing and utensils brought to the grave and not already consumed are thrown on the fire and allowed to blaze brightly. The ashes 764

[19] It was impossible to record these speeches verbatim at the time of their delivery. The writer was able to make notes, which were amplified by each speaker later telling him what he had said. Although lacking literal accuracy, the above may be considered essentially correct. [126]

764 are never disturbed, being considered, in some vague way, "bad." The tools used for digging the grave are left standing upright in the loose earth, an action for which no explanation can be given by the Bella Coola. When these various rites have been performed, the funeral party returns to the village and disperses.

766 845 At present, interment is the customary method for disposing of the bodies of all except twins, whose bodies are placed in trees. Formerly, other means were sometimes employed, as 764 they still are occasionally. Instead of inhumation, a coffin 178 was frequently placed on a scaffold close behind the deceased's house. Whenever another relative died, planks were laid across, above the first box, and the new one deposited on these, so that in time the scaffold grew to resemble a house-like structure with many compartments. In the last century a certain shaman, Askankots by name, is said to have pointed out that corpses were frequently carried off by wolves, snuuq, and other animals. For this reason he persuaded the people to inter their dead.

764 Somewhat similar to this practice was the placing of corpses in trees. Until the last few years this was sometimes done with poor children; formerly, it was not unknown even for chiefs. An elderly Kimsquit man mentioned that the coffin containing the body of his grandfather, a chief, was placed in the crotch of a tree where no rain could penetrate. This means of disposal was probably never habitual. Even at the present time, the corpse of a dearly loved child is occasionally placed above, instead of under the ground. If the parents desire to do this, they erect in the cemetery a carved figure of one of their crests and deposit the coffin on top of it. This is, of course, a graphic representation of the deceased's origin myth and symbolizes the way in which the dead person has become associated with it.

According to several of the older men, cremation was practised by the Bella Coola for some time after the first settlement of the earth. A fire was built outside the house and the body thrown on it. One rather philosophic old man suggested that in this way the soul could easily return to Nusmät·a. It is possible that this means of disposal was carried out in former times, but no informant had actually seen it practised. The Bella Coola state that cremation is carried out by the Kitlobe[39] and the Carriers. On the morning after a burning, young men of the former tribe rush to the spot and smear their faces with the semi-charred bones, amid much shouting. The Carriers are said to stand with their bodies inclined over the burning corpse and to smear on their faces any grease exuded from it. The accuracy of these statements is very doubtful, and can have no bearing on the reputed practice of cremation among the Bella Coola.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

764 764 829

The bodies of rich or poor, chiefs, commoners, or slaves, all are buried in a similar manner though with differences in the complexity of ritual. Nor is any different method practised for criminals, murdered people, or those committing suicide. It is believed that in case of self-destruction the body cannot separate into its elements and reach Nusmät·a; that part which becomes the ghost is able to go to the land below, but neither spirit nor life can ascend. According to one man, who may, however, have been affected by Christian influence, this is because Ałquntäm decrees the length of life and any wilful shortening is insulting to him. Suicide is rare among the Bella Coola and four cases only were heard of. One woman killed herself in shame at having accidentally set fire to a village, another because her husband was unduly jealous, and two men through bladder stricture.

766 762 [775]

On the whole, Bella Coola methods for disposal of the dead have altered but little since the coming of the white man. The change from sub-aerial exposure to interment was probably not due to foreign influence although the introduction of metal shovels has facilitated the digging of graves and probably hastened the movement. A change in posture has, however, taken place. In former times, a corpse was always buried [39]If not at present, at least within the memory of elderly people.

177 764

177 squatting, now it is customary to use the extended position.
764 It is impossible to state whether this is the direct result of white teaching, or whether the ease with which large boxes can now be made has led to interment at full length.

RITES FOLLOWING DISPOSAL OF THE BODY

768 Interment of the corpse does not end the ceremonial necessitated by a death in the community. As already described, some of the clothing and utensils of the dead person are burned during the funeral, but all are not destroyed at that time. The proportion kept for future treatment is immaterial, nor is there any established usage concerning the type of object reserved. During the days following the funeral, relatives of the deceased carefully gather his clothing, cooking utensils, rifles, and all other articles which have been his personal property or used exclusively by him. On the fourth day, these are taken to the cemetery by his immediate family, accompanied by as many of their friends as wish to show their sympathy. A fire is kindled near the grave and on it is deposited whatever can be burnt; other objects are either cast into the flames or piled near at hand (see Plate 17). It is most important that every article belonging to the deceased should be disposed of in this way. There are two reasons for this. First, it is considered indecent to use the possessions of a dead person; they would have the effect of poison on anyone doing so. Secondly, the ghost of the de-
[775] ceased receives goods that are burnt or deposited on the grave [753] four days after the funeral. If deprived of what belongs to him, a ghost punishes the offenders by causing sickness.
178 Occasionally a new rifle, or some other treasured possession, 768 is kept by a relative or friend; this is contrary to the established custom, but is justified by considering the article to be a gift from the deceased or a memento of him. No one would accept such a legacy unless he felt sure that the dead man

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

entertained such kindly sentiments towards him that he would be glad to have his friend receive it. 968 [178] 768

In recent years the number of incombustible objects has increased enormously with the introduction of metal utensils, gramophones, and other things obtained from white traders. 177 775 Although these are considered to be of use to the ghost, and must be carefully placed near the grave, they can be publicly exchanged for others by a relative. The sentiments expressed on such occasions are that the ghost, though aware of what is taking place, does not resent an open transfer; and that it is unnecessary to deposit the equivalent of what has been removed. There is undoubtedly a vague idea that the ghost uses, not the actual object, but its essence, which is received by the deposition. It must be emphasized that this feeling has not become crystallized to such a state that it is customary to replace goods laid on the grave with others. Such an exchange is a rare event and would cause animosity if carried out by anyone except a near relative. [578]

Sometimes a dying person requests that a house be erected over his grave, a common Bella Bella custom. This is built immediately after the funeral and articles that cannot be burnt are placed within it instead of being piled on the ground. The sorrowing relatives may choose to erect a picket fence around the spot, but no other mark for the grave is put up until a memorial potlatch several years after death. House or fence soon falls into decay and rarely an effort is made to repair either. Nor is the grave itself disturbed. Cow-parsnips, which are much used for food, grow frequently in cemeteries, but no one would gather the shoots that rise above a grave; they are food belonging to the dead person. The white man has taught the Bella Coola how to plant apple-trees and these are often set out in graveyards, though the fruit is allowed to fall to the ground for the benefit of those interred beneath. The Bella Bella are said formerly to have replaced at intervals the coffin containing a dead person, but this seems never to have been a Bella Coola practice. Indeed, a grave is never

764 [763] [177] [262] [245] [177] 765

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE5 Bellacoola NE5

Indeed, a grave is never 965 disturbed except, rarely, when it is necessary to obtain a [989] portion of a skeleton for magical purposes. In such a case, the coffin lid must be lifted up on the side away from the [961] opener, so that he looks within over its upturned edge. A person failing to obey this injunction will soon die.

968 Burning or deposition near the grave is not restricted to the actual utensils and artifacts of the deceased. There, too, must be laid dried salmon which a man has smoked for winter use, as well as pulverized berries and other foods made ready [964] by a woman; to eat food prepared by a dead person seems indescribably indecent. In recent years, the crop, if a man dies after tilling and sowing a field, is allowed to ripen, and then rot unharvested. So, too, the canoe in which a body has been brought home must be destroyed. The Bella Coola are not always able to state reasons for these actions, but it is [961] apparent that the underlying sentiment is that the taboo of [984] death lies upon any object prepared by the deceased, or that has been in contact with a corpse.

964 The rituals described above may be considered as religious in nature; almost equally important are the social require-431 ments of paying those who have assisted at a funeral. This 556 indebtedness falls on the near relatives, though all members
[614] of the ancestral family are obligated in a somewhat indefinite manner. If a canoe has been destroyed that did not belong to the deceased, the owner must be recompensed. Presents must be given to the pall-bearers, to the woman who bore the flaming bark, to the grave-diggers, to those who delivered laudatory orations, and to all others who assisted in any way. Failure to do so brands the relatives as misers with little respect for the deceased; lavish recompense shows that they have the outlook and minds of chiefs. Consequently, even poor people try to give as generous rewards as possible, both for their own sakes and out of respect to the dead person. Unfortunately, it was impossible to obtain details of the ceremony at which this takes place. The increase in wealth in recent years has made it possible to give memorial potlatches soon after death

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

and recompense to funeral assistants is usually deferred until that time. Such was often true even in former years, although poor people used to call their fellow-villagers together for the express purpose of publicly rewarding those who had helped to bury one of their relatives. It is probable that a ceremony of this kind was of a simple type. Another expedient is, and was, to give gifts to the grave-diggers and others at any convenient ceremony, such as a non-sacred tsaok dance. As repeatedly mentioned, when the people have been called together for a ceremony, advantage is often taken of the gathering to settle debts or to perform rites of an entirely different nature. It is probable that the summoning of guests solely to witness the payment of helpers was always unusual; at present it never occurs. On those occasions when a body was buried in secret after the carrying away of a dummy figure by the crest, the goods of the deceased were deposited as usual in the cemetery. Those who carried them were the ones who had performed the secret interment, and when publicly recompensed for taking articles to the grave it was possible to increase the value of the gifts as reward for the hidden rite without exposing the subterfuge. 764 431 556 [575] [796] [766]

Another type of ceremonial taking place after a funeral is the cleansing from the contamination of death of near relatives of the deceased, and of those who have handled the corpse. If spring salmon or olachen are running, pall-bearers must not go near the river for ten days, or twenty according to some informants, after taking a body to the grave. They have become tainted with ceremonial uncleanness which, if brought to the river bank, would poison the salmon. Unwillingness to become affected in this way led, on at least one occasion, to an elderly, friendless slave being carried out to the cemetery by some old women who covered him with boards. The taint on grave-diggers cannot be removed, but automatically lapses after ten days. 764 783 [825]

The individual in greatest danger is the husband or wife whose consort has passed away. It is believed that Sä-lma [776]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

764 comes and sits on the coffin during every funeral, seeking fur-783 ther victims. Death has so contaminated a widow or widower that she or he will fall an easy prey unless ceremonially puri-[776] fied. No special acts are carried out between interment and the burning of goods four days later, but the following four days must be spent in a small shelter of branches behind the village, hidden from sight in the forest. Within this the man or woman lies on the ground with legs close together and bent [841] at the knees, in the same position as a girl during the four days after her first menstruation. A male friend accompanies a widower; a female, a widow. This companion keeps a fire burning and administers to the comfort of the patient, for such a bereaved person is considered to be. Every evening the two return home and leave again the following morning. On one of these days, the companion scours the woods east of the village to find four spruce saplings growing within sight of each other in an east to west direction. To this place he leads the survivor on the morning after the fourth day of concealment* in the shelter. He bends down the top of the western sapling and ties it into a loop with a rope composed of alternate strands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark. The widower, or widow, crawls through this opening to the east and then makes a circle, sunwise, around the sapling. Passing to the next one, the same procedure is repeated, and so in succession for the third and fourth, each being left tied into a loop. There are at least two variations in this rite: Instead of passing through four saplings, some individuals choose to crawl four times through a single one, with a sunwise circuit intervening in every case. If the survivor be a member of a family in which it is customary to use four saplings, and if the friend cannot find four in proper alignment, he cuts a number of spruce branches and sets them upright, butts in the ground, leaving a small hole between them. Four sets of these are arranged, as substitutes for four saplings, and the crawling through takes

*There is variation in the exact time for this rite. Some individuals practise it on the fifth day after death and omit the waiting in the shelter.

place in the manner already described. After passing through the fourth hole, or for the fourth time through the single opening, the two go to some lonely pool in the forest where the mourner washes. They light a fire and deposit on it some of his clothing, placing the rest in a stump or hollow tree. The friend always takes with him a supply of new clothing which the person being purified puts on and returns home, cleansed from the immediate taint of death. 764 783

The above rite protects widower or widow, but does not alter the fact that for one year they are ceremonially "unclean" and must obey sundry taboos. They must not go to the bank of the river, or even appear at the front door of a house facing it. To do so is displeasing to the salmon; for the same reason they cannot eat this fish unless it has been smoked. If they wish to travel on the ocean, they cannot embark at the village but must go through the woods to a point on the shore and there be picked up by the canoe. There is a regular "Widows and Widowers Rock" about a mile on either side of every village on the ocean. The one near Kimsquit is called Sqlen'ti, and there is thought to be blood on it. A person mourning a consort must wear a hat decorated with miniature coppers of which the bottoms are bent upwards; should this be omitted, when the offender remarries, the new husband or wife will soon die. 765 [783] [825] [262] [484] [292] [761]

In addition to these taboos, there are customary laws of behaviour, an infraction of which renders the offender liable to social disapproval. Widows and widowers should cut their hair short, and the former should rub ashes on the face. Sexual intercourse is prohibited to both sexes; if this rule is broken, the relatives of the deceased are insulted. Remarriage should not take place for at least a year, although among poor people it sometimes occurs after only six months, in which case all taboos and restrictions automatically cease. There is no law on this point, but it is considered fitting to allow this period to elapse. These requirements clearly indicate that bereavement is not merely an individual affair, but entails social and [621] [302] [834] [587] [735]

765 religious rites affecting the whole community. In spite of the prohibitions enforced, it is said that a widow or widower usually becomes fat after the death of a partner. This observation agrees with several instances known to the writer, but whether it is of universal application is doubtful, although the Bella Coola emphatically state that this is the case.

Memorial Rites

THE MEMORIAL POTLATCH

177 The most important, as well as the most complicated, 552 mourning rite is the memorial potlatch, sewanit, for which so 769 much wealth is required that it can be carried out by chiefs
[622] alone. This ceremony, being associated with nanak rites, has altered enormously in form within recent years. Before the introduction of cone-shaped whistles and other foreign elements, it was almost indistinguishable from an ordinary potlatch and the two were occasionally combined, having as central feature the return of the deceased in the form of his crest. Among the tribes of the outer coast, especially the Bella Bella, the two types of ceremonial were apparently distinct, and as the Bella Coola adopted more and more of their neighbours' nanak ritual, they followed their custom in this respect as well. It is said that a certain Nedkila, uncle of a man about sixty years of age in 1922, was the last to combine both. The Bella Bella felt that he had thereby committed a ritual error for which he would be punished; within a few years he died, and the Bella Coola assumed that this was due to the unanimous expectation of his death on the part of the Bella Bella. From that time onwards, the Bella Coola were careful to separate features belonging to potlatches from those of memorial potlatches.

After a comparatively few years, the white man's domin-[648] ation had increased so enormously on the central coast that the potlatch, including both types, was prohibited by law. Owing to the consequent difficulty of performing complicated

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

rites, the Bella Coola were again led to carry out at a single gathering features which properly belonged to several. To combine the memorial potlatch with the potlatch, being a return to an earlier custom, presented no serious difficulties and was consequently widely adopted. The Kimsquit people, moreover, seem never to have adopted the clear Bella Bella differentiation, and as the rapid decrease in population threw them in ever closer contact with the Bella Coola, their influence tended to lessen differences between the two ceremonials. 177 556* 769

At the present time, a memorial potlatch is almost identical with an ordinary potlatch in practice. The same rites are often carried out at both; each varies considerably, and when the distinctive elements are omitted the two become indistinguishable. None the less, they are never confused in the minds of the participants. The house where a potlatch, ʌm, is taking place is called a nuxlimsta, that where a memorial potlatch, skwanät, is occurring, a nuskwanätsta. In giving invitations and making comments, heralds are careful not to refer to the ritual under the wrong name; in fact, it may be said that the chief difference between the two is in the minds of the donor and his guests. Sociologically, both are considered to be on a par. Equal wealth is required, and each can be performed only by a chief, both on account of the expenditure involved and owing to the difficulties in procedure which are thought to be too great for a lesser man to surmount. 556* 769 [203] [622]

Difference in the donor's motives is usually sufficient to separate a memorial potlatch from an ordinary one. The latter is given by a chief desirous of increasing his prestige by lavish expenditure, for which one of the excuses is the validation of the appearance of a dead relative. Although this is the central feature, so many other rites are performed that it is sometimes obscured or may, indeed, be omitted entirely. On the other hand, a memorial potlatch occurs as soon as possible after the death of a father, mother, or other dearly loved kinsman, and it is clear to all that the donor's reasons for the rite are to commemorate the deceased, and to console himself and his imme- [622]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*556 diate family. Confusion is probable only when a chief is 769 bereaved after he has stored up goods and made preliminary preparations for a potlatch; he may then carry out the rites intended, but designate the ceremony a memorial potlatch.
[575] More often, however, the affair is limited to rites associated with the deceased. Consequently, there is omission of the initiation of neophytes into the sisaok and a'alk societies,* there is no establishment of new seats for young relatives of the donor, and no strengthening of his own. It must be empha-
[184] sized once more that there is no unalterable sequence of prescribed rituals at either potlatch or memorial potlatch; the omissions just mentioned are customary, not universal, and when present the ritual of the two ceremonies is identical. Except on those rare occasions when omitted at a potlatch, the return of a dead relative is the central feature of both.

[178] In recent years, the great increase in wealth has made it possible for a chief to perform a memorial potlatch soon after the death of an esteemed relative. This was rarely the case in former times, but as there was no other reason for which valuables were so ardently desired, every expedient was used to obtain the necessary goods. Occasionally, a chief happened to have the needful goods stored up so that he could give a memorial potlatch almost immediately. To such a fortunate individual the term, yestla, was applied, a word difficult to translate but combining the significances of rich, ready, fortunate, and reserved.

[796] Memorial potlatches, like those of the ordinary kind, are usually held in the early autumn, though occasionally one may be postponed until after the kusiut season. When an intending donor has decided that he owns sufficient goods, he first calls in his fellow-chiefs and makes known his intentions, at the same time expounding in considerable detail the myths which [533] he proposes to use as themes for mourning songs, and for other

*Performance of such rites at a memorial potlatch would be considered sinful by the Bella Bella and were always omitted during the period when their influence was important.

prerogatives connected with the ceremony. The actual re- 556* counting of the myths may be done by a fluent speaker on 769 behalf of the bereaved man, and when he has finished speaking, [533] it is proper for several of his peers to make complimentary [537] speeches, lauding the future donor for his intentions. Food is then served and the gathering breaks up.

The preliminaries of a memorial potlatch do not differ from those of an ordinary one. There is the same counting and recounting of goods, the same giving and receiving of presents, the same lending and borrowing. When at last the donor is ready, the heralds call his fellow-villagers to his house for announcement of the arrangements and allotment of the work. As at a potlatch, food is provided on a lavish scale, and there is the same sham-fight with a battering-ram ending in the destruction of part of the house. Then the carpenters receive their instructions; some to make different sections of the new structure, some to paint ancestral designs on the front and back walls, and some to make the various objects required.

The first difference between a memorial and an ordinary 211 potlatch is apparent at this allotment of work. Instead of a 556* totem-pole to record the glories of the donor's ancestry,[21] car- 764 penters are requested to make memorial-posts for the dead 769 relative who is being commemorated. These are erected in the cemetery near the grave and are of three kinds, although it is unusual for all three to be set up for a single chief.

The first consists of a wooden post carved with the design of one or more of the deceased's crests (see Plates 19 and 20). [532]
These figures are usually representations of the bird or animal cloaks used by his first ancestors; it is customary to portray the one traced through the father on the right, that traced through the mother on the left. Instead of a cloak, the figure may portray the post down which swarmed his first ancestor in the beginning of time, or Mount Nusqalst in human form, wearing a broad-rimmed hat as he did before he turned to

*Even the construction of a new house and the painting of new designs is often omitted.

211 stone and served as landing-place for some of the first settlers.
556 In fact, any of the dead person's crests may be used according 764 to the wishes of the chief giving the memorial potlatch. A 769 figure displayed in this way cannot be used as the guise in which the dead relative returns, but as every individual has several crests, inability to use one does not make it difficult to carry out the rite. According to one well-informed old man, when a design has once been used in a cemetery it cannot again be shown by members of the ancestral family, having itself become "dead." Other informants flatly contradicted this statement, and it seems clear that the above is true only with regard to the use of the figure in connection with the return of the deceased. The erection of the figure serves to remind all beholders, especially foreign guests summoned to the memorial potlatch, of the ancestral myth of the deceased. It is, there-[778] fore, equivalent to a totem-pole erected during a man's lifetime, in fact, one of these is sometimes moved to the cemetery to serve as a memorial-post (see Plate 21). Instead of placing a representation of the crest in the cemetery, one is sometimes painted on broad boards and placed on some conspicuous promontory where all who pass by will see it and think of the person commemorated.

The second type of memorial consists of plain poles set upright in the cemetery, one for each major ceremony given by the deceased. Potlatches, memorial potlatches, and kukusiutek [609] (II, p. 29) are alone indicated in this way, these being the only ones to which foreign guests are invited. These poles suggest, in a general way, the greatness of the deceased.

The third type of memorial-post comprises representations of the goods given away by the deceased. These are usually [532] painted on boards attached to a post set up near the grave. On this are pictures of canoes, coppers, slaves, and other valuables distributed at potlatches or memorial potlatches (see Plate 22). Alternatively, there may be a series of small poles, each surmounted by a model canoe manned by miniature human figures, symbolic of a canoe and slaves given away

(see Plate 23). So, too, wooden representations of coppers are often affixed to an upright post. Not only men are commemorated in this way, a father often places over his daughter's grave pictures of the goods used to rebuy her from her husband; wooden plaques representing coppers are commonly used for this purpose.[24] Such symbols are usually cut down after a year owing to a vague feeling that it is not proper for them to remain standing too long. The function of this type of memorial is to mark the social status of the dead person as judged by the riches given away by him, or on his behalf, during his life-time. With the introduction of writing, the Bella Coola have been quick to recognize it as an easy means for recording the wealth distributed by a chief. In consequence, signs are often painted and erected, giving in figures a statement of his financial transactions. Another recent introduction has been the tombstone. One of these is often set up with the name of the deceased carved on it to perpetuate his memory, and a representation of his crest to record his ancestral history. Such a memorial combines the functions of the first and third types.

211 556* 764 769 [532] [177] [212] [532]

As the carpenters labour at the memorials, other arrangements for the ceremony proceed apace. As at a potlatch, the fellow-villagers of the donor may be invited repeatedly to his house for the performance of susaok dances, but this feature is often omitted, especially if there are no neophytes to be initiated. The mask to be worn by the deceased relative must be prepared in secret; or if several are to be commemorated at the single ceremony, one must be made ready for each. As the time draws near, envoys are dispatched to invite foreign guests if it has been decided to have strangers present. This has been customary for many years, but during the period when no features of the potlatch were allowed at a memorial potlatch, the latter was sometimes carried out in the presence of the donor's fellow-villagers alone. The actual departure of the *556 769 messengers may be marked with the same ritual as at a potlatch, but there is always curtailment of sisaok features if rites of that nature are to be omitted.

Meanwhile other preparations have not been neglected. 424 Among the prerogatives embodied in many origin myths, is that of the presence of professional mourners at memorial *556 769 potlatches. If mention of these is made in the ancient tradition of the donor's ancestral family, it is a matter of pride for [767] him to do as was done by his ancestors in the distant past. For example, it may be recorded that at the memorial potlatch of some ancient chief, a number of his younger relatives appeared with red paint smeared upon their faces, with finely chopped undyed cedar-bark in the hair, or with bands of the [765] same material across their heads. Alquntäm had decreed that they should thus exhibit their grief, and the descendants of the chief have since had the privilege of doing likewise. Such signs of mourning may not, however, be worn without proper validation. It is only the members of the ancestral family who are entitled to don these marks, and among them, only those whose right has been confirmed by the distribution of presents. This is a masculine professional prerogative, known [562] by the same name as the feminine one of uttering a droning cry to which it is closely akin. The right is ratified at memorial potlatches, and the donor of one is glad to do so as a means of displaying his own wealth as well as of making plain the glory of his ancestors to whom the one being commemorated has [767] returned. There is no mention of professional mourners in [171] the myths of many families, nor are they ever as important in Bella Coola as among the Bella Bella and other tribes of the outer coast. If such belong to the family of the donor, he notifies the incumbents and asks them to be ready, although, eager to act, they seldom wait for such an invitation.

533 The most difficult task is the preparation of mourning songs *556 at which the singers toil for several weeks. The donor first 769 invites them to his house and recounts the myths from which they must be composed. These may include several traditions of different ancestral families to which the deceased belonged, 533 irrespective of whether or not he had used a name from one. 556

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Being a member of the group, its songs can legally be used in 769 his honour. Elements from different myths are often combined into one composition, corresponding to the different localities and characters which the dead person has visited in travelling back the path of his multiple ancestors to the beginning of time. If one person only is being commemorated, four songs are prepared; if several, two are used for each. Three [801] for any individual is unlucky. Two types, skwanät and änultnänk, are in common usage, and the singers, after conversation with the donor of the ceremony, decide which shall be employed. The former describes in some detail features from one or more of the deceased's ancestral myths, mentions the journey which he has taken to visit the individuals and scenes referred to, and calls on him to assume the form of his first forefather. A common theme is to state the origin of his name, and how he loved it so greatly that he left the earth to follow it back through time and space. The following is an abbreviated version of such a song, based on the origin myth of Käliäkus:

"We have been unable to satisfy you here. Go whither Käliäkus came, and become a raven. Go to the east and get abalone-shell; go to the west and get copper. They will satisfy you."

Another skwanät of the same type is:

"Your first ancestor circled the world with the aid of an abalone-shell paddle. Do you likewise. That will gratify you as nothing on earth could do."

On the other hand, an änultnänk seldom refers to the ancestral history of the deceased, but to his actions during life. It records the number of slaves, canoes, and other valuables given away at potlatches,[24] and alludes to other praiseworthy actions. This type of mourning song, though usually used [622]

[24]An analogous method of making known a man's distribution of wealth is by a written sign over his door (see Plate 24).

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

533 only for a chief, can be employed for a dead child. In this case, *556 the theme describes the efforts of the parents to incorporate 769 the deceased in the traditions of their ancestors, and the [622] number of times he had been ceremonially married. The text of one used a few years ago is:

"We said, Hail! Sunxälotla [the child's crest was the Sun] when she was born. What more could we have done? Why did she leave us?"

The text may refer to the prerogative of employing mourners, as in the following:

"Come ye professional mourners, help me to give voice to my lamentations."

The tunes of mourning songs are usually remembered from year to year, and the singers may merely alter words to make an old song applicable. In some cases, such compositions are [424] changed so slightly that they become virtually possessions of an ancestral family, and may then be preserved for generations until even the history of the names embodied is forgotten.
[174] Occasionally, ancient relationship between two such groups can be deduced from the occurrence of the same names in their mourning songs, although all traditions of intermarriage have been forgotten. There is considerable difference between the tunes of skwanät and änulunänk; in fact, this distinction may be more important than the themes, since the latter do not invariably conform to the types just described. A few items of ancestral history may be incorporated into a song dealing primarily with the actions of the deceased and vice versa. Sometimes four of one type are used, sometimes two of each. Much thought is devoted to the compositions, the singers meeting every day to try over and improve one another's efforts. The texts, long and complicated, require much practice, since any error would be an admission of gross inefficiency. These daily rehearsals take place in the donor's house and he is required to provide food for the singers. It is not uncommon to use a [177] song of Bella Bella origin, since the Bella Coola admit that members of that tribe excel in compositions of this type.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Such an adoption occurs only when the deceased was the owner of a Bella Bella myth and the song in question had been used to mourn a real or fictitious relative. It is contrary to custom to use the tune or words of a song not composed for a member of the deceased's ancestral family. 556* 769 [533]

The actual delivering of invitations by the envoys to the desired guests does not differ from the manner already described, except that they are asked "to come to visit the sick [donor]." The significance is, of course, that the mourner's condition is that of a patient. To indicate the reason of their visit, guests at a memorial potlatch always wear a little dyed cedar-bark around their heads. [177] [203] [292]

On arrival, the first party of foreign guests is conducted to the donor's house, where they make themselves comfortable in the section allotted to them by the heralds. An elderly Bella Coola chief who is a famous orator has been asked by the donor to speak, and he rises to do so as soon as his fellow-villagers have entered and taken their places. No set phrases are used, but the speaker usually begins by reminding all present of the way in which their ancestors were created in Nusmät·a, and how all must return thither. It is an occasion on which eloquence is essential, and the speaker delights in using as many archaic words and rhetorical expressions as possible, with constant references to religious beliefs and ancient history as recorded in mythology. Then he speaks of the death which is the occasion of the ceremony. If the deceased were an old man, he is referred to by a special term not in common usage, nudak·än, which implies wisdom and respect as well as extreme age. The orator states that he has fallen, using the term ḋoyäx, normally applied to the thunderous crash of some mighty tree. He speaks of a young chief as sxwᵘllämkis, short-lived, a person who has been hunted down by the supernatural Carpenters. He continues by sketching the works of the deceased, the number of potlatches he gave and the manner in which his name was known to many tribes. Finally he tells of the donor's grief, and of how this "sickness" has been alle- 537 556* 769 [195]

537 viated by the presence of welcome guests. Mention is fre-
* 556 quently made of the journey taken by the dead man to the 769 scenes of his ancestral myths. In addition to being an orator, the speaker must also be a numitl chief, since it is felt that [622] none other can have the necessary assurance and poise to refer to these most sacred and important subjects. During the speech, assistants blow eagle down over the heads of all present.

Food has been prepared in advance, and as soon as the speaker has finished, the heralds call the guests to partake of it. The first course is then distributed, smoked salmon mixed [264] with olachen grease. Speeches are sometimes delivered during this part of the meal, as well as at the second course, cranberries with more olachen grease. If the guests have arrived during the afternoon, there is no delay between the feast and the ritual that follows, but if they have come during the morning, there is a gap until the evening. Visitors usually time their arrival for the early part of the afternoon.

537 The next event is a speech from one of the foreign chiefs, phrased in grandiloquent terms similar to those used by the * 556 Bella Coola orator. He speaks of the manner in which the 769 supernatural Carpenters have hunted the deceased, but reminds 609 his hearers that this is because Ałquntäm has decreed it, therefore all must be for the best. He refers to the dead man's crest, 533 and to the manner in which this guise will be available to him.
During the day, the singers have been careful to learn the tune of a mourning song used by the ancestral family of each foreign chief likely to speak. This they now beat out, often assisted by some of the guests, and always accompanied by their singing. No one dances to accompany the song; it is merely a tactful mark of sympathy, implying that the speaker himself knows the grief occasioned by death, and, also, that he too is sufficiently important to be able to use a mourning song. If, as is usually the case, there is more than one influential chief in the party, a second rises to speak, repeating in different terms the sentiments expressed by his predecessor. Another mourning song is sung for him in the same way. Sometimes as many as five or six speeches are made, each followed by a song of the same type. In such circumstances it is impossible for the Bella Coola musicians to learn all the tunes, but if five or six chiefs are present, it implies the presence of a large delegation among whom are always a number of singers. It is they who really beat out the tunes, assisted by their Bella Coola confrères. When the last song has been sung, the guests present their hosts with gifts brought for the purpose. The donor himself receives the most valuable, but all the Bella Coola are remembered, chiefs to a greater extent than commoners. Such gifts are not to be returned; in fact, to do so specifically, especially soon after the receipt, would be insulting. After the distribution the evening concludes with the usual meal. 537 556* 769 609 533

This ritual is repeated at the arrival of every group of guests. It is uncertain whether or not all the mourning songs are again beaten out after the song of the final speaker of the last group. This seems to have been done occasionally, and the distribution of presents by the guests likewise postponed. Just before the gathering breaks up, the heralds call out: "Alnaixwotsnmap."

This serves as intimation that the Bella Coola rites will take place the following morning, and the guests prepare accordingly. Occasionally, when a man is poor, a memorial potlatch is held without the presence of foreign guests.[36] In such cases the preliminaries just described are, of course, omitted and the above call marks the commencement of the ceremony. 556* 769 [609]

The next day the guests gather in the donor's house, clad in their best. The mourners are in attendance, each conspicuous with the proper mark. In many cases several of them carry miniature totem-poles, carved to represent bird or animal cloaks assumed by the donor's ancestors, and which [36]This was probably quite common during the period when all potlatch features were omitted.

556 will now be the forms of the one who has recently died. As 769 soon as all have taken their places, an eloquent chief whose aid has been requested for the purpose stands up and recounts [537] the donor's ancestral myth in some detail, mentioning the source and meaning of the mourners' marks and the designs of the totem-poles. Then he continues to the effect that the chief will "cry" by relating the history of his ancestors, which is also the history of the journey taken by his kinsman, and that this recital will shore him up. The word used for this, snutlänkn, [195] is the one commonly employed for raising a heavy burden with the aid of a lever. Then the singers begin to beat [533] out the first of the mourning songs, accompanying it with their voices and assisted by as many of the audience as are familiar with words and tune. Every effort is made to make the singing as impressive as possible to add dignity to the recital of the journey taken by the person who is being commemorated. The guests listen attentively and are suitably impressed by the ancestral history of the donor and his family. All the songs that have been prepared are sung in succession in the same manner. The lack of dancing distinguishes this type of cere-[535] mony[1] from all others and adds somewhat to its impressiveness.

After the last song is the proper time for validating young [424] relatives of the donor as mourners. One of the miniature [425] totem-poles, which are light enough to be carried in the hands, is brought from the back-room and given to the boy on whom this prerogative is being conferred. An eloquent speaker explains the meanings of the designs so displayed and enough of the family's ancestral history to make clear whence, and how, they were obtained. The singers begin to beat time slowly, and the youth endeavours to keep time with his feet, while he continues to hold the pole.

Meanwhile the donor and his immediate relatives have been arranging the piles of presents with the inevitable counting and [537] re-counting. As at a potlatch, a fluent speaker is commissioned to hold up the objects, state whence they have been obtained, to whom they are going, and for what purpose. He says, for example: 556 * 769

"Fifty skins become nothing on the path of Kāliāks."

Everyone knows that this means the expenditure of that amount for the singing of a mourning song in connection with the myth in which Kāliāks appears. Gifts must be given for each song, and it is the desire of the donor that they be of fitting value. So, too, is the validation of professional mourners confirmed. The goods having thus been displayed, a first distribution, called "Tears" with reference to the donor's grief, is made, each guest receiving a gift of the same worth. It is not returnable, being the legalization of the ceremony he has just witnessed. This is followed by donations to the carpenters, the singers, the professional mourners, and all others who have rendered assistance; in essence, these are pay, though they are always referred to as free-will gifts made in gratitude for services rendered. Like the last, they are not returnable. Finally, any goods remaining from the store that has been brought out are given to chiefs and other influential members of the audience. Though not clearly stated, the recipients know that these are really investment-presents; when they reciprocate, they mention that they are repaying a gift made at a memorial potlatch. A plentiful meal is now served, during which several chiefs make complimentary speeches, and the gathering breaks up. [533] [425] [465] [426]

In former times, when features of the ordinary potlatch were banned from a memorial potlatch, the ceremony just described was the central point of the proceedings. It was this public song-recital of the journey taken by his deceased relative which alleviated the donor's sorrow and filled him with pride. A few days after, in the late afternoon, the heralds called back the guests and the songs were sung and re-sung. Miniature totem-poles were not used, nor were professional mourners in evidence; the sole function of the gathering was to provide opportunity for learning the songs. They were repeated until far into the night, when a large meal was served and the guests [533]

* 556 departed. A few days later the same ritual was carried out 769 again, with a similar lavish distribution of food. This was often done at intervals of two or three days for several weeks, depending on how much food the donor was prepared to use. The amount required was so great that the rite was considered, in some ways, more difficult than a potlatch.

[178] As already mentioned, however, it became customary in the last century to incorporate features of the ordinary potlatch into one of a memorial nature. In such cases the first [533] singing of the mourning songs with display of marks by the professional mourners is as just recorded, but there is no recalling of the guests merely to listen once more to the songs. Instead, the ritual differs but slightly from that of an ordinary potlatch as already described (I, p. 182). An occasion is found to conduct the guests to the memorial-posts erected, and to in-
[178] form them of the significance of the designs depicted. This same practice has been continued since the introduction of tombstones, and the meaning of the writing upon them is interpreted. The entry of the deceased in the form of his crest, and the subsequent use of a copper, is the same as already recorded. This is frequently followed by the singing of a susaok mourning [533] song if one of the near relatives owns this prerogative of foreign origin. If so, he walks slowly around the fire in a wide circle, shaking his rattle, and singing, unaccompanied. Most, if not all [177] of these songs, are in the Bella Bella language and the right to [425] use one has in every case been obtained through intermarriage with a member of that tribe. At intervals, heralds call out:

"Listen to the chief's lament."[27]

When presents are distributed to validate the whole ceremony, mention is always made of the different features for which they are given. As at a potlatch, the most important is the return of the dead, but at a memorial potlatch another [211] essential is the display of the memorial-posts. These have been [764] carved, painted, and set up, but are worthless unless validated

[27] There is no reason why this should not take place at a potlatch, but no instance of its performance was noted.

by presents, and the greater the number of these, the greater the value of the memorial. Nothing need be added concerning this point, or other rites, to the detailed description given in vol. I, chap. IV.

Psychologically, the memorial potlatch is of tremendous importance. There may be a vague feeling that the ritual is of actual assistance to the deceased since grease burnt at it reaches him, and is of service to him, but such a belief is no more than an intangible sentiment of no weight in the lives of the people. Quite otherwise is its effect on the survivors, especially on the donor. A memorial potlatch is considered the fitting tribute of respect to a chief, and if none of his near relatives should hold one, they would brand themselves as unmindful of the fame of their dead kinsman. In recent years the white man's law has prohibited the potlatch, but chiefs [648] have often preferred to go to jail rather than to forgo this form of memorial. The reason for this cannot be explained better than in the words of an old man whose only daughter, a "Chieftainess," died in 1922. He determined to hold a memorial potlatch and expressed himself to the writer, as follows:

"If I should fail to do what is right under the circumstances, to do what my ancestors would have done, my heart would be dead, dead as my daughter. But if I call the people, if we sing mourning songs for my child, I will be able to bear my grief. I shall have done what is right, and will be able to hold up my head with anyone, knowing that the rites have been performed for my child which are due her as a chief. If I allow her to be neglected, I would be ashamed and miserable. Jim [another "chief"] warned me when I first told him of my intention that the law forbade such ceremonies. I cannot help that. If I am sent to jail, to jail shall I go. I would rather have that happen than that my daughter should not receive fitting treatment as a chief."

In this case, though only abbreviated rites were carried out, their performance unquestionably lessened the father's grief, a fact observed on several occasions. Not only does it comfort 556 769 a man and assuage his sorrow to know that he has shown fitting respect to the dead, there is also a gain in social prestige. As the whole community respects, admires, and sometimes envies a man for having carried out a memorial potlatch, there is no doubt that he is pleased and gratified to such an extent that his grief is dulled. These two factors must constantly be kept in mind; memorial potlatches serve to commemorate the dead, but in so doing they add to the social importance of the donors. The two combine to bring considerable comfort to the chief who has lost a dear relative. In some cases the social prestige is the real motive, the grief assumed and unimportant; but in others the latter is the only factor that matters, and a chief is entirely oblivious to any increase in his own status. In most memorial potlatches, both feelings are present in the mind of the donor, and both are gratified.

DETAILED ACCOUNT OF A FUNERAL

764 114 In the preceding pages, an attempt has been made to describe the traditional death rites of the Bella Coola. The following section comprises a detailed account of funeral ceremonies witnessed in 1922. The contrast between these and the ones already recorded, will indicate some of the changes [178] in custom which are of such importance in studies of cultural [182] growth or decline. The following description will also serve [57] to demonstrate a point repeatedly mentioned, the manner in which business transactions and arrangements of all kinds take place whenever the people have been called together.

[123] On June 27, 1922, the death occurred in Bella Coola of Jessie, Mrs. Samuel King, daughter of Captain Schooner. The latter, now deceased, was one of the writer's most trusted friends, and as a result of this friendship it was possible not only to attend the actual rites, but to ascertain much of the feeling underlying them. This advantage had its drawbacks, since it was manifestly impossible to question either the father or the husband of the woman too closely. The details will be described, in spite of some repetition entailed thereby, both to record customs surviving the decay of Bella Coola ritual, and as a means of illustrating the sentiments of the participants. To avoid native terminology, white man's names will be used throughout. It will be necessary to understand the relationships of those taking part in the ceremony, as shown in the following pedigrees: 764 [114] 601 764

764 159 stepson, George Nelson, had not been living with his wife for about one year.

Early in the afternoon of June 27, Captain Schooner was notified by telephone of the serious illness of his daughter at the cannery where she was working. He set out immediately, but found her dead on his arrival. Without waiting to consult Samuel King, he called together the chiefs who happened to be [622] in the vicinity, Willie Mack, Jim Pollard, Billy Pollard, Bobby Nebby, and Alexander Clallaman.[11] He informed them that 764 he did not propose to let his daughter be thrown carelessly into 769 the ground like a dog, but that he was going to hold a memorial potlatch immediately after the funeral. Schooner, being a *556 namitl chief as well as father of the dead woman, was able to 159 do as he liked, and no one objected to this plan, although in [178] former times such a ceremony neither took place at once, nor in summer. If Samuel had been present, he would have been consulted as a matter of course. It was quite fitting for Jessie to be buried by her father, since she had borne her husband no children, and had been rebought several times. Moreover, Samuel lacked the determination and prestige of his father-in-law. Having settled this main point, Captain Schooner intimated that as Jessie's granddaughter, Dan Nelson's infant, was at the point of death, it would be well to combine the mourning for both at the single ceremony. No mention was made of the amount to be used for the rite. Schooner himself had $200 to expend for the purpose which would have been sufficient, and his attitude was that he neither knew nor cared whether his relatives would assist him. Soon after the other chiefs had left, Reuben Schooner arrived from the logging-camp from which he had been summoned. Father and son discussed arrangements not only for the actual interment, a simple matter, but for the memorial potlatch. It was decided that the dead woman should return as a composite figure consisting of Eagle, Raven, and Blackfish, three of her crests of which the masks were available. They agreed that Timothy Snow[48] was the best carpenter available and that he should be commissioned to put them in shape and arrange their use. Reuben wanted to sing a sisaak mourning song, to which he had a prerogative derived from his Bella Bella mother, and it was also decided that the band[49] should play. Reuben informed his father that he would contribute $60 towards the expenditure.

Meanwhile Jessie had been washed by female friends, clad in her best clothing, and laid in her coffin. This was a rough box, contributed by the manager of the cannery and shaped like a white man's coffin. At intervals, women came near and wailed dolorously without heeding others similarly engaged. The news was carried to all the Bella Coola, those men who owned gasoline launches taking the word to the logging-camps without being requested to do so. A Carrier Indian who happened to be returning from the cannery spread the word through the village, where each woman who received the message hurried off to some friend, with whom she began to wail.

Early on the following morning, Captain Schooner returned home with his wife, Jessie's stepmother. He had been crying and was sad, but seemed willing to talk. He spoke of the proposed memorial potlatch, and expressed the sentiments recorded on vol. I, p. 473. He was grave and dignified, absolutely determined to perform what he considered to be the necessary ritual, oblivious of consequences, and heedless of what he held to be an unjust law. During that summer, Captain Schooner had been a rather heavy drinker, but on this occasion he abstained from wine, and said that he hoped no one would show disrespect to his daughter by appearing in a drunken condition either at the funeral or the subsequent rites. It is [49] Most of the younger Bella Coola were members of the band, performing white man's music on white man's instruments. Andy Schooner was handicapped, but it is unlikely that this influenced the decision, since the performance of the band was customary at funerals when the writer was in Bella Coola.

764 worthy of record that his wishes were scrupulously obeyed.
159 During the morning he was visited by the singers and other chiefs to discuss details of the coming ceremonial.

Meanwhile Samuel King had been summoned from his 764 logging-camp. He wished to show his own grief, and also his 159 sorrow that the union between his family and the Schooners, 584 forged by his marriage to Jessie, should be terminated. No children had been born to cement the bond. He consulted his brother and sister, who agreed with him that a marriage between his daughter, by a former wife, and George Nelson would be desirable. The girl was consulted and raised no objections.
[764 Samuel then addressed Captain Schooner who was favourably [585] disposed, so it was decided that this ceremony should take place in connection with the memorial potlatch. It would be a real, not a fictitious marriage, as the girl had reached adolescence several years previously.

764 Another visitor to Captain Schooner that morning was 159 Joe Williams. Several years earlier, when he had given a ceremony in honour of two of his children who had died, Captain Schooner had contributed $100 as "A Blanket for George Nelson's Wife." This was really part of the marriage [583] transaction, although deferred for a number of years after the actual time of the wedding. This sum had been divided as follows: $20 to Joe Williams; $20 to Mrs. Joe Williams; $10 to Mrs. George Nelson; $10 to her brother; $20 to Lame Charlie; and $20 to Mrs. Lame Charlie. Joe consulted the recipients and found that all were willing to repay their indebtedness at this time. Captain Schooner did not ask for it, but Joe was glad of the opportunity to do the proper thing at the right time and thus rise in popular estimation. He and his relatives decided to return $130, a sum which he mentioned to Captain Schooner that morning.

[582] Joe Williams, his wife, and Mrs. George Nelson also decided to take advantage of the gathering to relieve the last named from her husband. The fact that they had been separated for at least a year and that the woman had been living an immoral life did not alter the necessity of rebuying her "to make good the path" of her children. For this purpose they decided to give a copper and a sum of money; it was impossible to learn the exact amount. Joe told Captain Schooner of their intention. 764 159 [583]

About noon the body was brought in a canoe from the cannery in its closed coffin and lifted ashore at a convenient spot near the cemetery. Those manning the canoe were young men who happened to be at the cannery, irrespective of whether or not they were related to Jessie. The coffin was laid on a grassy place and Captain Schooner seated himself beside it. People were passing and repassing, some sat down for a time, then moved off to dinner. Occasionally, a woman would sit and wail, the most constant being Reuben's married daughter; Captain Schooner moved around talking to his friends amidst the eerie wailing. About 1.30 P.M. everyone in the village had assembled, including a number of Carrier Indians, anxious to see the sight. Captain Schooner withdrew to his house after asking Bobby Nelsby to summon the chiefs to meet him there. The messenger, who thus acted as herald, went around the gathering whispering to each; in addition to those notified at the cannery the preceding evening he called all the older and most influential Bella Coola, Albert King, Samuel King, Joe Williams, Joshua Moody, Alec Davis, Lame Charlie, Judas, and Nebuchadnezzar. Captain Schooner requested the last named, an important chief, to take charge of the ceremony. At this time Samuel King told Nebuchadnezzar, who informed the others, what had been arranged for his daughter and they agreed that it was good. It was tacitly assumed that George Nelson would be delighted; probably he had been on friendly terms with the girl for some time. Joe Williams also told Nebuchadnezzar the two business propositions that he intended to carry out, the return of the money to Captain Schooner, and the rebuying of his daughter. Nebuchadnezzar informed the people concerned. At this meeting it was decided that various chiefs should speak after the Christian service at the grave. [203] [584] [537]

764 159 Meanwhile the rest of the population was sitting near the coffin. They wore no special dress or other mark of grief. Samuel King and some of his relatives had brought bundles containing Jessie's clothing, pots, pans, and other personal possessions, which they set down near the coffin. About two [533] o'clock the band gathered and began to play, the favourite [177] selection being "Annie Laurie." This went on for some time after the return of the chiefs from Captain Schooner's house. They had decided that Tál-ie Jenny, one of Captain Schooner's distant relatives, should carry the fire in front of the body. When all was ready she lit a bundle of rags, placed it in a pot, and set off for the cemetery, followed by all in a straggling and orderless procession. Some strong young men bore the coffin, for Jessie must have weighed over two hundred pounds; some brought tools for digging the grave; others took the bundles of clothing. There was no fixed allotment of tasks; a man or woman carried anything or nothing according to his or her wish.

The cemetery is situated about fifty yards behind the old village of ḡmqa-ti. The heavy timber has all been cut away and second growth has sprung up everywhere except around the newer graves. Captain Schooner had decided that his daughter should be buried near several of her relatives, and it was to this spot that Jenny led the procession. She set the pot down near the site of the grave, and the coffin likewise was placed on the ground nearby. Captain Schooner, Jim Pollard, and a few of the other old men chose the exact situation and a number of the young men began to dig. Jenny, and other women, added pieces of Jessie's clothing to the fire so that a constant small blaze was kept up. As the grave was being dug [533] the band performed at intervals, while the women sat wailing near the fire. Other men and women were seated on the ground or walking around idly near the grave, talking but seldom laughing, while the Carriers were a little farther away. [152] Children were playing around. The grave was dug about five feet deep, in shape corresponding to the coffin, but orientation was not carefully observed. Those wishing to dig took turns with the tools; there was no supervision, and no orders given. When the grave was ready, Jim Pollard asked Judas to perform the rite with the spruce bough, which he did with a branch brought by one of the youths. The young men lowered the coffin into the grave while the band continued to play. The missionary then read the Christian burial service, after which he withdrew. Some of the young men brought planks from old houses near-by, sawed them to the size of the grave and laid them over the coffin as a cover. At this juncture Judas, one of the oldest and most conservative of the Bella Coola, rose to speak. First he offered consolation to the mourning relatives by pointing out that all must travel the same road. Then he spoke to Jessie, telling her not to linger, but to travel back the path of her ancestors from generation to generation until she reached the place where they first came down from above, and thence to ascend to Nasmāt-a. It was impossible to obtain a literal translation of the speech, which was punctuated by calls of "Ye-" from the male Bella Coola. The next speaker was Jim Pollard, the most influential Kimsquit and a personal friend, though not a relative, of Captain Schooner's.

764 159 [533] [747] 764 159 537

"Go," he said to the dead woman, "Go to the localities from which came your first forefathers in the beginning of time. There you will find your most valuable ancestral possessions. Go at once, do not linger and lose yourself on the road from generation to generation."

Turning to George Nelson, he went on, "Do not be downhearted, all of us must travel the same road. It was made by no man, it is the work of Alqantām."

Looking back once more to the grave, he said, "In Qumpo-ts are buried many illustrious relatives of yours. You will be among friends, whereas we are left to lament your departure."

It was impossible to write down the words at the time and the above record is not literally correct, although it expresses the gist of the speech. [126]

Captain Schooner whispered to Robert Hood, another of the 764 older Bella Coola, asking him to announce that he, Schooner, 159 with Dan and George, was going to hold a memorial potlatch that evening to which all were invited. Robert is not a herald [203] but undertook this duty owing to the absence of qualified [769] heralds. Meanwhile the grave had been filled in and the *[556] people began to drift away as it rose to ground level. Their attitude throughout had resembled that of white people at a funeral, and the hilariousness that characterizes so many [852] Bella Coola gatherings was entirely absent except among the playing children. By 4.30 P.M. all had left the scene.

769 In view of the large number of guests expected it had been decided to hold the memorial potlatch, not in one of the old-*556 fashioned houses, but in the village hall, built according to the [344] white man's style of architecture and illuminated with swinging [354] gasoline lamps. This is a large, rectangular building, undivided by partitions, with a stage at one end and a door at the other.
[533] About 6.30 P.M. the singers, Nebuchadnezzar, Jim Pollard, Billy Pollard, Alec Davis, Kimsquit Alec, and Robert Hood, gathered at the hall and seated themselves below the stage.
Billy Pollard had prepared a mourning song during the day, Kimsquit Alec another, and it was decided to use two others that were well known to all. The singers sat and practised these four for some time, while at intervals various Bella Coola strolled in, listened for a few minutes, then walked out again.
Anyone was allowed to do so, but few availed themselves of the opportunity. Meanwhile Captain Schooner had brought 264 $10 worth of rice, raisins, and condensed milk which he placed 769 beside a huge iron cauldron outside the front door. Jim To-*556 Morrow, a Bella Coola of no great intelligence, volunteered to act as cook and soon had a fire blazing and the food boiling.

About 8.00 P.M. the people began to assemble, bringing their own plates and other utensils. After considerable delay and chatter, the guests took their places in the hall, seating themselves regardless of rank on benches ranged along the two side walls and massed at the rear. By mutual consent a portion of the single row of benches along the left wall was reserved for the Carriers and other foreigners. The cook began to ladle the rice into basins provided by Captain Schooner; these were taken by some of the younger men who poured helpings into the dishes of the guests. Spoons had been forgotten, and there was delay until these were provided by slivers split from a block of wood for the purpose. Contrary to ancient usage, no attempt was made to serve food to the guests in order of their rank. Men, women, and children were sitting everywhere, the infants kept moving around and crying continually throughout the performance, but no one seemed to be disturbed thereby. 769 556* 264 [178] [852]

When everyone had eaten, Nebuchadnezzar, who had been sitting facing the other singers, beat on the floor to attract attention and then rose to speak. He asked the help of all to make the ceremony a success, and thus assuage the grief of the bereaved relatives. 769 556*

Joe Williams and his daughter had taken their places on the right-hand side of the hall and had requested Willie Mack, a fluent speaker and influential chief, to assist them in announcing the financial transactions. They spread a blanket on the floor on which the bills were counted, and beside this Willie knelt. Joe gave him a sum of money, which was counted and re-counted; Willie then held it up in the vain hope that it could be seen by everyone in the hall. He announced the amount, also that it was to rebuy (the divorced) Mrs. George Nelson from her late husband, and that it would "make clean the place where she sat." A young man delivered the money to George who added it to the general stock for later distribution. Next a copper was produced, held up, and presented to him for the same purpose. Meanwhile Joe, assisted by his mother and other relatives, had been counting the money which they proposed to give to Captain Schooner in settlement of the previously contracted debt. One hundred and fifty dollars were produced and handed to Willie Mack, who held them up and announced that it was in return for the $100 given by Captain Schooner on a previous occasion to Joe Williams, his wife, his son, his daughter, his mother, and his stepfather. The bills 769 556* 583 [537] 769 556*

769 were taken by one of the younger men to Captain Schooner, who accepted them without showing either gratitude or the *556 reverse; this return was a matter that concerned the Williams family, not the Schooners. After a short delay, Billy Pollard moved over to the group and spoke to Joe and Willie Mack, [583] to whom he gave $10. The latter stated that this sum, which he held up, and a horse, which was not produced, were being given to George Nelson to rebuy his (divorced) wife. Billy is not related to the woman, but had long been friendly and wished to share in making good the path for her children.
This matter had not been previously broached. The choice of [537] Willie Mack as announcer was made merely because he was a fluent speaker and, as a chief, had the necessary self-confidence to act fittingly.

769 After these preliminaries, the main rite was begun. Jim *556 Pollard, an eloquent chief unrelated to any of the principals, 537 spoke at some length describing the journey taken by Jessie to visit the scenes of her ancestral myths. He was followed by a Bella Bella chief who happened to be in Bella Coola at the time. In the Chinook jargon he first expressed his sympathy and respect for Captain Schooner because he was carrying out the fitting rites, then asked leave to speak in Bella Bella because he found it difficult to express himself in Chinook. He described the journey which the deceased had taken owing to her membership in the ancestral family of her mother, a Bella Bella woman. No one paid much attention to the speeches; in fact, it was impossible at the back of the hall to hear what was said owing to the chattering and crying of children.

769 After considerable delay, the singers decided it was time to *556 sing the first mourning song. It had never before been used, 533 although the composer, Billy Pollard, had prepared it several years earlier and had merely altered the words during the morning after consulting Captain Schooner about his ancestral myths. The singers had learnt text and tune during the rehearsal a few hours before. It was impossible to record it in detail; in outline, it consisted of the words:

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

"Child, you are an eagle now. You are like Xemcua.[33] He will provide an eagle cloak for you." 769

The theme was continued throughout as if Captain Schooner were speaking and lamenting his daughter. At intervals the phrase was repeated, "My child has fled home." The leader of the singers, Jim Pollard in this case, kept calling out to the audience to cry and sing, and as many of them joined in as had come in earlier to listen to the words. The whole effect was strikingly dignified and impressive. 556* 533

Captain Schooner joined the singers for the second mourning song, since he alone was familiar with the details of the ancestral myth which formed the theme. In former times a bereaved parent would never have been obliged to assist in this way. Kimsquit Alec had composed the tune during the day and Billy Pollard called out the words, line by line, inviting the guests to join in. The theme consisted of instructions to Jessie: [178]

"Go," it ran, "To the mountain whither Qeil[34] came. Thence travel to the Skeena where you will assume the form of a whale and be able to spout like one.[35] Go then to the far north where you will enter the copper house within which dwells a copper raven and where the salmon are taitaimx."[36]

This song was sung in the manner already described.

The third mourning song was one composed for a Täl·io chief, Smaoxek, who had lost his daughter during the smallpox epidemic. Its use was justifiable, as Smáoxek was Jessie's mother's mother's mother's brother. It had a double significance since the dead woman's mother had allowed it to be used when lamenting the death of a brother of Samuel King, a member of the same ancestral family. Captain Schooner had altered the words to make them applicable to the present situation. The theme was:

[33]One of the first settlers of the earth, an ancestor of Jessie.

[34]Another of her first ancestors.

[35]One of Jessie's first ancestors had landed on the Skeena and there assumed the form and characteristics of a whale.

[36]An incident in one of Jessie's ancestral myths.

769 "Please stop crying. We have made good your memory.
*556 You are a light to your brother. Go to Smaoexek where he stands among the abalone-shells far to the south.[36] Thence go 533 overland to Rivers Inlet where a skämtsk will serve as canoe for you.[37] You will see the long house where your ancestor obtained shaman's power."[38]

Meanwhile Reuben Schooner had been out of sight behind the curtain of the stage. After a short interval, he emerged [292] wearing a blue blanket decorated with mother-of-pearl buttons sewn on in raven design. He was followed by two other influential members of the sisaok society, Alexander Clallaman and Nebuchadnezzar, similarly attired. Reuben began to sing in a low, sad, penetrating voice of considerable musical power and, followed by the other two, walked slowly in a sunwise circle around the hall, all the time shaking his right hand, held projecting outwards at right angles from his elbow. The song was in Bella Bella, and even the singer did not fully understand the meaning, and few of the audience had any idea of its significance. When the three had almost completed the first circuit, someone brought Reuben a rattle, which he clutched in his right hand as he continued his way. The reason of the shaking at once became evident; he should have had a rattle through-[178] out but few of these were left in Bella Coola at the time and it had not been possible to borrow one before beginning his song. Again the three slowly circled the hall, Alexander and Nebuchadnezzar calling out at intervals:

"Listen to the mourning song of the chief."

After the second circuit of the hall, Reuben paused near the singers and spoke to Alec Davis, a sisaok siki. The latter [424] rose and stated how the prerogative of siki, including the right to sing, unaccompanied, a mourning song on occasions such as this had been transmitted both to Reuben and his brother Harry from Ao·sti, a Bella Bella chief to whom they were related through their mother. After a little further discussion, 769 Harry took the rattle from his brother and began to sing as he 556* walked around the hall, followed by Alexander and Nebu- 533 chadnezzar. Harry was less familiar than his brother with the proper words, but supplied this deficiency by humming. [424]

He was also less at ease, and he lacked the musical ability which had made his brother's singing so impressive. After a single circuit, he restored the rattle to Reuben, who continued to go around the hall as he sang. This time he paused at intervals, and kept glancing towards the door, his whole attitude betraying that something was interfering with the previously arranged plans. The purpose of the singing was to summon the dead woman in the form of her crest, but she did not appear. In early times those who were not susack were told that the words and music penetrated to the upper regions, reminding the deceased of the grief of his relatives and per- [178] suading him to return. This belief had passed away at the time of the ceremony here described, but the fiction was continued, and it had been planned that the representation of the deceased should enter when the song was finished. It later [609] transpired that the delay was due to a number of white people who, having gathered at the doorway, made the performer unwilling to put on his masks and disguise. Reuben continued to sing half-heartedly, and finally cried out:

"Perhaps I have lost my power, it does not come."

Alec Davis, who had previously left the hall, came rushing in and called out in a loud voice:

"Qomotla [Jessie's ancestral name and the one in connection with which she had been made a chief] is coming. She has been to the scenes of her ancestral myths. Her crests have taken her. She comes as Eagle, Raven, and Blackfish, bearing her grandchild."[a]

The speaker is a morose, rather surly individual, usually 769 undignified and often drunk, but on this occasion his manner 556* had changed in a remarkable degree. His eyes were bright, his 769 expression animated, and, except for his dirty European cloth-

*556 ing, he looked and acted like a religious dignitary taking part in an important ceremony, as was indeed the case. While he was speaking there came from without eerie notes of the large, cone-shaped whistles, combined with the yelping scream of an eagle. The effect, even on an audience which knew that these sounds were of human origin, was tremendous. Men and women stiffened in their seats and craned their necks to see what was taking place near the door. A number of the younger 769 men had slipped away during Reuben's singing to help the *556 masked dancer with his disguise. As some of these assistants 535 continued to blow their whistles, others held up blankets to conceal the necessarily clumsy entrance of the performer through the narrow doorway.

These were dropped after a moment, and out into the centre of the open hall bounded a figure covered with a large white sheet so that only his bare feet were visible. On his head was [532] an eagle mask, from the upper part of his back projected a blackfish, while the head of a raven peered forth from his chest. The dancer, Timothy Snow, who had been chosen for his skill in such matters, leapt forward in a crouching attitude and took a few short, mincing steps as if he were a gigantic eagle hopping on the ground. At once the older Bella Coola women began to drone out, "i . . . . ," and continued as long as the performer remained in the hall. He bent down and turned slowly, sunwise, with arms pressed close to his body and neck contracted, then straightened, and took a few more mincing steps, followed by another turn. In this way he moved in a wide, sunwise circle around the hall, avoiding the middle where there would have been a fire in one of the old-fashioned houses. At intervals he raised himself on his toes and slightly spread his arms beneath the sheet, at the same time looking up so that it appeared as if the eagle were rising to gaze at an object in the distance as a sitting bird does so frequently. This brought the raven mask into plain sight. After a survey of this kind, he bent down and ran a few yards more. Alec Davis and two other masks followed the actor, blowing eagle down over him repeatedly. After one circuit of the hall, the performer passed out through the front door, from the vicinity of which was heard once more the large whistles and the screaming of the eagle, both growing less distinct as if the bird were flying away. 769 556* 535

The wearer of the mask displayed considerable dramatic talent and succeeded in giving a realistic display in spite of the glaring lights which exposed his bare feet and betrayed the human handicraft of the mask in a manner impossible in the native type of house with a single, central fire as the sole illumination. The Carriers had watched the performance with interest, probably tinged with contempt, but to the Bella Coola it was no mere spectacle, it was a religious rite of the highest importance. All the spectators realized that the figure was human, but this seemed inconsequential as they gazed upon the representation of the dead woman in the form of her crests, to which they believed she had been transformed by death. Even the children were silent, and the only sound during the passage was the wailing of a sleepy infant. The eagle crest belonged to Jessie by virtue of membership in the ancestral family descended from her father's first ancestor, traced patrilineally, who had come to earth at Tcmott in the form of this bird. The blackfish was a crest acquired through her mother; the raven represented a copper raven belonging to an ancestral myth of the dying grandchild. In former times, carpenters would have worked for weeks preparing an elaborate composite figure, but Captain Schooner wished no delay in the ceremony for fear of police interference, so that it was necessary to use what masks happened to be in existence and to place them in conjunction by means of the crude white sheet. Jessie had not been initiated into the sisaok society, but no opposition was raised to the use of sisaok whistles both on account of her status as chief, and owing to the influence of her father who, a numitl chief, feared no restrictions and heeded no conventions. Besides, both her brothers were influ-

769 *556 ential susaok. In former times it is certain that objections would have been raised to this breach of ceremonial privilege.

[424] [178] [575] [622] There was a pause for several minutes after the withdrawal of the figure. Then Reuben threw a copper on the floor in the track taken by the actor "to make bone for the dead woman." A number of chiefs went forward to join the singers and discuss whether or not the copper should be redeemed. No one wished to do so, so Captain Schooner said he would have it fastened to a post over Jessie's grave, a proposition to which all agreed.

769 *556 533 After interminable discussion in which Captain Schooner, Nebuchadnezzar, Reuben Schooner, Jim Pollard, and Alec Davis took the principal parts, it was decided to sing the fourth mourning song at this point. There was no reason why this should not have been done at the customary time, after the other three, but wide latitude in detail was allowed in this [178] ceremony; in fact, exact ritual never flourished in Bella Coola and has become increasingly rare in recent years. This song had been composed a number of years previously when Captain Schooner had called in the Bella Bella to a memorial potlatch, and great care had been expended on its composition owing to the skill of the guests in songs of this type. The words, altered to fit the circumstances, were phrased as if George and Dan were lamenting the loss of their mother and other relatives.

"I, we," they ran, "are thinking of our mother, our brothers, our sisters, our mother's brothers, our mother's sisters, our father's brothers, our father's sisters, of all our dead relatives. Please, ye chiefs from abroad, turn your heads, listen to our wail. You revered great ones, let us all cry together. It is we who have called you hither; look upon us."

This song was sung in the manner already described, except that more of the Bella Coola were familiar with the words and tune and could accordingly join in.

769 556 Meanwhile Captain Schooner, with his sons Reuben and Harry and his grandsons George Nelson and Andy Schooner, had been crouching in a corner of the hall, poring over the money which was to be distributed to validate the ceremony, and deciding how to divide it. Harry Schooner is neither dominant nor capable, and Andy acted only as clerk, so the actual decision rested with Captain Schooner, Reuben, and George. Daniel Nelson would normally have played a prominent part, but he was absent owing to the illness of his infant daughter. Samuel King joined the group, bringing with him two coppers, two rifles, and a sum of money, and whispered the purpose of this contribution. 769 556 769 556*

After the usual pause, George Nelson and Captain Schooner, the latter substituting for the absent Dan Nelson, stood up and walked around the hall carrying three coppers and two rifles. Then they returned to their places. 583

Nebuchadnezzar had been asked by Captain Schooner to act as announcer on account of his good voice and self-confidence. He joined the group in the corner to call out whatever they whispered to him. First he stated that one of the coppers just displayed had been given to George Nelson to rebuy from him his wife, Joe Williams' daughter. He explained that the other two, as well as the rifles, were presents from Samuel King, assisted by his brother, Albert, and his sister, Mrs. Alexander Clallaman, to George Nelson in consequence of the latter's marriage to Samuel King's daughter. This arrangement having been initiated by the relatives of the girl, it was fitting that they should give the first presents. [537]

Captain Schooner had first planned to expend $200 to validate the return of his dead daughter. His wife gave him $20 for the purpose, and when Joe Williams returned $150, he decided to use only $100 of his savings, making $270 in all. To this Reuben added $60, Harry $40, and Dan Nelson $40, increasing the total to $410. George contributed what he had received from Joe Williams for the repurchase of the latter's daughter, as well as what Samuel King had just given him. Samuel added to the pile some money belonging to Jessie,[48] 769 556*

[48]The writer could not learn why this money had not been destroyed with her other possessions. The reason may have been that the Bella Coola knew that, though a potlatch was illegal, the goods of a dead person could be distributed and by doing this at a ceremony they hoped for no interference from the law.

769 these various amounts making $864 when added to the previous $410.[11]

* 556 It was first decided to give a present to everyone as "Eagle Down Shaken Off by the Dead Woman." Captain Schooner and his assistants thought first of the bottom house in the village, remembered who lived in it, then, after a little more discussion, agreed upon the amount each should receive. This was whispered to Nebuchadnezzar, who held up a bill and called out, for example:

"$10 for so-and-so."

A number of young men had volunteered as messengers and one of them took the money to the designated recipient. After giving to all in the bottom house, they passed to the next above it, and so in succession for the whole village. Absentees were remembered and their presents received by friends or relatives. Kusiut names were used because Nebuchadnezzar was unfamiliar with the little-used ancestral designations. Contrary to ancient usage, the amounts varied; some chiefs received as much as $20, a child, $1, or 50 cents. Each recipient accepted his gift without showing whether it was more or less than he had expected. There was not sufficient change, so that five persons were often named together and a $5 bill given to the first mentioned for sharing with the other four, a transaction always carried out honestly. Many of the Carriers [609] were strangers, so they could not be rewarded in accordance with their rank, but $50 was given to one of their chiefs to share as he thought fit.

465 769 * 556 964 Not all the money was distributed in this way. Payments had to be made to those who had assisted at the funeral. Gifts were bestowed upon the women who had washed and dressed the corpse; to the men who had helped to make the coffin; to the canoe-men who had brought the body to Bella Coola; to the pall-bearers; to the grave-diggers; to the woman who had carried the fire; to the singers, especially to those who had composed the tunes used; to the carpenter who had prepared and used the masked figure; to the members of the band, including a payment for their services whenever Dan Nelson's child should die; to a carpenter to erect a fence around the grave; to another to cut the representation of an eagle on a stone to be erected over the grave; to the speakers at the funeral; to the speakers at the rite then taking place; to those who delivered the money; to the youth who, with pencil and paper, assisted in keeping accounts; to the cook, and to all others who had assisted in any manner. In every case the amount was announced, the bill held up, the name of the recipient stated, the reason for his reward, and the money was then taken to him by a messenger. Captain Schooner really decided how much each should receive, he being in the best position to judge what was suitable, and there being no fixed scale of charges to help him. Work paid for in advance, such as the erection of the fence, was carefully carried out. 465 769 556* [764]

A little money had been kept to validate the assumption of ancestral names by several children of the Schooner family. Everyone received a small amount, a child sometimes as trifling a sum as 25 cents. Captain Schooner had virtually chosen who was to receive which designation, although he received advice from all his relatives. Harry Schooner's infant was given the name, Pätcätcus, a reference to the manner in which the first beams of the morning sun strike the lofty summit of Mount Nusqalst. Reuben's son was called eltmäls, a Snuhle·tl designation connected with the crash when the first Sonx̌ fell. The myths in which these names were embodied were not expounded; in fact, they had been almost forgotten, even by Captain Schooner. Täl·io Jenny wished to transmit one of her names to Andy Schooner's infant; this was announced in the same way as the others and validated with them by the gifts to all. Jenny had not contributed to the common stock, but some of it was used with the understanding that she would later repay. Nebuchadnezzar announced the 769 556* 553 425

769 sum being used for each name, and the bills were displayed *556 before messengers carried them to the recipients.

Finally, Jim Pollard took the opportunity to bestow on 553 Captain Schooner the name, Snuuikals. This designation 425 was the property of the donor's ancestral family and should [614] not have been transmitted without the consent of all its mem-[622] bers. Jim had probably informed several of them of his intention, but no objections would have been raised if he had overlooked this courtesy, since he is the only numitl chief among them, and the only one with determination and prestige. It was not an outright gift, since it was announced that it must be returned to the donor's family on Captain Schooner's death. Jim Pollard acted as his own announcer for this transaction, explaining that he gave the name in gratitude for the help which Captain Schooner had rendered at the death of his, Jim's, father about twenty years before. He promised that at the earliest opportunity he would give presents to validate the transmission.

769 During the lengthy distribution of money, the audience had
*556 shown unmistakable signs of weariness. It was now between 2.00 and 3.00 A.M., and as soon as Jim had finished speaking the guests dispersed quietly, though many of them gathered in groups in one another's houses to discuss what had taken place.

Captain Schooner slept late after the lengthy ceremony, but was proud and contented when interviewed about noon. He felt that what was fitting for his daughter had been performed, and was willing to take the consequences of having broken the law.

768 Little else of note occurred in connection with Jessie's funeral. Samuel King deposited near her grave a sewing-machine which his wife had used for only a short time and Captain Schooner decided to replace this with an older one belonging to his wife. He made this exchange on the afternoon of June 30, when Samuel, in company with a number of women, was burning the rest of Jessie's clothing and possessions. Captain Schooner explained his act by saying:

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

"She was my daughter, I have a right to do as I like." 968

Samuel King and the others accepted the exchange as a matter of course and made no comments. Captain Schooner took no part in the burning of his daughter's goods, this being the task of those with whom she had been living, and who accordingly knew which were hers. The fire was kindled by a married daughter of Reuben Schooner, though it could have been done equally well by any woman. On the following morning, July 1, Samuel King went with a friend to the forest and passed four times through a small spruce sapling bent into an arch. This was the last incident in the funeral rites. 783 964

Fate of the Dead

Life of the Dead

Little need be added to the account given in vol. I, chap. 975
II of the fate of those parts of a man which go at death to Nuxmát-a. The spirit and the life travel back the path of the deceased's ancestors from generation to generation until they reach the place where his first forefather came to earth and where his cloak, if he had worn one, floated back after his alteration to human form. When the spirit and the life of a descendant reach the spot, they change into a being having the form of the cloak, and so return to Nuxmát-a. The spirit and the life of one who is a member of several ancestral families visit the localities where the transformations to human shape of all his ancestors occurred. The Bella Coola believe that these two elements can assume many crest forms, but they do not know whether this entails the simultaneous assumption of many shapes to comprise a composite figure; or whether the spirit and the life, which become a single entity in the case of a member of one ancestral family, become multiple for one who is a member of several. When lamenting a dead person, mention is always made of the various scenes which he will have visited, and the forms he will have assumed. At a memorial potlatch, the deceased may return as a hybrid, or as

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

775 one of the several crests which it is believed he has become. The point does not appear important to the Bella Coola, corresponding to their indefinite ideas concerning whether the spirit and the life have become a single being, or several.

Knowledge of the life led in Nuxmát-a by the deceased, now in the form of his crest,[48] is most indefinite. In a general way it is felt that the actions of this being are similar to those carried on during life, but in a more advanced degree. A skilled carpenter is a better carpenter in the land above, a chief who has given many potlatches below can give more in Nuxmát-a. This [593] belief finds expression in mourning songs which frequently state how Alqantám has called a good carpenter to work above, or how a chief has gone to exhibit his generosity in a new sphere. It is doubtful whether this sentiment plays any real part in Bella Coola thought. The spirit and the life of a dead person have gone [illegible] of their actions has been handed down from the distant past and is merely a matter of history. The only time that these 775 two merged elements come to this world is at a memorial pot-769 latch, and formerly the uninitiated undoubtedly believed that 556 they were witnessing such a visit. Though the spectators were shown as a matter of course that the spirit and the life had become bird or animal, emphasis was laid on the fact that they had become the particular bird or animal crest of the donor's ancestral family. The effect of the memorial potlatch in former times, as at present, was, therefore, social rather than religious. Besides, the two parts portrayed have never been known 775 to affect a human being; they expect no offerings, grant no assistance, cause no injury, and are accordingly neglected.

In comparison with the above vague beliefs, Bella Coola information concerning ghosts is clear and exact. As already [993] [48] It is accepted that men were created as human beings, and only assumed bird or animal shapes in order to reach the earth, but there is no corresponding belief that the spirit and the life change back from crest to human form on arrival above. Of course the performance of human activities by zoomorphic creatures presents no difficulties in Bella Coola thought.

described, at death the shadow, the body, and a portion of the life, descend to the land below where existence is continued as a ghost. These wraiths are usually termed, Kolkw'hmx, "The Earthy Ones," though they prefer the name Asiustinem, "They Who Have Become Supernatural." They enter into the lives and actions of the Bella Coola in a way entirely different from that of the elements which go aloft at death. 775

The land of ghosts, immediately beneath the earth, is similar to it. There are trees and bushes, stones, grass, everything as on the surface of the world. There is a river, too, but it rises in the west and flows eastward, contrary to the course of the Bella Coola. The sun that shines below is green and unnatural, giving an ethereal light like that of the moon which, indeed, it is sometimes said to be. The seasons are the reverse of those on earth; when mortals are in midsummer, it is wintertime for ghosts. The fluff which human beings see falling from cottonwood trees reaches the land of ghosts as snow. All earthly springs rise from the river in the land below: they never freeze in winter because they come from a warm region, and the coldness of spring water in summer is the result of coming from a land where it is winter. With the exception of the peculiar light, the only essential difference between the land of ghosts and this world is that food is very scarce in the former; berries grow below, and it is supposed that there must be fish and animals there, but it is common knowledge that residents there are always hungry. 772 775 [825]

The life led by ghosts is similar to that of human beings. They occupy the same type of house as before death, dwell in the same kind of villages on the river bank, wear similar clothes, have similar likes and dislikes, require similar food, and even enjoy the same kind of dances. One old Bella Coola even stated that the ghosts are able to summon supernatural beings from Nusmāt·a to their kusiut rites. It is generally believed that no work is done below, although several of the older people denied this. According to these individuals, a ghost can perform more rapidly and easily whatever tasks he had been 775

775 accustomed to do when alive; but the workmanship is shadowy and unsubstantial, sometimes even transparent. Ghosts do not act like human beings, but usually walk backwards, sometimes even on their heads, and spend much of their time playing a game resembling football with large, globular objects made of some light substance. They communicate with one another both by whistling and in a language which resembles the attempts at speech made by a tongueless person. Some 775 individuals believe that there is a supreme chief in the land of 776 ghosts, Allăt-iaisl, sent down like Pluto to preside over the shades. He figures in certain stories describing descents to the lower world; but many Bella Coola know nothing of his existence below, although it furnishes a plausible explanation for his coming by night to molest human beings. Like Sosiewar [761] he causes blood to rush forth from the mouth and genitalia of anyone whom he seizes; death follows, and a new victim has been acquired for his kingdom. The more common belief is 775 that the villages of ghosts have chiefs like those of human beings. It is thought, indefinitely, that after a long period of time the ghosts die, and some of them may then return to [845] this world as infants. A child born with dimples in its ears, which are regarded as indications of previous borings for rings, is welcomed as the reincarnation of some unknown ancestor.

At death, the ghost does not immediately appear in the land below, but remains for four days within the back-room of a house corresponding in style to an ordinary Bella Coola [772] dwelling. It is believed that one of these large houses is beneath every village* and that the dead pass straight down through the earth into it. Meanwhile the goods, burnt at the grave during the funeral, as well as those deposited beside it, have fallen through the ground and notified the ghosts that a newcomer has arrived. The wraiths assemble from all directions and fight over the articles, none of which are obtained [768] by the one who owned them during life. On the fourth day after the funeral, the relatives of the dead person burn the [775] remainder of his property, which passes through the earth to the ghost for whom it is intended. Ghost-singers have taken [764] their places and begin to beat out music, and presently the recently deceased appears, stepping backwards from the backroom in time to the beating of sticks. He is at once surrounded by his fellows, each anxious to learn the latest news of relatives still alive. This dance is really to welcome the new arrival, and takes place irrespective of his rank. After it has been held, it is hopeless to attempt to rouse a dead person, although that has been done several times during the four days immediately succeeding death.

Only shamans are able to pass down into the land of the [756] dead, though stories are told of inadvertent visits to it in relatively recent times. Human beings are prevented from visiting their dead relatives, but the latter, being supernatural, can come to the earth at will. They are always dreaded, and anyone who hears their whistling or their tongueless chatter covers in his house, and hopes they will pass by. Shamans [756] can understand their speech and to them the dead explain their mission. If the relatives of a dead person have failed to burn [764] all his personal possessions, he returns to earth to inform them, through a shaman, of the omission. The house is searched for anything left and it is burnt at once near the grave, though no one knows how a ghost would punish failure to give him his property. Thoughtful people, remembering the scarcity of [264] food in the land below, frequently give presents to their dead relatives by casting small morsels of food on the side of the [772] central fire nearest the front door, beneath which is a passage to the lower regions. The food becomes magnified as it falls down this, so that even small fragments are sufficient to feed many hungry ghosts. Since the introduction of metal stoves, [771] it has become customary to throw food into a fire kindled for the purpose in the cemetery; the most suitable time is at dusk, although people are always afraid that spectres may be prowling around at that hour. If sufficient presents are not given [756] to a ghost, he informs a shaman of the fact and the latter notifies the relatives of the deceased. If no shaman is convenient, the shade does not hesitate to help himself. Invisible, and armed with a barbed hook, he approaches a person who is eating and pulls away a crumb which falls to the earth. Should the eater stoop to pick this up, the ghost, robbed of his booty, beats the offender with his hook, causing toothache or sometimes a sharp pain in the head or stomach. Other ailments are caused by the ghosts hitting with invisible stones those who have offended them. Consequently, no one picks up a crumb which has fallen, since it is impossible to know whether it has been an accident or a seizure. Another indication of a ghost's hunger is loss of a tooth. The loser should throw it on a fire with an invitation to the dead to accept his offering.

The barrier between ghosts and human beings is considered to be little more than a wall of smoke, just too dense for ordinary eyes to penetrate. In early times intercommunication between the denizens of the two worlds was so easy that a dying mother was once allowed to send her dead child on earth. Unfortunately, the woman's mother one day insisted on holding her grandchild, unaware that he was a ghost. Shocked at his appearance, the old woman dropped the child, much to the anger of the dead people.* Ever since that time it has been impossible for human beings to see and talk with their deceased kinsmen. Like so many Bella Coola stories, it is doubtful whether this one is regarded as more than an item of ancient history; it is considered to be a fact, but it is not one that enters into the daily thoughts of the people.

Ghosts frequently come to their old homes at night where dogs can see them. If one of these animals begins to bark and gazes fixedly at a spot where nothing is to be seen, it is because a wraith is standing there and the dog's owner hopes that it will remain invisible. It is true that some individuals have received shamanistic power from a ghost, but more often a visitation is disastrous and to be avoided. A dead person who tries to speak to living relatives, but his whistling language is 775 unintelligible and frightens the hearer. Ghosts dislike urine, [789] and the only means known to keep them away from a house is to sprinkle this liquid outside the door, a common Bella Coola custom. There is no actual danger in hearing a ghost, and 761 little even in seeing one, provided the observer does not relate 775 his experience, but should he try to do so, something happens to his mouth as if an invisible hand had been clamped over it 753 to prevent his words issuing forth. He can neither eat nor drink and soon dies.* It is possible that other beings are responsible for this same affection, but as no sufferer has ever been able to explain the cause of his ailment, no one knows.

*This story is recorded in detail here (I, p. 97).

NEA Bellacoola NEA

The most dangerous ghost is that of a person who, buried [764] without a nose-ring, is unable to disintegrate into his elements.
The sight of such an apparition causes almost immediate death through contraction and closing of the mouth.

An unpleasant habit of ghosts is the throwing of stones at 776 the living. This is done partly from a love of mischief, and partly to remind their relatives of their needs. An old Kitsaquit man described how, when encamped on King Island, he had almost been struck by a stone which seemed to fall from a tree. He realized that it must have been thrown by a ghost, [753] and his opinion was confirmed when he found he could not [755] speak. He instantly built a fire and cast on it both food and clothing as offerings to the dead, which had the effect of loosening his mouth. Pondering on the reason, he remembered that one of his relatives had died not far away, and that he had failed to give him any crumbs for a long time. In this case, as in many others, the stone was visible, though the thrower remained invisible.

Even near approach to ghosts is sometimes dangerous. The same man related how, when hunting, he heard what he thought was the note of a water ouzel, and passed by heedlessly. In a few minutes he thought he heard the cackling of geese, but the sound, instead of continuing to come from a pond a few hun-

[175] dred yards away, rapidly drew near the hunter along the trail. He raised his musket and stepped aside, but though the sound went past him down the path, he could see nothing. Terrified, he realized that he had been near two ghosts, and rushed back to the village. A shaman was called who informed him that [154] he had met his dead father's sister and another relative, both of whom were hungry. The hunter, too weak from fright to help himself, watched the shaman light a fire and throw on it [155] a considerable amount of food and goods. Finally, he ripped the hunter's shirt from his back and threw it into the flames. Consequently, no harm resulted from this experience.

Ghosts, like all other supernatural beings, can, of course, control their powers so that their appearance does not injure a beholder. A few years before 1911 a certain Sposlin i, whose ancestral name was Le-qme i, was encamped at Sachmamtz on the Labouchere Channel side of King Island. At dusk a woman came to his fire and proceeded to warm her cape. He recognized from her green face that she must be a ghost and boldly asked her what she wanted.

"I have been searching for mussels," she replied, "but without success."

In an instant she vanished and Sposlin i experienced neither good nor evil from this apparition. The Bella Coola say that this being may not have been a ghost as he had thought, [176] but was perhaps one of the under-sea dwellers who have somewhat the same appearance.

Since ghosts, like other supernatural beings, are believed to possess both wisdom and power, it might be thought that they would be invoked frequently. Instead, death has altered their character to such an extent that they are avoided and kept at a distance. The only time that an appeal is made to [177] a ghost is when a young person dies without apparent reason [178] and the survivors wish to learn the cause. The body is buried [179] with a long cord consisting of alternate strands of dyed and [180] undyed cedar-bark projecting from its mouth and stretching to the surface. The relative desiring information summons to his house several shamans whose powers have been obtained from ghosts, and for four days feeds them lavishly. On the fifth morning they proceed to the grave, accompanied by kinsmen of the deceased, and pound on the ground with sticks, asking the dead person whether or not he had been murdered, and if so, the name of the murderer. It is said that in former times the voice of the deceased could always be plainly heard giving the desired information. This ceremony has not been carried out for many years, and exact details are not known by any of the living Bella Coola. It seems clear that ventriloquism must have been employed, requiring active deception on the part of the shamans. 756 775 787 [198]

It was difficult to ascertain to what extent shamans believed in their own powers to understand the speech of ghosts. There is no doubt that the Bella Coola are easily influenced by suggestion, and if an individual is told that he has received help from a ghost, it is not difficult for him to believe that such has been the case. Further, his fellows are convinced of his powers, a circumstance which does not fail to affect him. It may be stated definitely that in many cases shamans have some confidence in their own powers, although they do not hesitate to use deception to increase their prestige. This point will be considered in greater detail in the following chapter.

ACCOUNTS OF EXPERIENCES WITH GHOSTS

Much of the information concerning ghosts is contained in stories which have been handed down for generations and which are regarded as historical records. Some of these must be deferred to the chapters on folk-lore and shamanism, but the following are sufficient to explain the source of many Bella Coola beliefs on this subject.* 539 775

A Rescue from Ghosts

Long, long ago, there lived a little girl who used to cry incessantly. One evening when she was disturbing the whole household by weeping, her father said angrily to her:

*These stories have been included at this point as specific illustrations of the type of legend upon which generalized beliefs depend.

"Keep quiet or the ghosts will come and carry you off."

Even this threat did not silence her; later on, all her companions went to bed, leaving her alone, crying, in the central part of the house. After a time her father noticed the child's sobs had grown fainter, though she seemed to be weeping in the same manner as before. He went out to investigate, found her place vacant, and, listening intently, realized that the sound came from below; the ghosts had come for her. He roused the household and called in all the men of the village to dig for the girl with sharpened spruce branches. Her crying was still audible and the diggers were directed by it; sometimes they seemed to be on the point of overtaking her, but always her ghost-captor eluded his pursuers by moving sideways through the ground instead of continuing his direct descent. At length the men gave up their task in despair, leaving the mourning father and mother to lament the former's rash remark which had brought the ghosts.

The parents of the girl consulted all the village shamans, one of whom formulated a scheme to rescue the victim. He told her relatives to remove alternate boards from the roof of the house, and to place on each remaining one a vessel filled with urine. He stationed a helper beside each vessel, ready to upset it when he gave the signal, and requested everyone else to leave the house. When these arrangements had been carried out, the shaman went alone to the cemetery, passed through the earth to the land of ghosts, and invited the wraiths to assemble in the house for a feast. They gladly accepted, and the hidden assistants watched them enter, one or two at a time, as if they had been human beings bidden to a ceremony. At last all had arrived except the principal chief, who was to sit in the central seat behind the fire. The feast could not proceed without him, so the ghosts sent a special messenger down below to summon him. It was this chief who had stolen the child, and the excitement of the watchers became intense as he entered, carrying concealed beneath his cloak the girl whose cries betrayed her presence to the hidden relatives. When all had taken their places, the shaman gave the previously arranged signal and his accomplices tipped the urine over the beings below. Wild confusion followed. The ghosts dashed to and fro, showing their anger and resentment by furious whistling and incoherent gurgling. At last they rushed from the house, abandoning the child. They could still be heard in the vicinity of the village, so the shaman directed the people to scatter urine all around the houses, which drove away the unwelcome visitors. The use of this deterrent was first learnt on this occasion.

The parents of the stolen child were overjoyed at her rescue, but it was soon apparent that their daughter had changed. She would not eat; in fact, she acted as if she could not see food placed before her. The next morning she rose early and was seen to eat the ashes of fish that had been burnt as torches; this proved conclusively that she was really dead. Thenceforth, instead of being given food in the usual way, her meals were thrown into the fire, from the ashes of which she received her nourishment. Ever since that time, the Bella Coola have recognized that food for the dead must be thrown on a fire.

An Attempt to Rescue a Dead Wife

Two or three hundred years after the first settlement of the earth, a brave Kimsquit man, Nu·skakluxmy, set out with his three sons to hunt seals. His wife was in an advanced state of pregnancy at the time, but her delivery was not expected for several weeks and her husband had no hesitation in leaving her. The hunters were absent for three full days and nights, and returned home soon after dusk on the fourth day, having had great success. When they landed at the beach they were surprised to see no lights in any of the houses except their own. Leaving two of his sons in the canoe, Nu·skakluxmy and the other lad cautiously approached the dwelling. As they drew near, they realized that the light which shone forth was green and unearthly, and that the smoke, too, was greenish instead of white. Looking through the door, Nu·skakluxmy saw his wife standing with bowed head dangling an infant in a cradle suspended from a cord. This is a common method of soothing a child, but Nu·skakluxmy was horrified to see that the cradle had been fastened to the cord upside down so that the infant was hanging head downwards, with no visible fastening to prevent it from falling to the floor.

"Look out! The child will fall and be killed," Nu·skakluxmy called to his wife, but she did not seem to hear him.

The husband entered the house and touched her, but she crumbled to bones as he did so. The watching son cried out in fear and horror. Nu·skakluxmy hastily left the house and the two returned to the canoe, after ascertaining that no living people were in the village.

The four hunters slept that night in their canoe, and next morning Nu·skakluxmy prowled around until he found the villagers hiding in the forest not far away. They explained that, two days after his departure, his wife had given birth to a child, but the after-birth had not come away and she had died. It was the first time that this had ever happened and the people had fled from the village in fear.

Nu·skakluxmy knew that the ghosts would dance to welcome his wife on the fourth day after her death, and he determined to attempt to rescue her at that time. On the evening of the second day, the fourth after her death, he and his three sons lurked in the vicinity of their house. Presently they heard the sound of drums, which they knew must herald the approach of ghosts, so they hid themselves on the roof of their own house in such positions that they could peer down within. In some unknown way the four had been granted the power to see ghosts, for they observed the entry of what looked like ordinary human beings, though in reality they were wraiths. These took their places like spectators at a ceremony, while several with beating sticks seated themselves behind the fire as singers. As they struck their batons on the floor, one of the ghosts began to dance in time to the music, and Nu-xlakhlaxmy's wife came to life and watched. Two ghosts who were directing the ceremony called out, "i . . . . a . . . . i . . . . a . . . ," which are words in the language of the dead and serve to invite some supernatural being from above to one of their ceremonies. In answer to the call, there came a thump on the roof, marking the descent of the visitor. This gave the dead woman power to move and she began to dance around the fire. She had completed one circuit and was on her second when one of the ghosts called out:

"Take care! I feel as if living people were watching us."

Some of the ghosts at once left the house and searched the bushes near it.

"No," they said on their return, "No one is near."

Nu-xlakhlaxmy's wife continued her dance, and as she was circling the fire for the third time, her husband whispered to his sons:

"As she goes round the fourth time we must jump down, catch her, and fly to our canoe."

When the woman was midway in her fourth circuit, the four leapt into the house and Nu-xlakhlaxmy clutched his wife in his arms, but she crumbled to bones at his touch and the ghosts rushed away, whistling angrily, leaving the four alone, Nu-xlakhlaxmy holding the skeleton of his wife. Then they went and joined the other inhabitants of the village in their hiding-place. Everyone was anxious to hear the outcome of the attempt, though some did not believe the story. Nu-xlakhlaxmy made no further effort to rescue his wife, knowing that it would be hopeless after the fourth day when the ghosts had welcomed her as one of themselves.

An Inadvertent Visit to the Land of Ghosts

A few years after the first settlement of the earth, four Kimsquit men went into the mountains to hunt goats. The first night of their absence, before they had killed any goats, they lay down to sleep in a cave. Nothing disturbed their rest, but when they awoke in the morning they were amazed to find themselves in a strange country. They were near a wooded valley through which flowed a river resembling the Dean, but instead of the sun, there was shining in the sky a sphere that gave forth a green, sickly light. Unknown to them, the cave in which they had been sleeping had turned over on itself and projected them into the land of ghosts. The four brothers descended into the valley and walked up the bank of the river until they saw a large village on the other bank. It seemed to contain countless inhabitants who were amusing themselves by rolling to and fro with their feet a large, round object like a football. This led the four travellers to think they must be in the land of ghosts, though they were puzzled to know how they had reached it. They called across to the players, but though the river was narrow and though they shouted loudly and repeatedly, they received no answer. The reason for this, as they later discovered, was that the language of ghosts differs from that of human beings, and neither can hear the speech of the other. After a considerable interval, the third brother, who was sleepy, happened to yawn noisily; all the ghosts heard this sound and stopped their play to see whence it had come. They saw the four at once and called to them that they would send a canoe to bring them across the river. Two of the ghosts manned a large, skin canoe and poked it across, but as the bow touched the bank where they were standing, the oldest brother pointed out to his fellows that it was transparent. They all looked down into it and could see sticks and stones on the bottom of the river through the floor of the craft. They were somewhat nervous about trusting themselves in such a canoe, but the oldest shut his eyes and jumped aboard without mishap, followed by the other three. They soon landed on the beach in front of the village, but before any one of the four could set foot on the ground the ghosts who had come crowding around picked them up in their arms. Each was passed by his holder to another further inland, and in this way they were gently thrown from hand to hand until deposited within the house of the chief, without using their feet and without a single ghost having had to move from the spot where he had been standing.

The four human beings found themselves in a large house crowded with what seemed to be people, but what they knew must be ghosts. At that distant period, men were wiser than they are today, and the brothers realized that the chief must be Ałtsi-ła-ial himself. Ghost-heralds brought food to the four strangers, but they concealed it beneath their capes instead of eating it, remembering what they had heard at Kimsquit that a person who eats the food of the dead can never leave their home. The chief was kind to them and somewhat facetiously told them that they would come to harm if they stayed in a country where the people played so much as they did in his. He added that they could return to earth by the same route by which they had come, and advised them to

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

539 775 hurry back. After as short a visit as they thought polite, they asked to be ferried back across the river and retraced their steps to the cave where they had slept the previous night. It was dusk by this time and they lay down to sleep. During the night the cave rotated on itself once more, and in the morning they were delighted to find themselves in the mountains above the Dean River.

This was the first time that anyone had penetrated to the land of ghosts, and the friends of the four brothers were intensely interested in the account of their experiences. It was October at the time, but they explained that it was late winter in the land below. No one knows why or how the four brothers had received the power to pass into the land of ghosts, although it is assumed that Aqunsiw must have granted them the boon.

A Kitlobe Story of a Descent to the Land of Ghosts

179 539 775 The following story was related by an elderly man who had heard it about ten years previously from three Christian Kitlobe who had been his fellow-passengers on a steamship between Vancouver and Bella Coola. It is not a Bella Coola story, although it has been circulated among members of the tribe as an interesting tale. The facts recorded in it do not agree entirely with their beliefs, but that is a matter of no [829] consequence to the Bella Coola who, having their own knowledge, consider it quite natural that the other tribes should have other concepts.

539 775 About one year before the story was told, a Kitlobe woman had died, leaving her husband and one grown-up daughter to mourn her. The husband refused to be comforted, and used to fall into a paroxysm of weeping whenever he saw any of his wife's clothing or goods. About a week after her funeral he took her clothing to the cemetery intending to burn it, but instead sat down on the ground to weep. Presently he noticed a passage beside him, down which he crawled until he came to a flat, rich land more prosperous than this world, where he wandered along aimlessly till he heard the sound of singing and hid himself behind a clump of bushes. There seemed to be five or six groups of people in different sections of the country, and the song was taken up in succession by each group. When he had remained in his hiding-place for some time, two people in new, white clothes passed so close to him that he could hear the rustling of their garments. He recognized one of the passers-by as his wife, and the other as a fellow-villager who had died some time previously. Somewhat perturbed at finding his wife apparently on friendly terms with a male ghost, the husband decided to return home and ponder before taking any rash steps. 539 775

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

He crawled back along the passage to the cemetery and at once burnt his wife's clothing. When he reached home his daughter, who had been worried at his long absence, saw that her father had been weeping and tried to console him. He told her rather brusquely not to interrupt; and, while eating, recounted what he had seen that day, stating his determination to return in the morning and bring back his dead wife. His daughter begged him not to do so, reminding him that her mother had died of her own volition and that it would be dangerous to bring her back to earth; but the grieving father paid no attention to her appeal.

Next morning the man went again to the cemetery, where he found the passage still open. He went down, hid in the same thicket, and heard the same singing taken up by group after group. As on the previous day, after a considerable period of waiting, his wife passed by in company with the same male ghost. The husband rushed forth, seized her and shoved away her companion, who ran off discomfited. The woman offered no resistance, and her husband told her that he was going to take her back home again. The two returned to the passage, the man guided his dead wife through it to the cemetery, and thence they set out for their house.

Meanwhile the daughter, dreading what might transpire, had remained within. As her father opened the door, she cowered at the side of the house and saw that his hand was held out as if he were leading someone, though only one figure was visible to her. Her fear increased when she heard lighter footsteps accompanying his, and the rustling of clothing. She heard her father tell his wife, whom he addressed by name, that he would leave her in the main part of the house for a moment while he arranged the bedroom; he set about this, but though the daughter eagerly looked for her mother, she was invisible. When the father returned, he led his wife to the bedroom, but to the daughter it seemed as if he had put out his arm to guide nothing more tangible than air. The frightened girl could hear her father asking questions and giving answers as if in conversation, but her mother's voice was inaudible. The daughter heard her father ask his wife how she liked the land below and, judging from his later comments, concluded that she had said it was preferable to the land of the living except for the scarcity of food. The mother must have added that for this reason ghosts visit the houses of

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

539 human beings, knock crumbs to the ground with minute hooks, and 775 punish by beating with the same barbs anyone who offends them by picking up such morsels. The girl heard her father say that in future he would be more careful to throw fragments of food on the fire, since he now knew that these were not only desired by the dead, but were necessary to them. Her mother must have asked whether they had eaten all the dried salmon, for her father answered:

"No. We have been so grief-stricken at your death that we have eaten hardly anything."

After a pause the girl heard her father say "All right," and judged that her mother had said she would go to get some. In a moment the door opened, though no one appeared, and the thoroughly awed girl heard the sound of light footsteps. She saw the ropes with which the box was bound unloosened without visible agent, and the salmon piled in a neat heap on the floor, then the bundle seemed to rise of its own accord and pass out through the front-door without human aid. After an interval the father appeared and asked his daughter where her mother had gone. The frightened girl told what she had seen, and both were amazed and puzzled. At last it dawned on the grieving husband that his wife must have stolen the food for the benefit of her friends below and had returned to her new home.

The husband, now twice bereaved, was filled with woe at this second loss, which was unexpected as his wife had said nothing of her intention of leaving. After deliberating for several days, he descended again to the land of ghosts, heedless of his daughter's appeals. He concealed himself in the same spot as before, and soon heard singing; but this time the words and tune were different and he listened intently. To his horror, the theme was of the ingenuity of a dead woman who had revisited her home, deceived her husband, and brought away a supply of dried salmon for the use of the ghosts. He recognized that the song must refer to his own wife and, grieved and humiliated, he returned home forthwith. He warned his daughter to say nothing of what had occurred and she obeyed his instructions, not wishing their shame to become known. A few days later, however, a number of friends gathered to console the husband; he became intoxicated, told the guests his adventures, and taught them the songs used by the dead.

A Carrier Story of an Ascent to the Land of the Dead

177 The following, like the last, is not a Bella Coola story. It 539 is one known to a number of Kitsaquit and deserves inclusion

among Bella Coola tales if only for the reason that stories of foreign origin, when told sufficiently often, tend to be considered indigenous and the facts recorded in them accepted and incorporated into Bella Coola belief. This factor is undoubtedly responsible for many conflicting elements in their theology. The following story has every indication of Christian influence but is not less interesting on that account, as illustrating the process of assimilating new ideas into mythology.

About 1870, Mâmaiyu,[a] a Xwaiś Indian from Ootsa Lake, and his brother were trapping beaver in one of the lakes of the interior. They were both good hunters and every morning killed at least one of the animals. Mâmaiyu was a strong, apparently healthy man, but one morning he fell dead. His grief-stricken brother was puzzled to know what to do with the body. It was winter, and the heavy snow and frozen earth made interment impossible, while lack of fire-wood made cremation out of the question, so he merely tied up the corpse to await better weather. Meanwhile Mâmaiyu had gone aloft, where he saw a huge house containing many rooms. He went to the first of these, where a man was sitting with a huge book before him.

"What do you want?" asked the man.

Mâmaiyu did not answer and his questioner continued:

"Your name is not here. Why did you come?"

This happened in one room after another, for Mâmaiyu tried them all. Finally, at the end of the house, he came to the seat of the chief, who said to him:

"You have made a mistake. The time for you has not yet come. If you want to stay, you can do so by drinking this."

He showed Mâmaiyu a glass containing a green liquid.

"If not," continued the chief, "you must drink this," and he showed him another glass filled with a white liquid.

Throughout this speech Mâmaiyu had heard a strange rumbling and wondered what could be its cause. Happening to glance out through a window at the rear of the house, he saw a huge, metal ball, constantly revolving and giving forth the rumbling sound as it did so. From within [a] This story was related by Jim Pollard, an elderly Kimsquit, who stated that as a young man he had known Mâmaiyu, who was about fifty years older than he. This tale is interesting as showing the manner in which a miraculous account can become accepted as fact within a short space of time. Mâmaiyu must have been a man of imaginative temperament who was convinced that he had experienced incidents told to him by some white man.

came wailing voices and at intervals an agonized face appeared at one of the many small openings in the surface of the sphere. The supreme being, for the chief was none other, told him that those within the ball were evil persons, those who had committed theft or murder during life. Mâmaiyu, though innocent of these crimes, decided that he would be safer on earth and asked for the glass with the white liquid, which he hastily drained. The supreme deity inquired what present he would like as token of the visit, and he requested a beaver-axe, that is, one with a crooked handle such as beaver use.*

At the moment when Mâmaiyu drank the white liquid, his brother saw his body move very slightly. He hastily warmed some mountain goat grease and with this rubbed his face and mouth. At first he was unable to speak, owing to his muscles having become rigid from the cold, but they loosened gradually so that he was able to recount his experiences. Mâmaiyu's axe, being of supernatural origin, was invisible to all human beings, but this did not affect its potency, and from that time onwards the owner could catch beaver as easily as other men could catch salmon.

B 177 539 775

The information contained in this story does not correspond at all with Bella Coola beliefs concerning the fate of the dead. They tell it, and assume that such experiences are normal for dead Xqais, though unknown to their own people.

[825]

*The Bella Coola know that beaver must have axes of this kind to accomplish their work, although white people, deceived by the invisibility of them, believe the animals use their teeth. Mâmaiyu received an axe of this type.

CHAPTER IX

RELATIONS WITH THE SUPERNATURAL

Introductory—Sterile Apparitions—Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate—Supernatural Good Luck—Shamanism—Direct Revelation from the Supreme God—Power Localized in Certain Spots—Dreams

Introductory

THE aspects of Bella Coola life thus far described have been principally of a nature which might be experienced by any member of the community. On the other hand, contact with supernatural beings is a privilege granted to individuals without respect to rank; even arduous appeal cannot assure it. The few to whom signal favours are granted acquire a position of importance totally different from that of chiefs. The Bella Coola are firmly convinced that supernatural beings abound in the mountains and forests of British Columbia, and that every activity of human life is governed by them. Not only do these creatures include monsters of the imagination, but birds, animals, and fish; even the activities of the human mind are considered to be beyond the scope of normal life. Ancient stories describing the actions of strange creatures and conversations between man and animals are accepted as truthful accounts, so that it seems obvious to the Bella Coola that his ancestors were more powerful than he is today. Never considering the possibility of errors in his stories, he accepts the alternative hypothesis that mankind has sadly degenerated from the golden age. Nevertheless, he assumes that the beings have not altered, and consequently hopes to encounter them on every occasion. Moreover, this firm background of belief makes it easy for him to recognize supernatural influence in events which a white man would consider to be natural. It is impossible to over-emphasize this concept.

787 * [554] 787 * 796 [825] [538] 981

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 787 Dances portraying supernatural beings, carried out with [535] full vigour until a few years ago, further fostered belief in [781] them among participants and uninitiated alike. Consequently, many of the young and middle-aged men claim to have seen visions similar to those of their elders. The incident already described (I, p. 30) of the stump which was thought to be a grizzly bear is a case in point. On another occasion a young man mentioned casually that a few evenings before he had seen a headless man walking along the road and that, wishing to view the monstrosity more clearly, he had tried unsuccessfully to strike a match. The reason was obvious to him; the power of the supernatural visitor prevented the match from lighting. The man, who was undoubtedly convinced of the apparition, may have seen something, perhaps a whorl of fog, somewhat resembling a headless body. A white man would have con- [154] sidered such a sight impossible and absurd, whereas the Bella Coola felt little surprise at the appearance of such a creature and promptly accepted it for what it seemed to be.

[828] Mental activities as well as optical illusions are likewise ascribed to supernatural agency. These include profound agitations of the mind, and even what a white man would consider a passing thought. For instance, one morning when about to start work, a certain man stated that he would have good fortune during the day, that a dream had foretold it. At the time he was moving to a new house and needed help to shift a heavy stove. During the course of the day a number of white men happened to pass by and stopped to speak to him; the stove was mentioned, they offered to move it for him, and did so easily and quickly.

"There you are," said the man, "I told you I was going to have good fortune today."

On another occasion the same man claimed to have felt that misfortune had happened to him and soon learnt that one of his sons had been arrested on a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct. The man affirmed that he had this premonition before being aware of its cause.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

The explanation of these manifestations of the supernormal, for such they are considered to be, lies in the conviction that every activity of the mind is due to supernatural causation, the functioning of the spirit. In the round of daily life there are always good and bad incidents; the person who wakes expecting to meet one or other before nightfall recognizes the fulfilment of his premonition in some small occurrence, and narrates it to his fellows as proof of what he had told them in the morning. In case of some major event, such as death or disaster, the Bella Coola assume that some previous indication must have been given. Looking back after the event, a man easily persuades himself that he "felt" a warning, and is more than ever convinced that his spirit, the cause of his thoughts, has supernatural ability.

987 * 811 [828] [774] [774]

Conviction in the near presence of the supernatural has had somewhat surprising results with regard to Christian Bella Coola. A man converted in middle life carries all the fervour and realism of the old religion with him to the new, and feels thoroughly familiar with the atmosphere of the Old Testament. Visitations, such as therein described, are similar to those experienced by his fathers and himself, and he scorns the white man who questions their literal accuracy. He continues to hear the voices of supernatural beings, and to interpret mental pictures as visions, but he ascribes them to the beings of the white man's religion. The following is a rather striking illustration of this point:

177 987 * 781 797 [828]

A number of years ago a devout Christian, who may be designated X, was a patient in the hospital at Bella Bella. In the same ward was a young Bella Bella lad whose sickness refused to yield to treatment. X, becoming interested in his neighbour, began to ponder about his condition, until presently he felt convinced that the sufferer would be better by seven o'clock the following morning, and told him so. A marked improvement was noticeable by the time predicted, but the white doctor foolishly (according to X) gave his patient some

159 177 787 * 781 797

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

159 more medicine and he became worse. The same thing happened 177 on the following day. The sick boy grew steadily worse until,
* 787 nine days later, he felt that he was dying and asked X to help 781 him.

797 "No," replied X, "I am no doctor. But you will be all right. I see Holy Ghost, Holy Spirit, Baptism, and Believe-it [Faith?] by your bed. Repent and you will be saved."

X added that the Bella Bella saw and repented before his death so that he has undoubtedly been saved.

X is a friend of the writer's and a man with whom he worked for a number of months and whom he feels that he knows intimately. He is almost invariably truthful, and any falsehoods he uses are clumsy and easily detected. In this case there is no doubt but that he believes he saw these four figures as four white human beings. He was in an emotional condition at the time, hoping and expecting to see something of the kind. In earlier days he would have seen supernatural beings of the Bella Coola pantheon with equal conviction. On quite another occasion, when he was preaching, the same man felt what seemed to be a heavy drop of water fall on his head. He was in the open at the time and, looking up, was surprised to find nothing from which it could have fallen. He realized that it must have been power which had come to him, and forthwith he began to preach as he had never preached before. He expected supernatural assistance, and the belief that it had been granted to him undoubtedly strengthened his efforts.

* 787 All Bella Coola are not equally liable to visions and mental 781 visitations. Some, such as X, are constantly experiencing 159 them, whereas others of more stolid disposition do not feel the presence of the supernatural to the same extent. None the less, beings of the other world are constantly around them and, before the introduction of Christianity, it is unlikely that any individual passed through life without coming in contact with some manifestation of the supernatural. Consequently, stories
* 787 descriptive of this are intelligible to the Bella Coola, however

1:bk:Dorsith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NES Bellacoola NES

though they may be to the white man. It is hoped that the preceding illustrations, drawn from recent times, will explain the mental attitude of the Bella Coola better than incidents from folk-lore of the distant past. 787

Disregarding thoughts which, since they are caused by the spiritual elements of the human body, are ever present, relations with the supernatural may be divided into the following categories: [828] [774]

(1) Appearance of supernatural beings from which neither good nor bad results follow. Strictly speaking, every fleeting sight of a supernatural being belongs to this category, but it will be convenient to describe only experiences of a peculiar kind, such as the Bella Coola call qun-ahálawa(n)talaic. Usually manifestations of the supernatural have certain effects; consequently, there are relatively few incidents of this kind recorded.

(2) Supernatural aid vouchsafed to a man or a woman in distress. There are many tales illustrating this, which are told and retold to the children. In most cases the assistance is given to one who has undeservedly, according to Bella Coola concepts, fallen into misfortune.

(3) Supernatural good luck. This may be obtained by anyone, and consists of the acquisition of a supernatural object to attract, not only fish and animals, as if it were a potent bait, but money and goods as well. [771] [224] [226]

(4) Acquisition of shamanistic power, with or without the ability to cure the sick. This may be received from one of two sources: [756]

(a) Tlin-kpilla-a or some other supernatural being.

(b) Ghosts, which are likewise supernatural. [775]

(5) Obtaining prophetic powers direct from the supreme god. There are few instances of this, and none that is ascribed to a remote period. It is possible that all examples of this kind can be attributed to indirect Christian influence. [777]

(6) Obtaining power from a supernatural being localized in a particular spot. This usually takes the form of succour when [756] sick, and gives the person securing it ability to treat the same disease in others.

(7) Dreams, especially those in which supernatural apparitions visit the sleeper.

Sterile Apparitions

The most common sterile apparitions are those of a stone giving birth to a smaller stone, a tree falling almost to earth, then righting itself, or the sight of some enormous monster. Such an experience may come to anyone, and no one can tell what it may portend. The following examples will illustrate this kind of phenomenon. In accordance with Bella Coola usage, these are recorded as if actual facts.

Between 1890 and 1900 a number of men were paddling home to Bella Coola one fine October day when, as they were passing beneath some precipitous rocks to the west of Kwatna Inlet, they saw a giant, as big as a medium-sized tree, come leaping down into the sea. They could not see his face, which was turned in the opposite direction, but as he sprang they noticed that his hands were shaking like a dancer's. He struck the water with a tremendous splash, hurling the spray a distance of a hundred yards, and nearly swamping the canoe. They realized that the being must be a snaiy, since it is well known that these creatures migrate to the mountain lakes for the summer and return to the ocean in the autumn.

Since there is a tendency for supernatural apparitions to appear in close succession, the paddlers were little surprised next day, as they passed near some flat rocks where seals were wont to sun themselves, to see a number of these animals come hurtling down from among the trees on the slope of a near-by mountain. The last to appear was as big as a grizzly bear. Undoubtedly the creatures were supernatural beasts that had assumed the form of seals. It had been a fine, clear day, but as soon as they had taken to the water such a severe storm arose that the canoe was almost engulfed.

[i.e., appearances of supernatural beings from which neither good nor bad results follow. – See cat. 116, p. 517 – ANALYST]

On the following day another adventure befell the same party when they were almost home. Passing the site of the present cannery, on the south side of North Bentinck Arm, about half a mile from its head, they went among some old stumps which at high tide resembled basking seals. When in the midst of these, they all seemed to come to life, crashing into the water in all directions, raising billows which drenched the paddlers with foam and nearly wrecked the canoe. The travellers considered themselves fortunate in reaching Bella Coola alive.

Apparitions have appeared several times near Mesatche Nose, the point between South Bentinck Arm and Labouchere Channel, a place noted for storms. On one occasion the father of a Bella Coola, in 1922, sixty years of age, was near there when he suddenly saw lights on two mountains diagonally opposite each other on either side of the fiord, at a distance of about six miles. The lights grew bigger and bigger, approached each other and receded, until finally they merged; it became bright as day, although it was midnight at the time, and there was only a new moon. The lights separated after a little, until each gradually withdrew to its mountain and disappeared.

Near the same spot some travellers once saw an enormous mountain goat walking on the surface of the water. Almost immediately a storm arose which swamped the canoe, and drowned all but one of its occupants. As soon as the craft was submerged, the gale subsided, as is always the case after people have been drowned.

During 1924, while a young Bella Coola was proceeding down South Bentinck Arm in his motor-boat, a storm arose and the waves poured into his boat until it almost foundered. In the midst of the gale he saw two pillars of water shoot up from the surface of the fiord to a great height, then gradually fade away as if they had been smoke. The storm ultimately subsided. No one could tell which supernatural being had 777 539 that mentioned itself. A white man's explanation would be that the "apparition" consisted of two water-spouts.

On another occasion several Bella Coola were encamped on the shore of one of the bays of King Island opening from Labouchere Channel. As they lay dozing by the fire they became aware that a woman dressed in black was sitting near them, but closer to the flames than a mortal could have set. She explained that she had been gathering mussels and was warming herself; then, rising, she walked into the sea and disappeared. She was one of the ocean dwellers of whom little is now known though formerly they were more often visible. Another time one of the same folk was plainly seen sitting on a rock, but as her observers blinked their eyes she vanished.

[192] Dwellers in the underwater world are to be found beneath the lakes of the interior as well as under the ocean. Not many years ago, when some men were carrying goat meat down from their hunting ground, they stopped beside the small lake which lies at the head of the creek Swapi-a', which enters the Bella Coola River about eight miles from the sea.

"I wonder what lives in that lake," one man said idly to a companion.

"Nothing," the other replied, but the first responded:

"You are wrong. Something evil lives there."

He had hardly finished speaking when there rose from the lake a man with long hair, who stood, swaying back and forth, with the water around his thighs.

"There you see," said the first speaker to his doubting comrade, "I knew something lived yonder."

After a few minutes the man sank back under the water. Forthwith a strong wind began to blow, and snow not only fell from the heavens but rose from the lake. The hunters, who were not clothed for wintry weather, had great difficulty in getting back to the valley.

Occasionally the works of underwater people have been seen. The father of a man here about 1880 was paddling to Kwatna Inlet one night when he, as well as the other occupants of the canoe, heard a roaring noise and saw a fall-wall, similar to those used by the Bella Coola, stretching across Burke Channel, which is about a mile and a half wide at this point. They were close to the beach and a brave man cut a passage through the obstacle. A similar trap was once seen stretching across South Bentinck Arm.

An unusual apparition may be regarded as an omen of death. For example, not many years ago a young half-breed saw a motor-boat moored to the bank of North Bentinck Arm with an eagle seated in the stern. He ran his own motor-boat towards it, but as he approached the eagle became a man. This man he drew still nearer, never taking his eyes off the other boat, it, with its occupant, sank beneath the water, without leaving so much as a ripple. On relating the incident to his father, the latter recognized it as an omen of death. Six months later the half-breed's sister died, thus confirming her father's prognostication.

Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate.

Experiences such as have been cited in the last section are regarded as of possible, and not infrequent occurrence at the present time. On the other hand, supernatural aid granted to those in misfortune, though it is the theme of many stories, is not considered as likely to happen now. The Bella Coola believe the narratives to be chronicles of actual events, and base their conceptions of many supernatural beings on their characteristics as therein described. There is no ceremonial significance attached to any of these stories; they may be, and are told by anyone, frequently for entertainment. Unquestionably, there is a feeling that the moral brought out in such tales is of value in educating the young people, though this point is never emphasized.

Supernatural aid granted to an unfortunate person is termed ulkhwalqlut. Power so obtained cannot be transmitted by the recipient, although memory of the experience is occasionally preserved as the theme of a court dance. The reason is also somewhat hazily applied to any instance of supernatural help. The reason for the receipt of power is often ascribed to the strong supernatural elements of the favoured one, or to his having made himself agreeable to supernatural beings by the observance of ceremonial chastity or other propitiatory means. A few individuals assert that there is a tendency for supernatural aid to follow certain ancestral families, but such a belief is not general.

The following story is typical of the kind of assistance granted although no clear picture can be presented except through the native medium—a number of different tales, such as are given in the following chapter.

THE [illegible] FAMILY OF 'TIMAGI

[illegible] long after the earth was first populated there were living at [illegible], near [illegible], near [illegible] and [illegible], with their wives, relatives, and slaves. [illegible]'s son, 'Timagi, fell a victim to the strident disease, [illegible], which causes the face of the sufferer to swell and he falls to [illegible]. When the sun appeared hopeless, his father called his family to tell the people to abandon [illegible], and to leave the dying youth alone. Accordingly they removed the plants from the houses, packed them on canoes with all the food and clothing from the village and moved away, leaving the unfortunate 'Timagi alone in the canoe. Only an old slave woman took pity on him before she left she did some glowing embers with fresh coconut-husk in a large clam-shell and told him where to find them.

'Timagi was literally alone in relative discomfort, for presently he drew the oars and so alone nursing the face of his position. He unwrapped the clam-shell and then the embers into a fire. Then he made a hammer with which he built a rude shelter. A [illegible] of [illegible] on the [illegible] side, but before long he made a hook in hopes of catching some [illegible]. He went up the river to a suitable spot, dropped in his lacing hook and almost immediately felt a bite. He hauled up his line eagerly, but it was only a worthless fish-head. Angrily he pulled out the hook and threw the fish-head into the water. Almost immediately there was a bite, again he drew up his line only to find no fish, but a human head, which he further back into the river. This happened once more, and, discouraged at landing only four useless fish, he wrapped his head in his eyes and cried himself to sleep. The next day Yukuji once more tried his luck fishing, but again only landed four bull-heads, and again cried himself to sleep. It was the same on the third day and the fourth, and in the evening the hungry and disconsolate youth wept for a long time, his head wrapped in his cape.

Presently he felt someone kick his feet and heard a voice saying, "Stop crying! Get up!"

When the startled Yukuji opened his eyes there was no one in sight. Concluding that he must have been mistaken, he again covered his eyes and went to sleep. But he was aroused in the same way, once more without being able to see his visitor. This time before he lay down he made a tiny slit in his cape so that while he pretended to be asleep he was really searching through the crevice. Soon he saw approaching a beautiful woman whose hair was worn in long braids as was the fashion of Pure Happy women. Eagerly Yukuji drew back his cape, but at his first movement she vanished. There was nothing to do but hope that she would return, so he again lay down with the opening opposite his eye. Once more the woman drew near, but this time she could not move, even when she kicked him and repeated her command not to cry.

"I am you," he answered, "don't run away."

The strange woman sat down without demur.

"Why did you throw away my children?" she asked. "They showed kindly feeling towards you in allowing themselves to be caught, and you injured them mightily. From the fox I have saw your misery and have come to help you. From I shall save you."

When she had done this the woman continued, "I am going to give you supernatural power; when you want anything just think of me and it will appear. I give you the chief's name, Kamadzu; when you give a gathered you must carve me on the posts of your house. My name is Heaven."

Then the woman vanished. She was a fairy in human form, which all animals are able to assume at will, though the animals have the ability to see them except in animals.

Yukuji decided to use his newly received power by wishing for a house. He thought of Heaven, and forthwith there stood a fine house before him. By merely thinking of his handiness he was now able to fill it with goods, blankets, mats, bows, hatchets, cooking utensils, and food of all kinds, and on the hearth he now had a bottle of sake. The use of the supernatural power the property of its owner.

Meanwhile Kamadzu and Kamadzu with him were in dire straits for food. One day the old dove woman who had befriended Yukuji happened to be hanging out her fish Kamadzu when she saw smoke rising from the place,

She ordered it to be a hot fire, but, when she idly went near to investigate, her amazement at past all bounds at seeing a fine house filled with valuables. Her master surprise knowing when she discovered that Tsimaqi was lord of it all. He welcomed her gladly, gave her a hearty meal, and sent back with or some seal meat for her child, only adding that it was to be eaten secretly as he did not wish his father to know of his good fortune.

"But," he added, "I don't mind if you send me any of the people except my father, especial any who were good to me long ago."

The slave woman gladdily carried the meat home to her child. But he, long deprived of proper food, ate so ravenously that night that a bone stuck in his throat and his coughing awoke Qwa'sala. The chief promptly the youngster's sick until he vomited what was obviously a piece of seal. The slavewoman, remembering Tsimaqi's order, tried to evade her master's questions as to where her son had obtained it, but at last she blurted out the truth, how the abandoned youth had become prosperous.

The slave woman under friends moved to Qwiqui, where Tsimaqi used his power of thought-obtain for them houses filled with everything they could desire. But Qwa'sala and those left with him were starving, so that they too were forced to seek his aid, gladly marrying their daughters to him to consider his protection. He rapidly rose to a position of importance, brought hundred of both real and fictitious wives, and was even able to guide his elder brothers with mates. Some of the women married to his brother almost his slaves, as their families were unable to refuse him.

Supernatural Good Luck

A third manner in which the Bella Coola can come into contact with powers another place is through supernatural good luck. This consists in obtaining something from a supernatural being, usually portion of its skin body, which acts as a lure to fish, animals, and even to such inanimate articles as blankets or skins. Even a tiny morsel placed on a weir will attract numerous salmon, or if set on a trap will prove an infallible lure to animals. When put in the owner's box, valuables will be attracted to it as steel to a magnet. Thus the fortunate possessor will be able to give many potlatches and to reach a high position in the community. Since this good fortune is wrapped up in a specific object it follows that the luck is transmissible; in fact, one of the chief advantages to the man who owns some valuable object is the wealth which he derives from selling a small portion of it. 777 789 [432]

The Bella Coola term for supernatural good luck is ayu, meaning, "What is Good." This can come from any being though it is most frequently obtained either from a mitopsi or a sisiutl. The former resembles a toad of enormous size, with a blazing fire-like glow in its throat; the latter is a double-headed salmon or snake that can travel on land. The person who succeeds in killing one of these creatures can use the carcass as a lure to wealth, if he knows the proper means. The portion must be wrapped in an article that has been in close contact with the slayer, such as a piece of his soiled clothing. This must be kept carefully hidden for one year in a cranny to which no rain can penetrate, and after that it can be used as bait. There is equal potency in a stick or other object which has come in contact with the beast. Great danger is attached to the sight of a mitopsi or a sisiutl, since death usually follows any incorrect attempt to gain wealth from either. The person who sees one of these creatures feels no ill effects until he draws near a fire, when his stomach burns. All the Bella Coola agree that if a man has been close to one he can be cured by the use of certain medicines, but the following stories show that there is no clear-cut opinion as to which are the best. In fact, most families have knowledge of a specific cure which they regard as the most efficacious. [776] [776] [761] [757]

The opportunity to obtain supernatural good luck does not come solely to unfortunate individuals; indeed the Bella Coola state that it is fortuitous. It appears, however, that usually the person who is thus favoured is one who has practised conventional chastity, or is, through some other means, in a state of cleanliness pleasing to the supernatural. At any rate the danger of seeing such creatures is less to a man who is in a pure condition than to any other. Further, in most cases they are apt to appear to a person whose ancestors have seen one. [185]

777 A visitation is not regarded as an inheritable right, but as a
* 787 tendency; for generations no member of a family may see one of these beasts, but the tradition is preserved, and when one [424] is seen it is recalled that such have been observed by ancestors of the fortunate one. Instances have occurred in which a person has obtained good luck without the tradition of this being in his family, but they are rare. On the other hand, a man may lose the advantage of his possession, even if he owns [785] a portion of a mitqas or a sisiutl, through failure to observe communal charity.

776 Some of the Bella Coola believe that the mitqas and the sisiutl are the same animal, which can assume these two forms; others that the two are distinct supernatural creatures. In any case the powers and characteristics ascribed to them are the same. Most families have a tradition regarding the appear-[173] ance of the one or the other to their ancestors, and the infor-[184] mation to be derived from them is always about that particular creature. Hence the details here described are probably not all known to any one individual.

* 787 The different types of appearances, and the different types 811 of taboos called forth, should be noted. These are due to 182 failure on the part of the Bella Coola to rationalize the non total of their concepts. Each man recounts what he believes to have happened to one of his ancestors or friends, irrespective of whether or not the methods used may be in direct contradiction to those employed by someone else on another occasion. A man who has heard of the mitqas, for example, from his father and mother, may describe contradictory modes of dealing with the creature, and in each case may affirm that disaster would have followed if the method described had not been carried out. Such lack of co-ordination is typical of the Bella Coola.

777 According to an elderly Kimsquit man, the mitqas was
* 787 brought down in the beginning of time by one of his own [775] ancestors, Omqumkilda. It is to this fact that he attributes his own near approach to one on two occasions. As it is froquently not until the fourth appearance that a person obtains supernatural good luck, he is still hoping for two more visitations, the second of which he expects to be fruitful.

One day as he was poling up the Kimsquit River he heard a sound resembling thunder proceeding from a log-jam. From descriptions given him by his father, he knew that this must be the voice of a mitqac, but, not having observed ceremonial chastity, he was afraid to investigate, although the sound seemed to follow his canoe for a considerable distance, it only stopped when another canoe approached. From the fact that he alone heard the voice, he knew that it was for him that the creature had come and only the arrival of other people had deterred it from appearing.

On another occasion the same man was close to the nest of a mitqac. He and another hunter were together in the forest above the Dean River and both saw the stone nest behind a waterfall, but for some time each refrained from pointing it out to the other. Towards dusk the first man's attention was called to it by his companion, and they debated on a course of action. Each was desirous of obtaining the benefits to be derived from a successful use of the nest, but each was afraid of the evil consequences should he fail. The friend had observed continence for some time so it was decided that in the morning he should be the one to make the approach; the other man, well versed in these matters, instructed him very carefully what to do. That night both men were too excited to sleep.

Next morning the nest was still in the same place, but the friend hesitated about going up to it, and so they delayed, talking, it vanished in the twinkling of an eye and the opportunity passed.

The nest itself is sufficiently potent to bring good fortune without the mitqac. Not many years ago a man saw one containing a large green egg which he touched with one end of his musket. Then he carefully hid his weapon for one year in a cleft of the rocks where no water could reach it, nor did he mention what he had seen to anyone. When the time had [777] [224] elapsed, he fetched his musket from its hiding-place and again began to use it. Thereafterwards he never missed his aim; every shot brought down an animal.

Before the days of muskets good fortune could likewise be obtained by the discovery of the nest of a mutqan. Each contains small particles of the skin of all animals, including human beings, plucked from them in their sleep by humming birds and wasps. The finder must touch the nest with his stick, such as is always carried by hunters, then break it and throw it away, saying as he does so:

"May I see you at . . . tomorrow." This means next year.

He names his favourite hunting-ground. The finder must not say anything to anyone about his discovery, and for one year he must observe continence. If he then goes to the locality mentioned, he will there find his stick, the one which he broke when he touched the nest, though it will be invisible to anyone else. Adhering to it and will be four horns of the mutqan. [765] These he must hide for a year, wrapped in some of his own clothing, taking care that it is an article which he has long worn and which is accordingly saturated with his essence. [765] During this period, too, he must observe continence. Two years after finding the nest, he will be able to hunt with phenomenal success. [424] The knowledge of this proper procedure has been handed down to an unknown family for many generations.

On the occasion when the two men had seen the nest they [777] continued their journey, each chiding the other for his failure [187] to take advantage of the opportunity put in his path. Before long they saw a footprint where no man had been and knew [776] that it must be that of Tsaxalis, the supernatural hunter of mountain goats. In spite of remonstrances, the comrade accepted up a little also down the crack over the mountainside. In this he did wrong, especially as he had failed to take advantage of the opportunity presented to him by the nest of the monster wasp. That night as the two were encamped a slide came thundering down beside them, and they barely escaped with their lives. Not long afterwards the erring man died, [764] humor, a calamity unquestionably due to his carelessness in handling the earth where a supernatural one had trod. 777 787*

This point illustrates the danger of near approach to a [761] mikopo, a theme well exemplified in the stories in the next chapter. Such perils must be counteracted in diverse ways according to the traditions of different ancestral families. One common method is to seek a lonely spot in the woods and there hollow out a shelter beneath an overhanging rock or fallen tree-trunk where the person who has been exposed to danger must remain for four days, eating nothing and at intervals swabbing his body with branches of devil's club, spruce, and [824] other rough plants. These protect him from the evil effects of the encounter. 783

Similar in function to the mikopo, and equally dangerous to the unwary, is the sutsel. The latter is supposed to have been created on this earth, at Bella Bella, in the beginning of time by Tsilitlawat. It was at first the canoe used by this [773] [776] companion, and there turned home by him to escape the monsters and fiends, as it has ever since, equally at home on land and in water, and in various forms. The following is typical description of the manner in which a sutsel appeared in the past. 539 777 787*

Long ago a man was hunting in the mountains when he saw a sutsel, which changed to an human in a fish-like manner with two heads but no tail. He hunged at it with his stick, and it in doing started a slide which carried the sutsel down the mountain. As this was taking place, the human said:

"Go down the mountain, sutsel, I will get you at the bottom."

When he reached the foot of the new slide he saw the fish-like thing close to the water. He ran to it and dragg it on a sealing-hook rope. Now this sutsel was a sutsel, the first that had ever been held the human obtained supernatural good luck from his experience. He also took the name of Sutsel, a designation which has been handed down ever since.

After this adventure many people hunted for the sutsel, and with fair success in early days, but now it cannot be found. 777 787* owing to the failure of hunters to observe ceremonial chastity. When obtained, a sciatl was cut into small pieces, one of which worn upon the person would make the flesh so hard that an arrow could not penetrate.

Sometimes the sciatl assumes the form of either a spring or a cohoe salmon. Not long ago a Bella Bella man, travelling in a canoe, ate one of these. Once devoured, it reformed itself, made its way out by consuming the man's lower jaw, then jumped overboard and was lost.

The mere appearance of a sciatl does not necessarily bring misfortune to the beholder, even if he has not the necessary knowledge, or courage, to take advantage of it. The following is an instance.

On one occasion the father's father of a middle-aged Bella Coola was going upstream at the time the salmon were jumping, when, unknown to him, one leaped into the canoe behind him. His first knowledge of anything untoward came to him when the bow rose out of the water, and, looking around, he saw that this was caused by the weight of a grease-covered stone lying in the bottom of his canoe; the salmon had vanished. The man threw overboard his floor-board with the stone on it. When he told his friends afterwards of his experience, they informed him that he had missed an opportunity for obtaining supernatural good fortune, as the "salmon" must have been a sciatl.

The sciatl can also be used as a charm. If a man, while in a pure condition through the observance of ceremonial chastity, eats a small portion of the flesh, it renders him proof against bullet or arrow. An intelligent Bella Coola stated that his father's brother had done so on one occasion, with the result that a bullet, fired by his wife's mother's father, fell harmless at his feet after striking him.

Medicine can also be obtained indirectly from a sciatl. When one of these fish-like creatures swims through a pond, wriggling as it goes, it frequently sheds some of its scales.

This is a supernatural bird about the size of a crow, with a broad hooked beak and blue-black iridescent plumage. Its nest resembles that of a crow. The peculiarity of the bird is that its flesh and bones are of mountain goat grease; even its droppings are of this valuable substance, and it is these which are specially prized. Long ago gakin-i were comparatively common, but all have now fled beyond the range of the white man's rifle.

Wilmanuf knew what to do, so he crept stealthily up the mountain armed only with his hunting stick. Presently he saw a gakin-i looking on a mountain goat which had been caught in one of his snares. It answered to the descriptions Wilmanuf had heard, and he could see that its droppings were like solidified mountain goat grease. The hunter crawled near, and took advantage of the instant when the bird was within the goat's stomach to leap forward and club it as it looked up. Wilmanuf twisted the neck until the head separated from the body and flung the former behind him, to the right, without noting where it went. This enables the bird to return since, like all other living creatures, when it seems to die it does no more than shed its cloak of flesh. Then the hunter cut the body into halves, throw the right portion in the same direction as the head, and carefully cut the left half in his cups of cedar-bark. Next he collected the droppings and wrapped them in evergreen boughs. Carefully carrying his treasures, he went down the mountain, and hid them in a niche cut in the trunk of a cedar tree, before he went home.

Next day, Wilmanuf did not have but returned to the place, drew out the piece of the bird's body, and dried it over a fire, as if he were curing salmon for winter use. At night he went home, still refraining from telling anyone what he had done. For four days he cured the meat, then carefully closed the niche and went away.

For one year Wilmanuf did not hunt. Then he reopened the recess and saw that the meat was fresh and juicy, as if newly prepared. He left it in place, but dove forth the droppings and carried them off to a small bag. Persons followed him. By using a small piece of the solidified grease on his traps he had wonderful success. At length Wilmanuf told his fellow-villagers where he had obtained and they were envious of his good luck. He continued to prosper, and at last sold the droppings for a large amount of goods, though he carefully preserved the section of the body itself. When an old man, he showed his son where it was concealed and the latter likewise prospered throughout his life, owing to this possession. When he became old, he in turn told his son about it, so that the young man had the same good fortune as his father and grandfather.

father. But the great-grandson was too lazy to take the trouble of going with his father to the place where the section of the bird was hidden, so the treasure was lost.

A fourth giver of supernatural good fortune is one of the mythical creatures termed cwaq. This variety lives in the ocean, or rarely in rivers, and can occasionally be seen resting on the surface with its long, golden tresses floating on the water. The hair appears always to be flecked with eagle down, but in reality it is a mass of barnacles, the equivalent of this substance to this under-sea dweller. If the observer is brave, he will paddle cautiously near until he can twist a lock of the hair around his paddle and break it off. He must not touch it with his hands, but must dangle it outside the canoe, still wrapped about his paddle, until he reaches the shore, when he must conceal it in some lonely place for one year. After that period he can use a single hair, or piece of one, as bait; it will be enough to attract animals to his traps or salmon to his weir, exactly as with the mountain goat grease ceremonial of a gakin i or a stick that has come in contact with a giant toad. If the person who has jerked off the hair with his paddle should be foolish or ignorant enough to bring his spoil into his canoe, he, and all with him, are rendered incapable of movement and the craft with its occupants sinks beneath the sea.

The father's cousin of an informant once saw one of these animals when paddling in company with several companions to Kimsquit. The sea was smooth as glass when their attention was attracted by a number of small ripples, spreading in a half-moon shape from what they realized was the head of a cwaq. The hair crossed the ripples, but did not rise or fall with them. The back of the animal's head was toward the canoe so the opportunity seemed favorable for obtaining some of its hair. Cautiously the men paddled nearer, but at the last moment the crewmen feared to drive the canoe in among the golden tresses, so veered off and the craft passed along one side of the mass of hair. The animal had shown no sign of being aware of their presence, but it now began to turn away, so that its floating locks remained between them and its head. As it turned, the hair moved with it, so that, although the impression remained of a floating mat, there must have been some motive power to cause it to remain streaming out straight behind. Each strand moved through the ripples without being affected. Though the paddlers strained to the utmost to see the animal's face it thwarted their efforts by this continuous slow turning, until at last they went on their way, disappointed.

Yet another creature from which supernatural good fortune has been obtained is the Mother of Snakes, a creature described in the following story.

A family living at Pulkwa was reduced to the point of starvation through the failure of their salmon-weir. It seemed as if the fish avoided it. One day a son of one of the owners, who had been in trouble with a woman in the lower valley, went off into the woods not far from his village, where he saw what he thought was a black bear. When it came nearer he realized that its chest was tipped with silver and that its tongue kept shooting far beyond its jaws, hence that it must be the Mother of Snakes. This creature combines the qualities of bear and snake; it is about the size of the former, and it appears to have a serpent wrapped around its chest. It always pursues recruits and slays them, unless they know the proper means of escape. Luckily, the youth's father had long ago warned him what to do if chased by one, so he at once dashed off. First he ran downhill, but the animal gained on him; then he ran uphill, but still the monster drew nearer. The only way the fugitive could increase his lead was by ascending or descending in zigzags, since the beast's heavy legs then kept slipping. All day the pursuit continued, until towards dusk, when the youth was almost exhausted, he saw at last what he was looking for, a stump with spikeroots, projecting upwards. Pushing them apart with his hands, he leapt through the opening thus made, then circled the tree once anew, and pulled every one of the jagged spikes. Now the Mother of Snakes must always follow directly in the tracks of its quarry, and so it jumped through the passage the youth struck to access the back with the spikes which he had pulled out. Down fell the monster dead.

With his knife the lad cut off some of the animal's meat which he carried home, saying nothing to his father. Early the next morning the old man went to look at his salmon-weir, but as usual it was empty. As soon, however, as his son drew near, the river became packed with salmon, all heading towards the trap which was now filled.

"It seems as if you attracted the salmon like a magnet," said the father to his son. 777

The latter did not answer immediately, but later he said: 787 *

"You were right," and he told him what had happened. [539]

"You have obtained supernatural good luck," the old man replied simply. [226]

Following his son's instructions the father prepared canoes and boxes to bring back the flesh of the Mother of Snakes. They collected every scrap of it, which they preserved very carefully, and used small portions as bait to attract salmon to their weir with such success that they became wealthy.

Another supernatural being from whom supernatural good fortune may be obtained is Sîwanît-ôo-a, "The Female Mourner." When a chief dies she comes to wail, wandering through the woods near the village, where sometimes she can be seen in the form of a weeping woman. As she cries, she ejects mucus from her nose, which solidifies into a glass-like substance about a foot in length. Anyone who sees her should take the transformed mucus, and wrap it in some article of his own clothing; it will bring him good fortune. About midnight of June 11, 1921, the infant daughter of a Bella Coola died, and about seven o'clock on the following morning the wailing was heard in the woods behind the missionary's house. The brother of the dead child's father rushed off to try to find the weeping one. Luckily he did not succeed, because he did not know about collecting the mucus, and trouble would have come to him had he seen the supernatural being without knowing how to deal with it; in fact, even to hear Sîwanît-ôo-a is considered an omen of death. [776] [776] [768]

It will be seen from the foregoing specific instances that supernatural good luck is usually obtained by the slaying of some powerful creature. But, since every living creature is endowed with superhuman power, it follows that any object obtained from a bird or an animal that has acted in a peculiar way may be the cause of supernatural good fortune if it be kept for one year in the manner previously described. Some- [225] [224]

* Since the Bella Coola believe that it was heard, the incidence is recorded as a fact.

777 times a man finds a piece of the thick bark of the fir in one of
* 789 his traps; if he throw it away nothing happens, but if he conceal [224] it in a hidden cranny for one year and then use it for bait he will have supernatural good luck. Another bringer of good fortune is a giant crab, about two feet in diameter, sometimes found far in the forest. There is no danger attached to the appearance of either of these manifestations of the supernatural, which have merely the potential ability to bestow good fortune if the person seeing them knows and practises the proper ritual.

777 Sometimes, long ago, when a number of seals were seen
* 789 approaching the shore a man would notice that they were 224 peculiar. One would disappear beneath the surface, to emerge as a beaver, the beaver would vanish beneath the waves only to come up as a bear, a mountain goat, a deer, or some other animal. If a hunter wished to have phenomenal success at goat hunting, for example, he would wait until one of the seals appeared as a goat and then kill it. The carcass would drift ashore, as a seal, but on being cut open a stone shaped like a mountain goat would always be found in the stomach. To obtain success the hunter would wrap this in a piece of worn clothing, and hide it away beneath an overhanging ledge in some lonely spot in the woods. If left there for one year the stone became a magnet, and its owner, carrying it with him on his hunting expeditions, had amazing success. He had obtained supernatural good fortune, for one particular object. If, after cutting open the seal-mountain goat, the hunter failed to wrap up the stone in some of his clothing it vanished of its own accord.

The last Bella Coola to have supernatural good luck from this source was Winda, who died about 1910. His extraordinary success as a hunter was derived from a number of stones which his father had obtained from the stomachs of seals in the form of land animals. His prosperity ended when he sold his collection of stones to a Bella Bella man who still uses them with great effect.

Supernatural good fortune has also been obtained from the "Mothers" of certain plants.

Among the roots that are sought for when a man intends to give a potlatch are those of clover and of ckâl, a grass which grows on flats near the sea. Once the root of an elderly (in 1923) Bella Coola woman dug up the Mother of Ckâl, a root, thick as her thumb, but shaped like a woman. Perhaps the reason that she found it was because she was digging in the darkness, after the setting of the sun. The woman, ignorant of the proper procedure, did nothing, with the result that her hands became painfully swollen. If she had wrapped the root in a portion of her used clothing and kept it hidden for one year, without saying anything about her find, it would have brought her supernatural good luck.

Another woman found an elderberry as large as a baseball, and shaped like the mask worn also on the forehead by a member of the nuxul society. Her father, an old man skilled in such matters, wrapped the berry in his daughter's soiled clothing and kept it carefully hidden in her box. It brought her supernatural good luck because, no matter how much or how often she gave away presents, goods always came to her.

SUPERNATURAL GOOD LUCK FROM STONES

Stones are among the objects from which supernatural good luck can be obtained. A person who has long observed ceremonial chastity may be fortunate enough to hear what seems to be the weeping of a new-born infant, as he passes in his canoe beneath some steep stone cliff. Then, if he watches, he will see a stone being born from a larger one at the level of the sea. If the observer takes the infant-stone, wraps it in his soiled clothing and stows it among his possessions, it will act as other bringers of supernatural good fortune by having all kinds of valuables to the owner. In fact, such a stone is said to be so potent that if left in an empty box for some time, it will attract enough skins to fill the receptacle.

777 The last appearance of such a stone was in Dean Channel, 777 to the father of an elderly Bella Coola, who was too amazed 123 to take advantage of it. As far as could be ascertained, in 1911 there was only one stone which was regarded by the owner as having brought him good fortune. It had been obtained by one of his elderly relatives who died about 1906. This man had been walking beside the Bella Coola River one spring day when he happened to notice a woodpecker perched on one of the posts supporting an eulachon net. Without taking his eyes from it, he idly stooped down and threw a pebble at the bird which flew to the bank, lit on a pile of stones, and became one of them. Realizing that here might be the means of obtaining supernatural good fortune, if properly handled, the man watched for some time, then went forward, picked up the stone, covered it with evergreen boughs and wrapped the whole in a strip torn from the white-man's shirt he was wearing. With the axe he was carrying he cut a recess in a tree, put the object in it and covered the hiding place with the original bark. He said nothing about it, but the stone brought him such good luck that he obtained large quantities of everything desirable.

777 In later years the man, after replacing the stone in the hole 123 of the tree, went away to Victoria; when he returned, years later, it was still there. By placing it in his box he again prospered in all his ventures. When an old man the owner presented the stone to a relative who still treasures it. It is red, about a foot in length, shaped somewhat like a human figure without arms or legs, but with a prominent navel opening. See Fig. 2. The owner has kept it for years, hiding it even from his wife and allowing no white man to see it. He had been perfectly willing to have photographs taken of most of his ceremonial objects, but declined to permit this to be done with his walnut stone, and carefully hid it in a box after showing it. When he wished to use the transformed bird, it was wrapped in his old shirt, together with a small amount of money or whatever object was desired, and then set in a window of his house so 777 that the sun could fall on one uncovered end. The owner firmly 823 believes that this stone has brought him money on various occasions, and will do so again, though whether he expects the coins to be found inside of the wrapping, or merely to come to him in the course of trade is questionable. According to Bella Coola belief, they ought to appear beside the stone, but as this man attributes any good fortune to it, he never has any difficulty in proving its powers.

This stone is also used as a means of increasing the efficacy [515] of prayer. When its owner washes ceremonially in the river [789] before eating in the morning, he rubs it over his body as if it were soap and requests it to make him strong, make him well, grant him his desires, and so forth.

Shamanism

More important to the Bella Coola than any other mani- 104 festation of the supernatural is that power which makes an 756 * individual either an dźukwala or an dźanłots. The former is [787] * a person who, owing to ability granted him by a supernatural [788] being, is able to perform miraculous feats, especially in curing the sick; the latter is one with similar powers obtained from a ghost.[9] It is impossible to translate either of these terms accurately; the designation "shaman" is accordingly used in this monograph to describe both types of supernaturally endowed individuals. The most common and most important method of obtaining such power is from a living supernatural being; a person receiving the boon in this manner will be termed "shaman," and one empowered by a ghost will be known as "shaman from the dead."

The Bella Coola believe that long ago men were so much 756 * more powerful than at present, and so close to the supernatural, 773 that all were virtually shamans. The prowess and adventures 538

[9] Although only, of course, empirically, but, as the Bella Coola distinguish between shamans whose powers are derived from these two sources, it is accurate to follow their example.

* 756 of these demi-gods of antiquity are favourite themes for stories.
538 The powers of the later shamans have been far less than those of their forefathers, and their exploits have been of a somewhat [173] different character. Hence it is possible to divide the subject into three sections:

(1) Shamanism in the distant past.
(2) Modern shamanism.
(3) Shamans from the dead.

SHAMANISM IN THE DISTANT PAST

Information on this phase is contained in stories and a few anecdotes which describe the achievements of ancient demi-gods, endowed with miraculous powers of various kinds. The tales are similar in type to those dealing with the granting of supernatural aid to the unfortunate, so that it is in many cases difficult to differentiate them. As might be expected these narratives are not exact. Frequently the teller does not know from what being the ancient shaman received his power, nor can he explain the abilities described, which are different from, and superior to, those with which he is familiar. In fact it is customary to describe any mythical hero as a shaman.

[424] Tales of this kind can be related by any one; they are not the personal property of a specific family. Many of them, that of Waowalis, for example, are well known and are told and retold constantly.

In addition to information obtained from stories, a few isolated facts are remembered regarding ancient shamans. It
* 756 is thought that various taboos connected with hunting were 223 learnt by them in the distant past. Such restrictions and in-[224] junctions were firmly believed in and strictly adhered to until a few years ago, and many of them are still observed. The usual method of hunting harlequin ducks is, or was until recently, from a canoe, with a sapling set up in the bow to hide the hunter, crouched with bow and arrow in readiness; several shamans, however, were able to kill the birds by merely [262] waving the butt-end of a paddle towards them. Such power

1/Mc Dermith E-5 (1922-1924)948
NEA Bellacoola NES

would be of enormous value, since the Bella Coola consider these ducks a great delicacy, and say that their flesh resembles that of seals. In fact, when an invitation to a seal feast is given the words used mean, "come to eat harlequin ducks."

No attempt was made to collect all the shaman stories current in Bella Coola, but the subject is amply illustrated by those gathered, of which the following is representative.

The Adventures of Wawaxi'is

Long, long ago, there dwelt among the people who lived on the shore of Dean Channel and were partly Kimsquit, partly Bella Bella, a mighty shaman, Wawaxi'is. He was a married man with a son just learning to walk, and an adopted son about twelve years old. One day Wawaxi'is told the latter to fetch water, but the lad was lazy and made no motion to obey, so his foster father kicked him angrily. Whereon the boy cried out:

"What are you hurting me for? Why don't you hit your wife or your partner? They are always sleeping together when you are away."

Wawaxi'is apparently paid no attention to this, merely saying:

"Stop crying. I am sorry I kicked you so hard. Run along and get the water."

Wawaxi'is, who was a great laborer, began to get his canoe ready for a seal hunting trip, and told his adopted son to accompany him. The two set off within a few hours. Wawaxi'is owned a stick of which one end contained the power of causing death, and the other of restoring life; he had only to make the motions of throwing this stick at a living creature, death-dealing end foremost, and the one at which it was pointed fell dead. Many souls had been killed by this means when Wawaxi'is asked the boy:

"What was it you said when I kicked you?"

By this time the lad had regained his temper and was sorry he had disclosed what he knew.

"I said nothing," he murmured, "but gave a shout of pain."

"You lies," Wawaxi'is calmly replied. "You said that my wife was sleeping with my partner."

The boy, realizing that all was known, murmured truthfully:

"Yes, I did say that. I have often seen her doing so when you were absent."

It was late afternoon by this time and Wawaxi'is at once headed back to the village, which they reached soon after dark. No one saw their approach, as Wawaxi'is told the boy to stay with the canoe and the seals on the beach while he went to the town to investigate. He crawled cautiously to the outside of the house on the point where he knew his wife would be sleeping; there he crouched on the wall with his finger nail, making a noise like a mouse. He heard his wife say:

"I wish that spirit would use Wamai's corpse."

This so angered him that he came with the death-dealing end of his club, killing everybody within. Then he went around to the front door, entered, cut off the head of the false person, and carried it away. Then outside the house, he made the motion of opening with the life-giving end of his club, thereby covering all but the man he had beheaded. Then he went back to his canoe and returned to the sealing ground with his adopted son.

When a time the infant, whose son to further, was awakened by blood pouring over him, and cried so lustily that he woke his mother and grandmother. To the former's horror, she found her lover dead and beheaded. The grandmother asked what ailed the child and the mother replied that it had vomited blood. She arose, washed the infant, and dragged out the headless corpse to another part of the house where her lover's parents lived, then went back to her own place and slept. Next morning, when the parents of the dead man had called breakfast, they saw a young man to whom his brother, but the boy returned saying that the latter was dead and headless. When this was confirmed, the whole household was plunged into grief and consternation, combined with fear and wonder as to who could have done the deed, because no one knew of Wamai's return. They buried the dead man the same day.

In the afternoon Wamai's returned, waving his paddle above his head, apparently in the face of spirits. The people called out to him from the shore:

"We have had news that will spoil your happiness, your partner has been murdered."

Wamai's paid no attention, but continued to wave his paddle. He told his adopted son to stay in the canoe on the beach, and went by himself up to his house carrying a sack filled with nails, beneath which he had placed his partner's head. He told his wife that on the bottom there was a dress which from the stomach and she removed and after unwrapping for it, until she came to her lover's head with staring eyes and open mouth. When she screamed, Wamai's took the head and hanged it down on her naked body.

"You always wanted him," he said. "There he is. Don't be afraid."

Then he fled to his canoe and spent away with his adopted son. A number of the people set off in pursuit, but whenever one of their canoes drew on him, Wamai's lowered down the smoke which concealed him.

[illegible]

Fiamel's said he was travelled far away, always seeking a place to settle, until one day they saw a large town on the beach, with smoke coming from only one of the houses. The two looked, and Fiamel's told the lad to the canoe on the beach while he went on to investigate. He could find no one in any of the houses, until at last he came to the one from which smoke emerged, in which he saw an old blind man cooking food and his beautiful daughter making cobo-bark mats. He entered quietly and sat beside the man without speaking. As the latter lifted some food from the pot and poured it on a dish, Fiamel's took it and fell to under his cloak. The old man felt for the food, then said to his daughter:

"I have lost the food that I have been cooking. Some one must have stolen it."

She did not look up as she laughed back:

"Nonsense! As you know, there is no one in the whole country but we two."

Again the old man poured out some of the food and again Fiamel's fell to, to cross more he complained to his daughter. This time she looked up and saw the stranger.

"You are right," she said to her father. "A man is sitting beside you."

"What do you want?" she asked Fiamel's. "Whence have you come? Why have you stolen my father's food?"

He answered her her query.

"I was only passing here to-day," and took a from under his cape.

He had fallen in love with the girl and said to her father:

"Give to me mary your daughter."

"If you restore my sight you can have her," the father replied.

"I am a powerful man," Fiamel's laughed.

With that he took the old man's head between his hands and gave to his eyes, as he rubbed them with his hands, as soon the sight was restored. The father kept his bargain and agreed to his daughter's marriage.

They asked Fiamel's if he were alone, and when he answered that he adopted one was to a canoe on the beach, they called the boy to and the four set down to a meal. There was no water in the house and Fiamel's told the lad to fetch some, but as soon the old man and his daughter stopped him.

"No, no," they said. "You can't go any here, there is no still water.

the man in the canoe was gathering firewood, he projected his willpower to him to cause him to feel and then work as a hollow row wherein Pyamal's had concealed himself. The slave was using a stone wedge, and when his possessed saw the crew of the row, Pyamal is broke in raising slips, thereby notifying his colleague, who found when his master might see in the eye of a wheelbarrow. The slave drove in another, and again the slaves broke this, increasing the forebodings of the slave. Then Pyamal's appeared from within the hollow row and offered to repair the broken wedges to cause to assistance. The slave, only too glad to do anything that would save him from the wrath of his master, willingly accepted when Pyamal's asked him whether he had a sin any stranger to the land.

"Yes, my master removed recently with a very beautiful woman."

"Then take my wife. Will you why me to recover her?" asked Pyamal's.

"Yes," the slave said.

Then Pyamal's carefully repaired the broken wedges. The slave suggested a possible plan for rescuing his master.

"Every evening, just before sunset," he said, "I carry firewood into the house, and then this and he no longer for water. If you hide close to the door, you will be able to see where your wife is sitting when it is natural for me to bring in the fuel. Then I return with the water I will place it on the fire to extinguish it, and you may be able to rush in and save your wife in the darkness and confusion."

This plan was adopted. Pyamal's helped the slave fill the canoe with firewood, and secretly followed the slave to the Sheikhdi's house. Pyamal's had himself within a little bag which the slave set upright against the house in such a position that he was able to see in through the front door. The slave carried in the rear of the firewood and the smoking dusses and he will extinguished the fire. When night had fallen, the slave drew the larger bricks in the house and returned with a burning bill, then, as he placed the fire, he scrambled so that the light was thrown on the house, extinguishing them. supernatural, as that nearly a year had elapsed on this earth, and during that time the faithful hal had periods of excretion as his part. He had retired to the house, but Wanuk used the life-giving end of his stick to revive him, and the dove returned happily to the village.

In an almost identical second version of this story, collected from another informant, the community to which Wanuk belongs is not mentioned and the boy is not an adopted son but a young slave. The adventures are the same even to details, except that before Wanuk presents his wife with her lover's head he instructs the slave to remove the plugs from the hatched canoes of his fellow-villagers. This does not seem to have deceived the lover, for Wanuk was followed as in the foregoing tale and, as there, released his dead mate in order to escape his pursuers.

BC
* 756

It is not claimed that any recently deceased shamans had power equal to that of Wanuk, although remarkable ability has been attributed to several living in the last century. The mother of one Bella Coola woman is believed to have been able to see the details of the sun and moon. She stated that on the latter were mountains and snow.

Even more striking is the following account of a Bella Bella shaman, who had visitations from supernatural beings during the last century. On one occasion, when performing a dance on the beach, he walked into a small hill; the spectators could hear his song continuing, and soon he emerged on the other side, having passed through the obstacle. Later on, the same man was convicted of murder by a white judge and sentenced to death. His fellow-villagers asked why he did not save himself and he replied that he would do so in his own time. The judge pardoned him and set him free, which was regarded as confirmation of his claim. His first vision had come to him when in the cemetery at Lowyis, but his most spectacular experience was when a slide descended and incurred him as he was paddling in his canoe on the ocean. For one day he remained under the slide, as well as under the water, then he reappeared and paddled on his way.

[illegible]

Although the powers ascribed to modern shamans are less than those attributed to their fellows of old, yet a shaman is a person endowed with mysterious ability and wonderful knowledge, due to personal contact with supernatural beings. Hence, he is regarded as somewhat uncanny and, though respected, is likewise feared. The power is not inheritable. There is a tendency for the descendants of a shaman to have the favours granted to them, but this is nothing more than a tendency on the part of the supernatural beings to confer their boons in this manner; it is not a right. Thus anyone, man or woman, rich or poor, young or old, alone or member of an ancient family, may become a shaman.

The Obtaining of Shamanistic Power

A shaman obtains his power from a supernatural visitant, usually the mythical woman Tlo-qulla-a (also called Lekh-[illegible]) bringing him a name, four songs, and sometimes the ability to cure a specific disease. No methods are seen to attract her, but by means of magical rites a man may so purify himself that she will be likely to visit him. A second, and the most usual manner of becoming a shaman, is to receive a visit from Tlo-qulla-a when grievously ill. In either case a shaman is often termed a Sacred, "A Learned One."

In the first case, the wooing of shamanistic powers by magical means, is is often a matter of years before a man becomes a shaman. Sometimes the parents of a male boy will notice that he is fond of lying around the house with a far-away look in his eyes, and appear unwilling to take part in the games of the other lads. Especially if the father is a shaman, or if one of his ancestors has had the ability, the parents watch carefully to see whether or not this is merely a passing mood. If it continues, they realize that their son may become a shaman. Although there are dangers attached to the profession, they will usually make their child in every possible way. They may have had one of their ancestors obtained the power, and will all then use it in the same method. In this way a descendant of demons has a better chance to become one than anybody else. Another indication that a person is likely to become a demon is to be relieved from sleep by a noise. To be sleep, hastily, thinking that someone has called him, all that he sees is the disappearing robes. Men have a rather peculiar position in the eyes of the Bella Coola, since they believe that these animals regard themselves as superior to mankind.

"The food of mortals is our food," say the men.

The parents see all the boy that he is likely to become a demon, and that he must accordingly take great care of himself. If he is an adult, he will begin to observe ceremonial chastity, and to any case will spend much time alone, avoiding the crowdedness of life in the village, and will think little about numbers matters. It necessary to pass alone to the forest, especially to some spot beside a waterfall, the kind of place that supernatural beings frequent. Then he lies down, sometimes for several days, with evergreen boughs spread beneath and above him. Then he rises and utility the moral sense so objectionable to supernatural beings, so that his chance of obtaining a visitation is increased. He does not know what may appear to him, but he carefully concentrates his desires which, as his thoughts are centred on lofty subjects, are likewise about matters of importance. If his dream is sufficiently clear to warrant the term vision, the recipient should remain, fasting, for four days on the spot where it occurred, and should say nothing about it when he returns home. He strength to remain with every vision, and if he, sometimes after a period of thirty years or more, he will obtain a real one and the power to cure a disease. Sometimes dreams come to him in the village, but they are more likely to occur to a secluded spot in the forest. It is impossible to obtain examples of these dreams since, for a long time, no one has been brave enough to talk

The Bella Coola is an [illegible] tribe [illegible] spot [illegible] [illegible] power in this way, but their cure can be judged by the dramatic performances hereafter described, many of which are believed to have been derived from them.

The members of different families have remembered various means of making a person "clean" so that a supernatural being is likely to visit him. Almost every family knows one or more of them, and an individual who shows signs of becoming a shaman will be taught how to use his family method. In connection with this, the author often power will further purify himself by abstaining from sexual intercourse, by frequent washing in hot springs, by eating small portions of the nuts of conifers and the heads of reeds, and by avoiding food prepared by a widow or by a girl secluded after puberty. In this way he hopes that his dreams will be fulfilled, and that a vision may be granted him so he lies in the forest on his evergreen couch.

The following are some of the methods to be practised at dawn every fourth day.

(1) The author after power locates a small stream on either side of which there are growing two shoots of devil's club. He draws his hunting off the four stems and strips from them the bark, which he uses to scrub himself in the cold water. As he does so he says:

"Power give me power that I may see what I wish to see."

This is addressed to the plant itself, not to the supreme god. It is a request to be able to see some one of the many supernatural beings that roam the forests, but which are invisible to mortals, or at least shamans. The words are not a fixed formula, and similar ones are used in connection with each method. After washing, the author his power throws the bark and packed stem into the water.

(2) Again selecting a secluded stream, the would-be shaman picks up a smooth, round stone pebble from one side of it, and with this rubs his body, then carefully replaces it in the exact position from which he took it. He repeats the process with a second stone, crosses the stream and does likewise with one stone from the further margin.

(1) Choosing a place where two small hardwoods are growing on each side of a small stream, the seeker after power bends down the two saplings so that their branches reach the water, and with these secures his body, the spines frequently cutting his skin. When finished, he releases the saplings, which fly back to their original position.

(2) Another method is to devote four small sections, each [illegible] larger than a match, of bitter bulbous root. These are steeped with cold water and cause vomiting. The use of this plant is not limited to shows, nor is it necessary to repeat it every fourth day. Apparently, the usual prayer is not said with it.

[illegible] Both, or all, of these methods, especially if combined with the observance of ceremonial chastity, may justly the performer so that he will be able to see what is not vouchsafed to other persons. Tiresiphiles is, or one of the other supernatural beings, may grant him a revelation with shaman's power. This does not always happen, as the above means of purification are not omnipotent, but in many myths where the hero obtained supernatural power it was due to his having tried one of the above, or a similar ritual.

[illegible] The most common method of becoming a shaman is through the appearance of Tiresiphiles [illegible] when a person is ill. This woman, who always wears a blanket-like cape decorated [illegible] and undyed rabbit-fur, is able to travel anywhere at phenomenal speed. She, or some other supernatural being, may appear to a sick person irrespective of sex, whether or not ceremonial chastity has been observed. It seems as if she took pity on the sufferer and came to bring relief. The following are typical examples.

A woman had long been crippled with rheumatism. She was so helpless and weak that she spent most of her time curled in a heap on the floor, handfuls of the white red dirt with which she was covered. Her friends barely attended to her wants. One day she heard a thump on the roof, though no one else could hear it, nor could they hear the whistle with which Tlo-qpilite-a always announces her approach. The supernatural woman appeared, clad in her usual costume, and struck the old woman over the heart with her stick. The other occupants of the house realized that something strange had happened to the sick person. She crawled four times around the fire, sunwise, shaking her hands as well as her infirmity would permit, and endeavored to dance in time to the songs that she could hear Tlo-qpilite-a singing. Her friends did not interfere with her, seeing that something peculiar had come over her, and that if she is ill, any change must be for the better. The patient later described how Tlo-qpilite-a stood and shook her as one shakes a dusty blanket, and how she heard the sound of small particles falling from her—it was the sickness. With that Tlo-qpilite-a vanished and the rheumatic patient stood up, cured.

Another old woman had been so ill for four years with rheumatism, that she could barely move from her sleeping place, when a supernatural being came to her. She heard a voice saying:

"Get up! Marcel."

An invisible hand grasped her hair and led her four times around in a circle, sunwise. As usual, a tune and songs were vouchsafed to this woman, though these have now been forgotten.

One informant, a woman now past middle age, was once returning to Bella Coola from Rivers Inlet when she was taken violently ill with a stomach-ache. That night as she slept soundly on the shore she heard a voice singing. Listening attentively, she learnt the words and tunes of two songs, and heard the voice say:

"Your name is Hlqlqulchain."

Unquestionably the visitor was Tlo-qpilite-a, and if she had appeared, the woman would have become a shaman. Unfortunately for her, this honor was not granted; she received nothing more than the name, "Power to Use."

What is the explanation of the songs which shamans believe they hear? In this case, for example, a reliable woman asserted that she had heard two, though she had since forgotten them as they had no social significance. Bella Coola shamans sings are of a simple type, with few words, and with tunes of no great difficulty, all closely akin to one pattern. Hence they could easily be invented by anyone. A person who recovers from a severe illness is expected, both by others and by himself, to have had such an experience, consequently it is easy for him to interpret the confused thoughts of a sickness as a revelation from a supernatural being. Thus it seems probable that a shaman deludes himself as well as others with regard to the songs.

A certain man had a similar experience, when he too heard Tsimpsilim a without actually seeing her. He was in a canoe at the time, near the point between North Bentinck Arm and Labouchere Channel, and distinctly heard her whistle, accompanied by four beats on a drum. This may have been an omen, as his sister died soon afterwards. Occasionally, Tsimpsilim a appears in dreams and gives information, as she did to this man's mother, instructing her to brush her body with spruce boughs to avoid smallpox. She followed this advice and both she and her husband escaped uninfected from the epidemic.

A shaman who died about 1900 received his power in the following manner.

He had been spearing salmon salmon in the Bella Coola River one autumn when one of the fish crawled to skin to his hands so he removed it from the water. From this event some mysterious malady covered his body; no one could cure him, and by December he had wasted away to a walking skeleton. Then, one morning, he heard whistling which he was sure was the voice of Tsimpsilim a. He wisely said nothing about this, nor was it heard by anyone else. The same sound was repeated on the next two mornings, and on the fourth she appeared.

Sometimes with none at all, merely a confused humming which is repeated as a tune. Examples of these songs are given here (1), p. 100.

"I am Anikomdiwar," she said. "Everyone calls on me to visit the sick, and henceforth they will likewise call you and your basin." 774* 777*

Something caused his stomach, causing it to heave violently, and he felt that the sickness had left him. He sang for the singers and repeated to them the words that Tlingaitlin a had chanted; then formed the tune of the shaman's song which he used on future occasions. While giving them to the singers, he endeavoured to dance, but was too feeble to do more than weakly shake his hands. From that time on, Anikomdiwar was able to cure the sick.

This last account is typical. Tlingaitlin a appears, leaves something into the body of the patient to cure him, sings one or more songs, gives the sufferer a name, and then vanishes. The curing power thus bestowed remains within the person benefited; it is to this that enables him to heal others if Tlingaitlin a has so decided. In such cases, there is mention of a "basin" in the song, and the one who has just recovered will be able to cure others, especially those suffering from the same malady as himself. The reference to a basin is because such utensils are used during ceremonies. To the Bella Coola a shaman is one who has had such an experience and has publicly claimed it, whether or not he can cure the sick.

Tlingaitlin a is known by many names, in accordance with his ability to cure many diseases, and the designation she bestows depends upon the malady cured. The following are some of the names received from her by shamans.

Sawaqimkulaschin, "The Strengthener of the Breath." This name was given to a person who was cured when he found breathing very difficult. The text of his song was:

"Tlingaitlin a gave me (the name) Sawaqimkulaschin with a small object to aid the breathing of the very sick."

Tsaimaik pain. This has the same significance as the last.

Tsaiaik sickness, "The Dancer Near the Fire."

Anikomdiwar, "The Dancer Who Makes Noise Only with [illegible] His Body." A dancer with this name does not use a rattle when racing.

Anqalnamat, "Quivering To and Fro." This refers to the movements of a dancer when he dances for curative purposes.

Kpinqaitlkwanalem, "The Survivor." This is derived from qaitlkwanem, to receive succour, and as this is done for curative purposes, the name really signifies, "The One Who Succours to Strength."

It is believed that Tlenqelitlen a often sees her own disease about visiting the sick, but that sometimes a number of the supernatural beings confer as to whether an ailing person should be helped, and if so request her to visit him. Sometimes the patient is so sick that an enormous amount of power must be inserted to help him, and he dies from its receipt. In such cases he is revived by Ituntlkwan, a male being whose sole function is to succor those whom Tlenqelitlen a has slain. This return to life has frequently occurred when relatives have been mourning the death of the patient, who is presently able to recount all that he has seen. Sometimes Tlenqelitlen a, instead of herself bestowing power upon a sick person, carries him away to a locality to which a supernatural being was provided in the beginning of time.

Although it is Tlenqelitlen a who most frequently cures a sick person, there are many instances of other supernatural beings having done so. Little seems to be known of them, except that they have been recorded as appearing to give a patient their name and to cure him of his malady. So far as could be ascertained, they are thought of only in connection with appearances to the sick and, since to function they exactly resemble Tlenqelitlen a, and as it is she who is most commonly spoken of, it is possible, or even probable, that these are actually the same being under other names. The following beings are of this type.

The Bella Coola do not theorize as to the part of the power that conquered, if anything, they conclude that it was to the spirit.

Vimtrumbim, "The Runner." He is able to cure the sick even when at the point of death.

Bumbibbum, "The Saviour." He can rescue persons who have been injured by other supernatural beings.

Pumtrumbum, "The One Who is Thought Of." Having powerful curing abilities, people think of him when ill.

Bumbibbum, "The Open-Hearted One." His mouth is always open to such forth actions.

Pachibumbijim, "He Whose Brain Is in His Own Body." A person who receives the ability to cure from this being does not use the customary brain.

Notes: It is said that many Bisum Sulu shamans have received their powers from this creature, which is accordingly well known to the Sulu Cults in this connection, although few of their own people are said to have been benefited by it.

Since all animals are supernatural, it follows that any of them can cure the sick. Instances are remembered of this, in which the patient received a name differing slightly from that of his animal benefactor. Animals, especially colours and early-spring animals, are commonly patron names and many sick people have received aid from them. It is recognized that the forests are uncanny since they have the ability to hide themselves in insignificant creatures. One man was cured by a tree which gave him a mild-like shaman's song, imitating the creaking and moving of its branches. Much ofself, however, a supernatural animal merely speaks to a man without making him a shaman.

Two courses are open to the patient who has been cured by such a visitation. He may or may not proclaim his patron, or he may say nothing about them in the hope of obtaining further revelations and further names. From a single experience he has received a certain amount of power, but the more he has, the greater this will be. If he decides not to wait, he or men with the singers and repeats to them the words and name of the songs he has received. When later on he gives presents to validate his shamanistic name, it becomes publicly recognized.

that he is a shaman, and his future status depends on his success in curing those who appeal to him. If the man decides not to make use of his experience, he must not mention the name of his apparition, as to do so would not only prevent further benefits, but would cause the return of the disease from which he had been suffering. Some shamans have waited until they have received three or four separate visitations, acquiring a name at each; and a Bella Bella man was known to have had ten. Whether or not it is wise or safe to display shaman's power is a matter on which there is no general agreement. On the one hand by long, and perhaps fruitless, waiting, a man postpones the social status which would have been his if he had at once displayed his powers, gambling with his chances of receiving still greater gifts. While awaiting further visitations, a man may be able to make use of the power already received, although he cannot do so formally as an accredited shaman. Thus one man, who long ago was visited by a supernatural being, but has made no public claim of his apparition, is able to cure stomach-ache among his own grandchildren by massaging the stomach as if to force something from it, and then pulling this something, four times, from his spread hands. Still hoping for power, he declined to say by which supernatural being he had been visited.

The following account was obtained from one of the few old Bella Coola who claim to have had shamanistic experiences. It describes what is done when the patient decides not to wait for further revelations:

When comparatively young, the informant slept one night in the forest with a companion. On awakening the following morning, they found a wall of dried blood leading to their blankets. They examined themselves and found no wound, so concluded that the blood could not be their own, and, therefore, was a mystery, over which they worried for a few days but then forgot. Almost a week later, the narrator of the incident dreamed that a strange creature came to him; he did not know what it was, but it terrified him. A few minutes later he got up and was working at the fire when his nose began to bleed. The people tried the usual remedies, but they were without effect, and the nose continued to bleed for several days. Shamans after shamans was called in, but none could do anything for him; and the bleeding continued until his face became so swollen that he could not see without lifting the puffy flesh, while his body wasted away and he became weaker and weaker, at last sinking into unconsciousness. His friends assembled in the house thinking he was on the point of death; in fact, one leaver his nose to ascertain whether or not he was still alive; the scar is still visible. Then he recovered slightly, his eyes roved around, and he saw the people as in a dream, and wondered why they had gathered. Next he heard his mother weeping, realized what was the cause, and asked her to stop. The warriors, seeing his eyes and returning consciousness when he had been at the point of death, understood that a supernatural being had come to him in his hour of need and that he would become a shaman. He told those who were working over him to cease their efforts to cure him, as they were powerless.

That night as he lay feeble in his house, he began to vomit, and succeeded in ridding his stomach of a large mass of congealed blood. He and his mother examined it, and both thought he would die from its loss. In this they erred, for if he had not succeeded in getting rid of it he would have died. The night that he slept in the forest, he had lain in the path of Sisiutlemas who can travel only on dead trucks and that malicious being had inserted the blood in him, the last of which he had just vomited.

The sufferer gradually grew stronger, but suffered whenever sunlight fell on him; accordingly his parents blocked all chinks in the walls so that he lay in darkness. A few days later he had a relapse, and was again at the point of death, when he heard, inside his head, a humming sound like that made by a bee; it was the tune, and also the words of a shaman's song which Tlaxpililla was bringing to him. He could see her faintly,

* 952 * 787 and heard her utter the name that was to be his, as a shaman, Nitemdimut. He began to shake his hands as if dancing, for he was too feeble to do more, and began to sing the song. His mother at once called in the singers who listened, learning it for future use. The man is firmly convinced that if his mother had not thus called in the singers as speedily he would, after four days, have received another vision, and with it real shamanistic power. As it is, he is a shaman, since he was cured when at the point of death by Tlitqalilla a and received a name and song from her, but he is unable himself to effect cures. As soon as the singers had departed, his mother at once began to make for him a collar formed of alternate bands of dyed, and [292] undyed, cedar-bark. This is the distinctive decoration worn constantly by a shaman for a certain period after receiving his powers, and at all times when dancing. Within a few days all the inhabitants of the village were called in and the man's [293] family distributed presents, thus validating his shamanistic [294] name. Such presents are not returnable; "they have become nothing" for the designation. Thus accredited, a shaman is in a position to start curing, if his song has contained a reference to a basin, otherwise, as in the present case, he is merely a shaman in a social sense, not professionally. There is thought to be actually within the new shaman's body, some peculiar [292] power which is too potent to allow him to mix with others. Accordingly he wears the distinctive collar, which serves as a [94] warning to menstruating women and others who are unclean to remain at a distance, and he spends much of his time alone in the forest. This continues until the next hamat dance season when the coming to him of a yous (II, p. 6) frees him from restraint, since the one supernatural power drives out the other. If the shaman himself is unwilling to have a yous, it is sufficient if one comes to a son, or other near relative.

A shaman who has been told by his supernatural visitor to use a basin instructs a carpenter to make one for him. The design depends either on the owner's wish, or on that of his benefactor if the latter has decreed specifically.

The Curing of the Sick

756

When a person is ill one of his relatives comes to request a shaman to cure him.

"I will help the mortal," answers the shaman, as though he were himself a supernatural being.

Indeed he considers himself to be removed from the ranks of ordinary mortals, and refers to the being from whom he has received his power as "comrade." No mention of recompense is made, but the shaman understands that if he succeeds he will be rewarded. Donning his collar of alternate rows of dyed and undyed cedar-bark, he proceeds to the patient's house, usually followed by some of the singers, as well as by anyone else who is interested. He throws himself down beside, or on, the sick person and begins to feel for the sickness. Particularly in the case of stomach or chest trouble this is a difficult matter. The practitioner kneads the flesh, pounds the patient, leaps on him, and pummels him until a spectator wonders that the sufferer survives. The aim throughout is to bring the disease, pictured as a foreign object having material form, towards the surface whence it can be extracted in one of the following ways. [753]

(1) Some shamans of long ago were the possessors of life-sticks, and could cure merely by touching the patient with the life-giving end.

(2) In a simple illness the shaman is able to cure by his power alone. After locating the seat of the disease he casts himself on the patient, with head pressed close to the spot where he has located the trouble, and growls and grunts with half-closed lips, ejecting a flow of saliva over the sick person. By so doing he imparts his own power into the sufferer, who at once begins to imitate the chattering and to shake his hands. Then the shaman proceeds to recall this power to himself by scooping it up with half-cupped hands. Endowed as he is, the sickness is harmless to him. No instance is known of a shaman having failed to recall his power, but, theoretically, if he did

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

755 not do so, he would cease to be a shaman, and the ability would 756 pass to the cured person.

(3) In more difficult cases the shaman uses his basin and seeks assistance from others by a frenzied beating of sticks. He sends some young man out to fill the receptacle at the river, sets it near the patient, and throws water over him as he kneads in the manner already described. While this is going on, and 539 it is often a lengthy performance, another shaman, or someone 535 accustomed to lead the singers, ranges the bystanders into two 755 rows, facing each other between the door and the central fire. Each is provided with a beating stick such as the singers use, and a sounding-board is placed before each row. The clever dancer who has been commissioned to lead the orchestra of stick-beaters stands near the door and the musicians take their time from his movements. First he slowly raises both arms and all beat time softly, then, as he lifts his arms higher, the noise increases, and he sways from side to side as if carried away by the music; as he does so the men towards whom he leans intensify their beating, while those on the other side decrease. Back and forth he sways followed by the beating; nearing the climax he treads mincingly, whereat the noise rises to thunder-pitch, then jumps twice, and as he strikes the ground the drums beat and all the sticks come down with a final ear-splitting crash. Throughout the whole the women drone i.....This elaborate beating of time is repeated four times, on each occasion concluding with the double jump which calls forth the double thunder of drums and sticks.

755 Meanwhile the functioning shaman is gurgling and chat-756 tering through half-closed lips, and at intervals the leader, or any stick-beater, shouts heip, a call which is supposed to soothe the supernatural beings. The din is tremendous. No explanation could be found of the meaning of this noise.

"It has always been done," say the Bella Coola, and they theorize no further.

At last the shaman rises from the sick person, holding his hands carefully cupped together as if he held something within

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

them that might escape. It is the sickness! The din increases; the leader works himself into a frenzy with his rapid gyrations, then he stills the noise as the shaman goes to the door. In dead silence, the more striking in contrast to the previous tumult, he partly opens his hands and puffs against them, as if blowing something out of the door, at the same time calling out, hoip. Again the beating of sticks breaks out, again it is stilled, and again the shaman blows forth the sickness. This is done four times. The shaman uses his own discretion whether to send the sickness through the door or the smoke-vent. 755 756 [535]

A variant of this method is for the functioning shaman to dance during the beating of sticks, before throwing himself on the patient. With chattering teeth and shaking rattle, he revolves sunwise, his free arm bent at the elbow so that his wrist, which he shakes freely, is close to his chin; at intervals he calls out, swaiwa. It is a serious and important proceeding to the Bella Coola, and the effects are considered nullified if a dog barks during the stick-beating. [535]

(4) Some powerful shamans cure by the use of dyed and undyed cedar-bark. A roll made of these two substances is placed among glowing embers until it is itself afire, when the shaman puts it in his mouth. After dancing for some time to the accompaniment of frenzied stick-beating, he hauls forth the bark, still burning, and again puts it in the fire. This is done four times. Then he thrusts the burning bark into the patient's mouth, and leaves it there for some time before pulling it forth. This, too, is repeated four times. When finally drawn forth, it has attracted the sickness, which can then be thrown away by the throwing away of the bark. It seems clear that this must be done by conjuring, but the writer was unable to learn the method employed, and was repeatedly assured that no subterfuge was used. [824] [535]

(5) One illness is caused by a person carelessly stepping on a dead salmon, such as dot the banks of the rivers in the autumn. The fish, indignant, injects a sickness into the offender. [753] [825]

I:McIlwraith E.-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NEB Bellacoola NEB

755 offender. A shaman is able to diagnose the malady, and when 756 he has pulled it forth in the manner previously described, he [825] ties it up in a bundle of four pieces of dyed, and four of undyed, cedar-bark, sprinkles eagle down over the whole, and throws it into the river. This not only causes the sickness to return whence it has come, but placates the salmon who are glad to receive the beautiful cedar-bark.

755 (6) Another method is by making a present to Tlitcdp-
756 lidn-a. The shaman prepares four collars of hemlock twigs, 782 wrapped around with alternate bands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark, and with numerous cross-pieces of dyed cedar-bark. When these are ready, all assemble to witness the curing, and to assist the practitioner by beating sticks. He first sets four basins, one at each corner of the fire, and then proceeds to pull it apart, leaving a glowing expanse of embers in the centre. The shaman throws on this bed pieces of dyed and undyed cedar-bark, as well as eagle down, and [789] walks through, between the two halves of the separated fire. Several men stated that they had seen this done, but none could give any information as to the method. If actually carried out, the way in which the fire was prevented from burning the shaman and the highly inflammable bark and eagle down has been lost.

The shaman himself now guides the beating of sticks. When the tumult has reached its height he goes to the patient and places over his head one of the collars, passing it right down over his body, breaking the cross strings of dyed cedar-bark as he does so. The patient rises and the shaman picks up the collar from beneath his feet; his body has thus passed entirely through it. The sick man then revolves once, sunwise, while the shaman carries the collar once, sunwise, around the fire. He then stills the beating of sticks, which has been going on throughout, and casts the circlet on the fire. The same procedure is repeated with the three remaining collars. It is believed that these offerings reach Tlitcdplidn-a who, pleased to receive such pretty objects, restores the sick, though she does not herself come to do so.

The shaman now sends a young man out to fill his cooking basin. When this is done, he carries it around the fire, once, sunwise, and sets it down beside the patient. The practitioner drinks from it, and casts some eagle down on the surface. If it revolves sunwise, it signifies that the patient will soon recover, and the shaman proceeds to wash him with the water; if it remains stationary or revolves in the opposite direction, it is an unfavourable sign, and he throws the water out of the door. More is then brought, and the procedure repeated until it revolves sunwise. Although no Bella Coola can state definitely how this is performed, the consensus of opinion is that it is done by twisting the box slightly.

Shamans are not the only ones who make offerings to Tlúxpáiáx a. It is generally known that she likes to receive things, so a sick person often throws on the fire a little grease, some of his own clothing, or other objects of small value. By so doing he hopes that she may appear, or that the sickness will vanish as the object is consumed in the flames. A person in good health sometimes makes like offerings, either on the central house fire or on one built behind the house, at the same time asking Tlúxpáiáx a to help guard him.

(v) In recent years some shamans have been in the habit of displaying the sickness in visible form; this is said to have been a practice adopted from the Bella Bella. After throwing himself on top of the patient the shaman works violently, and produces such an object as a toad, a snail, or a stick of wood, which he claims to have been the cause of the malady. This has, of course, been concealed throughout in his mouth. This belief is fostered by the undoubted skill of some shamans in extracting such foreign substances as a salmon bone, wedged in a patient's throat, or a sliver. In such cases he first works with his fingers to force the object near the surface. It is believed that some shamans are so powerful they can draw forth foreign substances by the mere application of their stick

1955 to the pain affected. In such a case the object, a twig for 1956 example, becomes visible at the end of the staff. Conjuring is employed to do this, and often a tuft of dyed cedar-bark is used, which makes the deception still easier. Shamans are very expert in such matters. It is said that when two rival shamans were disputed about their powers, one of them cast his stick on the ground and it became a snake, whereupon the other did likewise; and his became a twig which hopped after the snake. The Bella Coola find biblical parallels for such revelations of power in the transformation of Aaron's rod, and the appearance of fire on Mount Carmel.

Shamanistic Ceremonies

1956 In addition to his professional abilities, a shaman has also 1957 certain social prerogatives. As has been mentioned, many 1956 shamans lack the power to cure, but they may have seen some 1957 feat during a dream, or during a visitation from Tlingelitlin s. It enhances a man's social prestige if he can graphically display whatever he has observed. It follows that the rites about to be described are often, perhaps usually, performed by a person unable to cure the sick, but it must be remembered that to the Bella Coola there is no social difference between a shaman who can cure with the aid of a lamp, and one who lacks this power. Each has merely received a different gift from his supernatural benefactor. There seems little doubt that a man of imagina-1956 tive temperament frequently invents a feat of this type, or 1957 rather that he ponders over one until he either dreams of it, or imagines himself to have done so. Certainly, after he has performed such a rite, he deludes himself into believing that he has had supernatural authorization for it. Conjuring feats performed long ago by shamans, feats practised by the members of other tribes, personal inventions, either actually or theoretically dreamed of, all these are among the sources from which shamanistic dances are derived. It follows that almost 1956 anyone who has the necessary skill is able to perform, provided 556 that he has sufficient food to validate the ceremony. Thus this rape of dance differs from all other Bella Coola rites, since no [illegible] * [illegible] inherited prerogative is required. Times ago such exhibitions [illegible] were common, although caring shamans were rare.

The usual time for a shaman's performance is at the con- [illegible] clusion of the burial season, though one is sometimes held prior to that period if the would-be performer fears that the food which he has stored up for the event is likely to be frozen.

When he decides to give a dance, the shaman first summons [illegible] the singers to his house and teaches them a song of his own [illegible] * composition. Theoretically both text and tune should have [illegible] been received from his supernatural benefactor, but many performers undoubtedly employ songs used by shamans ancestors which they have chanced to remember. Another device is to describe a supernatural being seen in a dream. In some cases there is deliberate deception, but in most the performer persuades himself that he has received supernatural authorization.
The texts are full of obscure allusions, a river, for example, is spoken of as earth running water. Often a man will commit [illegible] a song for years, before collecting the wealth necessary to use it publicly, with the social prestige attached. A shaman always obtains a name from his supernatural benefactor, but [illegible] if a man merely uses a fact observed in a dream, this is impossible, so he adopts the designation of some deceased shaman, even convincing himself that it was uttered by the apparition.
Others will probably remember this name, hence suspicions [illegible] may easily be aroused concerning the authenticity of the performance, but it is not customary to voice these. The singers repeat the song which they have just heard, and continue doing so until they have mastered it. Sometimes they compose further songs themselves for the performer. During the prac- [illegible] *
tising, those who are not initiated are expelled from the house. [illegible]
A shaman is a person who has come in contact with the super- [illegible] natural; hence he is akin to the members of the society who, [illegible] therefore, support him during his rite.* A herald is sent out [illegible]

* Theoretically, a shaman need not be a doctor, but vocations usually coincide only in those of religious and imaginative temperaments, who are in the majority of cases already members of the society.

to make known to all that there will be a dance on the following day, using the tone of the shaman. After such announcement, it would be most unusual for anyone to think of leaving a village until after the performance.

Towards dusk on the appointed day the people are summoned to the house of the shaman. Near the door are seated those who are not initiated kukwiat; in the inner part of the house are members of the society, with the singers in their accustomed places behind the fire. The shaman stands alone between the fire and the door and sings one of his songs, the time being marked by the words alone. Then he dances, his arms shaking, his head rolling from side to side, and his feet marking time to the beating of sticks, as the singers accompany the singing of his song. If more than one song has been composed he dances to each, always accompanied by other shamans and by them alone. The shaman's costume consists of the usual blanket, and eagle down is scattered in his hair, with the additional and distinctive mark of intertwined dyed, and undyed, cedar-bark. After every song, the singers beat time very rapidly,[1] too rapidly for the dancer to keep pace with it, so he merely sways backwards and forwards shaking his hands violently. Then the shaman, assisted by a few friends whom he has chosen for the purpose, performs a conjuring feat to impress the uninitiated. The kukwiat realize that this may be merely a deception, but since real shamans perform something of the same nature, there is always the possibility that it may be genuine. The shaman may choose some feat which he has seen some old shaman perform; or he may use something which he has seen in a dream; or rely purely on his own inventive ability, aided, as he always is, by carpenters. The method of carrying out each trick is carefully guarded, with the result that it was impossible to obtain information about more than a few. After the conjuring act, the shaman gives food to all, followed by presents. If it is the first time that he has given such a ceremony, that is, if he is validating his cures, the gifts must be valuable. On later occasions, irrespective of whether it is the same trick or another that is performed, the presents will be of small value. Goods so given are not returnable. After dancing, a shaman wears his collar of dyed and undyed cedar-bark all summer, in fact until he rids himself of his supernatural endowment by the performance of a hactar rite the following winter.

Thus there is close time-dependence of shaman and hactar dances. On any later occasion, at a ceremony when songs of all types are being sung, if the singers hear out the tunes of those used at the ritual just described, the shaman dances to them. This is said to "cure" him, as if the power within him was a source of danger.

The following are examples of the conjuring tricks performed, most of them done by the shaman Ninitsamlaix, a relative of an informant, who was able to learn the methods employed.

On one occasion Ninitsamlaix prepared two boxes, apparently the ordinary wooden sort used for cooking; across each he arranged a diagonal cross-piece so that the receptacle contained two watertight compartments. Previous to the performance, Ninitsamlaix poured water, dyed red with the bark of the alder, into one section of one of the boxes, and put eagle down in one of the compartments of the other. When the time came to carry out the rite he asked an accomplice, another shaman, to bring some water and pour it into his box. This was done, the assistant taking care to put it into the empty half, not into that which contained the dyed water. Ninitsamlaix shook the box and poured out some of the liquid to prove that it really was water, and then drank. The spectators, unaware of the cross-piece, did not notice that he did so from the corner opposite to that from which he had poured the water. He had, of course, drunk the dyed fluid. Ninitsamlaix cried out that what he had swallowed was paining him, and proceeded to vomit the red water, much to the surprise of the uninitiated, who readily believed his claim that when he had drunk had changed to blood. Again the performer asked his assistant to bring in some water which he poured into the empty section of the other box, of which the other half contained eagle down. Nintemalais moved to and fro, shaking the box to spill some of the liquid, and then announced that there was so much he could not drink it all, but would pour some on the fire. As before, he tilted the opposite side of the box, so that, instead of water, the eagle down came flowing forth. The uninitiated, firmly convinced that the performer was endowed with supernatural power, never suspected that they were being deceived.

For her performance a female shaman once split a long, green stick, and gouged out the centre, so that it formed a narrow tube-like receptacle in which she laid a piece of undyed cedar-bark covered with eagle down. With wooden pegs she fastened the stick together so that it appeared to be an ordinary branch. When ready to perform, the woman asked some people to pile more wood on the fire, and, among others, an accomplice threw on the prepared stick with its butt protruding at the edge of the flames. As the fire blazed fiercely the female shaman danced; then the assistant announced that she wished to draw something from the flames, whereupon the woman seized the end of the cedar-bark from its enclosure in the projecting butt of the stick, and drew it forth. The uninitiated, ignorant of the prepared stick, were greatly impressed and puzzled as to how such inflammable material could have been in a fire without being consumed.

Nintemalais used his skill as a carpenter to carry out elaborate tricks. On one occasion he sawed the boards surrounding the smoke vent of his house, and fixed them with skin hinges so that they could be raised by ropes from outside the building. To show his supernatural power he threw several large baskets up towards the roof. As he did so his assistants outside pulled the ropes so that the opening was enlarged and allowed the baskets to pass through. In the gloom of the house the spectators could not see the manner in which the hole was [illegible] to close. It had been too small to permit the passage of the bushes at the time they were thrown, and it was still the same size after the feat was accomplished; hence supernatural means must have been employed to force them through the roof. Thus ran the logic of the uninitiated.

An informant, when acting as a Sacrier spy (II, p. [illegible]), once assisted four accomplices of a shaman who had obtained a stone from one of the holes above Kielkum. Many landslides fall into this, bringing down stones which are full of holes and float in water. Unless closely examined, the cribbing is not evident, so that an ordinary river stone of the same size and colour can easily be confused with it.

Previous to dancing, the shaman had placed a few embers in the recesses of his stone, covered them with pounded cedar-bark, and concealed the object near the fire. When all was ready, he asked the informant, whom the uninitiated did not know to be an accomplice, to fetch him a stone. This he did, bringing one previously chosen as closely resembling the prepared one from the lake. This ordinary stone was passed around among the spectators and then given to the shaman who, unobserved, palmed it off for the other as he began to dance. At intervals he blew on the stone until the embers ignited the dry bark; first smoke appeared, then sparks, and finally a mass of flame. The shaman dropped it as if it had become too hot, showing the spot where lay the river pebble; and again passed the latter from hand to hand through the audience, who could not understand how flames had been made to appear from an ordinary river stone. The words used for the songs on this occasion did not refer to the feat about to be performed, but to the alleged power given to the performer by Thiexpilée-a.

On another occasion a woman who was a shaman produced an eagle's tail and said that she could make it revolve in a bucket of water, following her steps. She hid the tail, while appearing to cast it into the water, and by means of a con-

[illegible] 784 coated cord connected to drawing fashion, previously placed on the surface, around in the direction in which she was drawing. It was impossible to know the details of the method employed in this trick. The arrangement was long ago practised by a shaman.

A simple box affection trick was the substitution of a bottom made of light maple wood for one of the heavy type used by the singers. The real trick had been passed around the audience and apparently returned to one of the singers, though in reality the false one had been given to him. So he bent over the hollow sound that ensued was a source of surprise to the uninitiated spectators, nor was their wonder lessened when a real bottom was again handed around, as if it were the one that had been in use.

[776] According to an informant, the last time that a supernatural being helped the person on whom it had conferred shamanistic power to perform a rite of this kind was about 1870. A man who had fallen from his canoe into the ocean was rescued, but for a long time was ill as a result of exposure. [776] [787] River Measurer, the supernatural being who governs the height of tides in the river, appeared and made him a shaman with the ability to cure through the use of a wash-basin. As this shaman danced, he had a large box filled with water. Presently he called on one of the uninitiated to examine the height of the water and point out to his fellows how high it was. A little later he called a second man who likewise indicated on the outside of the box the height of the liquid within. It had fallen, though its disappearance seemed inexplicable.

781 789 The above furnishes a good example of the attitude of the uninitiated. The informant, a very intelligent Bella Coola, gave a number of instances of the conjuring methods employed, some of which he had helped to carry out. Unquestionably, this was of the same nature, yet, because he was deceived at the time of its performance, he readily believed that the rite was supernatural; since then he had never thought of doubting

it. The entertained are so steeped in the atmosphere of belief that any simple conjuring trick is sufficient to delude them. 781 789

Finally, the following account is here inserted, though the details of the performance could not be learnt.

The father of an elderly Bala Ganda was once so sick that no one could help him. He had coughed up blood, vomit down had been heaped on his body, and hope had been abandoned. Then a relief came to him, restoring his health and making him a very powerful shaman. His supernatural visitor had told him to employ his power beneficially, and had further instructed him in the use of a rod wherein is his. Whenever this man danced, a stick, decorated with bands of cotton-bark, wound spirally, was hung horizontally from the roof of his house. He carried one similarly embellished, but smaller, about two and a half feet long and three inches in diameter, having at one end a tuft of bark. During his dance, in which he sang of ostrich, he went under the suspended stick, held the small one in his hand, blew on one end of it, then threw it up so that it struck the large hanging one. This was presumably done by the tuft of bark falling over and catching in some way. Again he danced and, when underneath where the two sticks were suspended, he jumped up, and caught the lower end of the smaller with his hands. This supported his weight, and he swung back and forth on it until he voluntarily released his grip and dropped. When next he danced at the same spot he held out one hand with palm upperment beneath the smaller stick; the other was held in front of his mouth pointing towards the suspended one. He blew on the latter as if blowing dust from his hand to the point of contact of the two sticks, and the smaller dropped into his outstretched hand. 956* 789

By means of this stick the shaman could cure diseases. When told in what part of the body the pain was situated he pressed on that part with one end of his stick. Then he carried it to the fire and held in the smoke the end that had been in contact with the sickness. He puffed twice at it with his 755 756* mouth, and the malady departed. It had been absorbed into the stick, and later driven from it by the shaman's breath.

* 756 789 This man made a great reputation for himself with his ability to hang from his small stick. On one occasion, after fishing on the lower Fraser River, he was encamped on the ocean beach near Seattle, where he had gone to pick hops. Four white men who had heard of his powers came to his tent for a demonstration. He put on his robes, took his small stick from his box, and used the ridge pole of his tent as the heavier horizontal one. The white men examined the small stick and found nothing peculiar about it. The man performed his dance, in the course of it throwing the small stick up against the ridge pole, where it remained suspended with the actor hanging from it. After releasing his hold, he struck the smaller stick a slight blow with his hand and it at once came away from the ridge pole.

* 756 787 As already mentioned, it is extremely difficult to obtain accounts of dreams which have served as sources for shamanistic performances. They are unconsciously embellished by the performer to such an extent that the ritual displayed has probably slight resemblance to the vision on which it is based.

The following, however, is an example of the type that could have served as theme. A man once dreamed that he saw Mount Nusqalst with its rocks adorned with handsome pictures. The other mountains of the valley were also decorated, but none of them was so fine. If he had had the desire and the necessary wealth he could have arranged with the carpenters to have the designs that he saw in his dream painted, and could have displayed them as a shaman's vision.

* 756 782 A shaman, particularly one who has received a vision from Tlicăplilăn-a, and who has had marked success both in curing the sick and in giving conjuring exhibitions, is considered to be in peculiarly close association with supernatural beings. Accordingly, he is regarded as a fit person to ask their assistance, not that he has any means of gaining help that are not open to others, but merely that his greater acquaintance with them confess it more likely that they will grant his request. Therefore, a shaman is usually called upon to perform the following rites: 756* 782

(1) Washing the mouth of a person who has died without sending from his body the first salmon or eulachon of the season (I, p. 438). [764]

(2) Asking assistance for the complicated rites of the potlatch (I, p. 195). [356]

(3) Request for assistance before starting on a journey, by pulling eagle down into the air (I, p. 206). [484]

(4) Request for aid by means of placing food on the water and blowing eagle down into the air at Moscuche Nose and Kwatna (I, p. 109).

In fact a supplication to any supernatural being can be made with greater prospect of success by a shaman than by any other person.

The Power of Shamans

As has been said, a shaman actually has power within himself, and this is so strong that it may be a source of danger to others. If a man should pass behind one so endowed when the latter is eating, his spirit would be drawn from his body into the shaman's mouth, which would close with a click, crushing the spirit and killing the man. This is quite involuntary on the part of the shaman. It happened more than once among the early inhabitants, and since that time people have been very careful not to pass behind an eating shaman; this taboo was still in force until about 1885. A shaman, too, is said to be able to recall a spirit which has left its body, and thus caused illness. It is believed by some that shamans can see the position of a person's tally post, and so judge the length of his life. These examples show the varying beliefs of different Bella Coola concerning the powers of shamans. 756* [761] [264] [178] [755]

But the force within the shaman is really more dangerous to its possessor than to others. As certain "unclean" objects are able to subdue supernatural beings, so do these same ob- 756* 783 841

* 756 [illegible] have power over shamans. A shaman must never sleep 783 beside his wife during her menses, must never eat food pre-841 pared by a menstruating woman, by one who has recently washed a new-born infant, by a girl during the period of seclusion following puberty, or by a widow or widower during the year that follows the death of his partner. If a shaman's own friends when he is dancing it is because a menstruating woman is present in the house; he at once asks the offender to withdraw, after which the bleeding stops. Moreover, he must [855] never cure a woman during her periods. A wise shaman pre-[785] fers commercial chastity frequently. In view of the lack of cleanliness ascribed to menstrual blood, it is perhaps surprising that a woman can become a shaman while still of child-bearing age. This is rare, and only occurs when a woman is the last survivor of a family. The Bella Coola themselves consider it to be peculiar, only explicable on the ground that anything is possible to the supernatural beings, even the disregarding of feminine "uncleanness." Usually, female shamans are past the age of child-bearing; if not, they observe absolute chastity.

* 956 Even inadvertent breaking of one of these rules causes 961 death. This is not regarded as a punishment inflicted by Tsindplitlo-o; it is merely the inevitable consequence of the supernatural power within the shaman having come in contact with what is not clean. As a shaman is considered to be immune against all ordinary ailments, his death is always attributed to the breaking of a taboo. Frequently the death of a shaman is accompanied by some convulsion of nature. One female shaman, for example, told the people of her village to keep their children within doors, since a supernatural being was coming for her. Soon it became dark; there were four loud claps of thunder, at the fourth of which she fell dead.

539 The following was related as an instance of the danger to
* 756 a shaman of coming in contact with an unclean woman.

[783] The son of the first man to come to earth at Nulkwa was, like his [841] father, named Dudzeuq". One April he and his wife went upstream to [787] N'wantle, a place in the country of the Carriers where milk-weed is plen-

[illegible] 534 756* 787

[illegible] Dadeumg[illegible] and a man who, when he drew near, turned into a piece of hanging moss. A little later he again saw a figure, but on approaching it became a tree. Dadeumg[illegible] and he with walked on and presently the former tree once more beheld a man; this time the apparition changed to a fir tree. It was evident to Dadeumg[illegible] that a supernatural being had mentioned itself to him, and he told his wife that they must return. On reaching home he related his experience and gave a shaman's dance.

From this experience he had received the power of curing. He could see disease when it was invisible to all others, and could summon it to himself, where it was harmless, thus restoring the patient to health. He made for himself a rattle, shaped like a bird, that had the ability of dancing of its own accord, and would catch people's hair in its opening and closing beak. The sick were brought to Dadeumg[illegible] from all over the valley. One day he travelled by canoe down to Amal where he found many of the villagers seriously ill. His arrival was quite fortuitous, for he was unaware of the epidemic that was raging. The inhabitants sought his help, so he landed and stayed there. He entered the house of a woman who claimed to be ill, and took the sickness upon himself, but no sooner had he left than he fell down stricken. He demanded to be taken home to his canoe, but he only lived two days after his return. The woman had been in pain from her menses; it was this that he had taken upon himself and caused his death.

534 756* [761] [785] [841]

In consequence of the danger attached to the vocation, many people try to avoid becoming shamans, though if Thinápkiite-a should appear to a man when ill, he cannot escape the power. The usual method of prevention is for a man to hold intercourse with his wife from below, so that her flesh, impure through its liability to menses, can form a barrier to the coming of supernatural power. One who wishes to escape always sleeps on the left of his wife, whereas if he is seeking shaman's power he sleeps on the right. Another method of avoidance is to use the hole in the floor which serves as exit and entrance to the house of a girl secluded following adolescence.

756* [787] [853] [513]

Since the power of a shaman is obtained by a personal experience, and lacks both form and substance, it cannot be transmitted and disappears at the owner's death. As has been 1956 owned, there is a tendency for such ability to be granted to the descendants of shamans, but this is not necessarily the case. A shaman can instruct his child and so increase the latter's chances of a vision, but the parent can do no more. A single exception to this concept was noted but the following incident was regarded as absolutely inexplicable, a thing beyond experience or comprehension.

1956 1957 A certain Kimsquit shaman had the supernatural being from whom he had derived his power actually resident in his body. At the time he obtained the gift, his benefactor had spoken to him.

"Hau-ckwik," it said, "I will live in your right arm, my head located near your wrist, my tail near your elbow. When you cure a sick person place your arm against whatever part of his body is affected and I will draw forth the sickness with my mouth."

Thanks to this assistance, the shaman was able to perform marvellous cures, as the being never failed to suck out the disease. Though aware of his supernatural guest, the shaman himself never saw it except when he summoned it to cure a patient; then it came forth from his arm, though no one else could see it. When he had blown away the sickness, in the usual manner of shamans, the supernatural one returned within his arm, out of sight.

When the shaman grew old he called a friend to him and asked him to receive his power, telling him where, and how, it was localized. The man consented. The shaman then began [198] to talk in the language of supernatural beings, as shamans often do, and presently the supernatural one came forth and became visible to the friend as a small lizard-like creature sitting on the palm of the shaman's hand. This frightened the friend and he declined the creature on the ground that he lacked ceremonial purity, hence his body was not a fitting receptacle. The shaman urged him to receive the creature, but when he continued to refuse, allowed it to return to his own arm. When the shaman died a few years later the friend bitterly regretted his own cowardice, for the wonderful cures stopped, whereas, had he accepted the supernatural guest, he would have been able to perform them. 956 787

SHAMANS FROM THE DEAD

There remain to be described shamans from the dead, whose abilities and prerogatives are almost identical with those already described. They obtain their power either from the visitation of a ghost in this world, or by a journey to the land of shades below. The following incident explains why shamans alone can hold converse with ghosts. 956 775 787.

Once, long ago, the lover of a young girl died. She was so heart-broken that in her agony, four days after his burial, she lay down on his grave to weep. The dead man was able to visit her and in due time she gave birth to a child, who, like its father, was a ghost, with drawn face and glaring eyes. The perturbed woman tended it in the forest, her love overcoming a feeling of repulsion, and when she returned to her home she endeavoured to prevent her own mother handling the infant, knowing that she would be horrified. The grandmother insisted, but as soon as she saw the ghastly appearance of the child she dropped it in horror, and the infant vanished. [534]

Since then there has been a barrier, resembling a wall of smoke, between mortals and the dead. If the old woman had not dropped her grandchild, the living would still be able to converse with their deceased friends and relatives.

Nowadays, shamans alone are able to lift the barrier and discourse with the ghosts of those who have departed. These are quite common visitors to the land of the living, but only a shaman can understand their languages, of which one is a series of whistles, and the other resembles the attempts at speech made by a tongueless individual. Shamans can learn what the dead require and so transmit the knowledge to the relatives of the deceased. As, long ago, shamans whose powers were derived from animals were able to teach mortals the proper methods of hunting, and the taboos enjoined, so a [198]

4 956 shaman from the dead once visited the land of ghosts and 775 leaved their souls. They informed him that food and clothing 787 thrown on the ground did not reach them, and that in order to do so it must be cast on the fire. Instead of journeying to the land of the dead some shamans receive their powers from ghosts who ascend to this earth, as the following account describes.

534 Within the lifetime of an elderly Bella Coola informant, a certain 4 956 woman, Sîtwalwîslu by name, left her house one evening for a few 775 minutes. When she came back she was crazy. Her face was green, her 787 mouth and face distorted and twisted, she could only whistle when she tried to talk, and kept endeavouring to walk on her hands. Taking her [828] blankets, she went through the motions of washing them, but instead of using water, she dragged them to and fro through the ashes of the central fire, until, utterly exhausted, she lay down. By these symptoms it was recognized that a ghost had stricken her with madness, and several [755] shamans of the dead were called upon for help. For a long time their efforts were fruitless. Then one of them obtained some stained menstrual pads. While another conducted the frantic beating of sticks, the leading practitioner waved one of the pads through the smoke of the central fire and laid it, with hemlock bark and dyed cedar-bark, on the patient's face. After leaving it there a few moments, he took it off and, while the beating of sticks was stilled, threw it out the door. When this had been done four times the woman was restored to sanity. Later on she said she had seen the ghost of a certain Tsîwsnî, a man recently deceased. Emerging from her trance she found herself in her house surrounded by numerous people and the shaman working over her. If he had not been able to cure her, she would have died; in fact, it was impossible to discover whether the Bella Coola regarded this woman as having been cured of an illness, or as having been restored from the dead.

Sîtwalwîslu called for the singers to whom she sang four songs, relating what she had seen. They described how she stood by a fire in the land below, where the sun travelled from west to east, and where everything differed from this earth, though reminiscent of it. The singers learnt the songs, and it was to their music that the woman danced on later occasions. She was able ever afterwards not only to cure maladies caused by ghosts but to talk with them. For this purpose she was in the habit of lying down at night in the graveyard, looking down into the land of the dead which was open to her, and conversing with the inhabitants in a strange whistling language which the living could hear, but could not understand. She was also able to gaze downwards at the edge of the central fire nearest to the door. 756* 775

Ăwstăhăkmots, an old shaman from the dead who died not long ago, obtained his power by chancing to visit their land. 787 539 The themes of his songs were of the land of the dead where, he said, there were many people; where those who had been rich on earth were rich, but where those who had been poor were still poor; where those who had been blind could see, and those who had been maimed were whole. He told of Pălwăl, a legless creature who lives in the land below, but can travel with amazing speed. In fact this shaman stated that it was he who was sent when the ghosts wished to communicate with the living, a statement contradicted by others. He told further of Kawikudjăn-a, a supernatural woman resident there, who is able to pick berries with phenomenal rapidity. But this talent avails her little, since her basket is full of the teeth of dead men who devour the fruit as fast as she picks them. It was Ăwstăhăkmots who described how in the land below there were only two enormous trees of the kind known to the Bella Coola as kĭp, under the shade of which the ghosts played a game resembling football with huge, light balls. 796 796

A dead person usually chooses one of his own relatives as the proper person on whom to bestow the power of a shaman, but their actions in this respect can neither be coerced nor cajoled. Ceremonial chastity is of assistance, and power can usually be obtained by anyone who lies four days and four nights, face downwards, on a new grave. Nor does every sight of a deceased person bring with it this faculty; in fact, ghosts are greatly dreaded since they usually cause harm to the beholder. On one occasion the mother of an elderly Bella Coola woman left the house one evening, to return shortly with her face screwed up into a ghastly smile, green in colour, and with saliva dribbling from her mouth. She was quite mad. A shaman from the dead succeeded in curing her, or it may have been in restoring her to life, and she was able to tell how she had seen what she took to be a man with face averted. She 756 775 787

* 756 called out to him, and then remembered no more. It was 775 obvious that she had seen a ghost.

[787] It is over diseases caused by ghosts that a shaman from the dead has power. If a person picks up and eats any morsels 753 which he has dropped he will usually suffer, because, though
* 756 he thinks the crumbs have fallen, they have really been pulled 775 from his hands by a hungry ghost, who thus showed his desire [264] for food. By picking up and eating the fragments, the man thwarts a dead person who retaliates by forcing some sickness into him. Ghosts may visit this land of the living and ask their relatives for food or clothing, but mortals, unable to hear the speech of the dead, are unaware of the requests of their deceased relatives, and so do not answer them. The irritated ghosts respond by causing sickness. In such cases a shaman 755 from the dead is able to suck out the cause of the ill, and some-
* 756 times to display it as a bone, twig, or other small object and at the same time to tell the sufferer what it was that his relatives desired. Like ordinary shamans, a shaman from the dead uses his own discretion whether or not to employ the violent beating of sticks, and like his fellow-practitioner re-[465] ceives payment from those whom he has helped. There are no fixed charges, but a successful shaman is always wealthy.

* 756 The intimate contact of ghosts with shamans has already 787 been mentioned in connection with the ability of the latter to 694 learn from the ghost of a murdered person whom he believes to be his slayer.

There is one method of sacrificial curing practised by 755 shamans from the dead alone. If the sickness refuses to yield
* 756 to ordinary methods, the practitioner makes ten cedar-bark 782 vessels, fills these with grease and places them near the fire, one between it and the door, one on the inner side, and four on either side of it, parallel to the side walls of the house. By each vessel are placed two small wooden figures, roughly carved to represent men, and decorated with dyed and undyed cedar-bark. After endeavouring to suck forth the disease, with or without the assistance of the frenzied beating of sticks, the shaman pours the grease on the central fire, and throws on it also the figures and some dried salmon. Thus propitiated, it is believed that the dead will be more likely to allow the sickness to be sucked forth.

Shamans from the dead perform conjuring feats and dramatic performances of the same type as ordinary shamans. Until he gives his first dance a newly created shaman is known as a tsax, the same word that is used for a tsaxiut initiate, and during this period he wears the shaman's collar of intertwined dyed and undyed cedar-bark. If he is wealthy and influential, a shaman will repeat his dance every fourth year. Such a performance can be held at any season, although the usual time is after the tsaxiut ceremonies. The dramatic representations are of scenes witnessed in the land below, though sometimes they are done in a reverse manner, following the practice of the dead in doing things strangely. Thus one shaman reported that the ghosts wore very long blankets, but when he danced he wore one that came only to his hips. The method of singing is the same as that employed by ordinary shamans, but one whose power is derived from the dead dances with head bent downwards, his free hand pointing to the ground with first finger extended. Also his cry of "swai, swai, swai," uttered at intervals with a deep cadence, differs from that used by ordinary shamans. A dance always terminates with the distribution of food to validate the ceremony.

Like ordinary shamans, those from the dead cannot transmit their power. At death their songs too are lost, unless they choose to give them to a friend who is also a shaman from the dead. This is obviously contrary to the theoretical belief that all songs have been obtained during revelations, but is not at all contrary to the Bella Coola practice of having the singers assist the visionaries in "remembering" their visions.

The following tale, although drawn from the distant past, is a typical illustration of one of the many ways in which shamanistic power is received from the dead.[6]

[6] Few stories of similar type have been included in vol. I, chap. xxx as explicit the life of the dead, and others are grouped together in the next chapter.

The Lads Who Visited the Home of the Dead

Long ago there was a Bella Coola man who had two sons. His wife died, and presently he remarried, becoming in time the father of an infant daughter. The second wife abused her step-sons, their father neglected them, and the two were poor and miserable, their best friend a faithful dog. When the people were invited to a feast, the lads were frequently overlooked as being of no importance, and their step-mother used to upbraid them for lacking the spirit to resent this insult. They could not answer, but merely biided their time. The two used to sleep on a raised platform behind the fire in hope of receiving supernatural assistance, and always left the house by a hole in the floor rather than through the door, thus observing one of the essentials for those who wish to obtain aid.

One day the two set out on an expedition into the mountains, carrying skin with which to make moccasins. As they were sitting at this work, the dog, which had followed its masters as usual, ranked off barking furiously. The brothers hurriedly finished the shoes and followed the animal in time to see it disappear into an opening after a porcupine. The elder leading, the two entered the cave which grew wider; on and on they went until finally they could see light in the distance. Guided by the barking of the dog ahead of them, they finally emerged into daylight, to find themselves in a new world, a land in which there was a large river and a sky resembling that above the earth, but different. The dog was waiting for them and had stopped barking.

The brothers set off up the river bank and presently saw on the other side a large town in which many people were moving about. The younger brother could see it plainly, but to the elder it was vague and indistinct. They called out to the people:

"Hi! Please send a canoe for us."

Though they called repeatedly, no one paid the slightest attention; the people seemed to be deaf, unaware of their presence. The two brothers remained all day opposite the village, calling out at intervals without result, and all the time becoming more hungry and disgusted. Towards dusk one of them yawned noisily. To their surprise there was a commotion in the town; the yawn had been heard although their cries had not. They could hear the people on the other side of the river discussing the noise.

"Let us send a canoe to fetch whoever may be over there" was the gist of their remarks.

Presently a canoe was poled out from the further shore, and held in position by the ferryman beneath the bank on which the brothers stood, necessitating a jump of two or three feet to reach it. As the elder prepared to leap into it, he glanced down and saw that the stones on the river floor were visible through the canoe as if it had no bottom at all. He drew back in fear. Though he knew it not, they had come to the land of the dead, where horseless canoes and other phenomena were to be expected. The younger brother, to whom the village had been plainly visible, had no fear, but leapt down bravely, and was poled across to the further shore, where he soon disappeared from his brother's sight among the throng of villagers.

The elder youth, left alone with the dog, sat down and wept, thinking that he had indeed lost his brother. After a time he continued his journey up the river-bank where presently he saw a bridge. He eagerly went over, intending to turn back towards the village where his brother had gone, but as soon as he had crossed he lost all thought of his original purpose and continued his journey upstream instead. Presently he heard the sound of adze strokes, and drew near, cautiously, until he could see the man who was using the tool.

"Why have you come here?" the woodcutter asked.

"Oh, for no special reason," the boy replied. "I should like to see your chief."

The woodcutter guided him to the house and when near called out, "The stranger wants to see our chief."

People came rushing out of the houses and the lad realized that he had come to the land of the wolves. His guide directed him to the chief's house which he entered through a doorway cut in a totem-pole. Within, the chief greeted him in a kindly fashion, saying:

"Please sit down for a little while until I can bring some friends to play with you."

He went outside, but presently returned and led him through the door to some moose-skins which he had spread on the ground under the totem-pole. Then he called the friends, who were four wolves. They came leaping out of the house and devoured the young man; but though his body was in four pieces inside the stomachs of the four animals, he was still conscious. After eating him, the beasts devoured the dog. Presently the wolves vomited into a dish, whereupon the chief re-formed what had been voided into a human being, and the lad was as before he had been eaten. Then the same was done to his dog.

The chief now beat once upon a drum as a signal for the people to adorn themselves for a dance; again he beat, and they assembled. Apparently all was ready, but the boy realized that the leader of the orchestra was absent. Again and again the chief beat on the drum, until at last the missing man drew near. He entered singing:

"A lad went out with his younger brother and his dog. A porcupine round the mountains to open for him."

539 As he sang, smoke could be seen rising from behind the house; the
* 756 youth could see that it came from Porcupine's fire, but the song explained
775 that it was eagle down for their mortal guest. The singer repeated his song; more smoke ascended from another place, which the lad saw was Mountain Goat's fire. The song was sung again and again, and at each repetition new smoke could be seen, from the fires of Deer, Black Bear, Whistler, Marten, Beaver, Wolverine, in fact from all animals except Grizzly Bear. The chief explained to his guest that whenever he wanted meat he could go hunting and would be able to see the smoke rising from the fires of various animals.[8]

"Tomorrow you will return home," he continued. "Your brothers (meaning the four wolves that had eaten him) will go with you to carry some presents."

Next morning [it was really a year later] the wolves tied up gifts of smoked meat in blankets woven of goat wool and sewn blankets of whistler, black bear, and marten. The meat, though a large quantity, was reduced to so small a compass that the four animals carried it without difficulty. The five travelled back to the spot where the two brothers had sat down to make their moccasins, and at that point the wolves returned to their home.

Now for the first time the lad remembered his brother, and began to weep bitterly, thinking that he must be dead. But presently he heard the sound of footsteps inside the cave through which the porcupine had guided him; they grew nearer, until the younger boy emerged. The elder was overjoyed, but his delight was turned to dismay when he saw that his brother's face was green and haggard, with a strange expression; that he had lost all the flesh from his body, and that his clothes, the same that he had worn when they parted company, were torn to tatters. His brother's appearance affected him so much that he fell down dead. The younger lad, however, had been made a shaman by the dead, so he quickly restored his brother. They exchanged experiences; the younger saying that the dead had given him the name Kipdxs. His appearance was vastly improved when he clad himself in a black bear blanket and two whistler cloaks brought by the other from the village of the wolves. The two returned home, entering the house secretly and lying down at once

[825] [8]To understand this the reader must remember the firm Bella Coola belief that all animals can assume different forms. To the ordinary person they appear as beasts, but in reality they lead lives resembling those of humans, having houses, [224] fires, blankets, and other comforts. An individual who is able to see the smoke of their fires will have no difficulty in finding the homes of the animals and hence will have great success in hunting. The only one this lad was to avoid was Grizzly Bear, who was so fierce that pursuing him would be dangerous.

on their old bed on the raised platform behind the fire. No one knew of their arrival.

Although neither the father nor the step-mother of the lads had shown them any affection when they were at home, as soon as they were lost both had been overwhelmed with grief. They lost all energy and, sunk in misery and self-recrimination, would sometimes lie for days on opposite sides of the house, not even keeping a fire alight. The other inhabitants of the village considered them beneath contempt, and often at night they would relieve themselves in the house of the sorrowing couple. The only person with any energy in the household was their daughter, now a child about five years old. On the day of her half-brothers' return she happened to throw some rubbish on the fire and, as it flared up, she saw long hair hanging down from the raised bed. She called out to her mother:

"Perhaps my brothers have come home. I see the hair hanging down."

But the mother answered: "Be quiet. Your brothers have been away for a year, we do not even know how they died."

The little girl was not satisfied. She threw more rubbish on the fire and again she saw the long pendant hair. When she told her mother the woman cried out angrily:

"Be quiet, you little liar!"

The two brothers had been listening to this dialogue, and the elder now took a mountain goat bladder filled with grease which he lowered so that it swung to and fro beneath the platform. When the little girl again threw rubbish on the fire her eye was attracted by the swinging object which she took and carried to her mother with the remark:

"My brothers must certainly have come home, see what they have brought."

Now the woman believed, and carried the bladder to her husband on the other side of the house, telling him the glad news. Together they went to the raised platform where the elder brother greeted them, but lied, saying:

"I am alone, I do not know what has happened to my younger brother."

In his delight at the return of one of his sons the father became sufficiently energetic to cut some firewood, such an unusual undertaking that some of his neighbours came to ascertain the meaning of it. He told them the news, which was passed around until the whole village knew, and all assembled in the house except those who, having polluted it, were now frightened to appear. The two brothers did not come down, and only the elder spoke to those gathered below. One malicious person tried to injure him by throwing on to the roof not far from his head a pad stained with menstrual blood, but Kipdes, by means of his magical power, knew that it was there, and whispered to his brother, who passed the information to his father, so that the old man was able to remove the pad before either of his sons was injured. The elder brother told the people where he had left large supplies of meat. This they brought in with great rejoicing the next day.

Although the two brothers remained constantly concealed, rumours began to circulate that the elder was not alone. After a time it became generally known that the supposition was correct, and that the younger brother had received a shaman's power from the dead. A malicious chief made the statement that he did not believe this and cast insinuations as to why a shaman should conceal himself. Kipdes used his power to inject sickness into the man and after a few days he died, though no one knew the cause.

Then the elder lad said, "My younger brother has told me that you should not bury the dead man too quickly. Let him try to restore him."

Some of the deceased's relatives were willing, others were not, but at last they agreed to give Kipdes an opportunity to show his skill, and he revived the dead man without any difficulty. In his gratitude the chief gave the restorer his daughter as a wife. Not long after, another chief expressed his disbelief and again the shaman caused him to become sick. This time the people at once appealed to Kipdes for help; this was refused, but when the man died he restored him, as he had done on the previous occasion. As before, he received a wife as a mark of gratitude. The reputation of Kipdes was now established; many dead persons were brought to him to be restored and through the presents given to him he was able to give potlatches. Nor did he forget his elder brother, but obtained wives for him too. Meanwhile the latter was having great success in hunting and brought in so much meat that he was able to give a potlatch at which his younger brother danced and was given a name.

One evening,[10] not long after this time, a little girl about six years old kept crying and crying; nothing would pacify her. The parents tried to soothe her but at last the mother said:

"Let's go away and leave her, the dead will take her."

So all in the household withdrew to the bedrooms, leaving the girl weeping beside the central fire. Presently her cries grew fainter, and the mother rushed out, but her daughter had vanished. The sobs were coming from beneath the ground, and they realized that it was indeed the dead who had taken the mother at her word and had seized the child. It sounded as if the girl were just beneath the surface of the ground, so the people threw resinous sticks on the fire and followed to the graveyard, where she cries led them. They took sticks and dug furiously, but could not catch up to her, for the echo grew fainter and fainter as the child was carried below.

In their despair the parents called Ëipdzc.

"All right," he replied, "I will try to bring her back. Please leave me alone in my house and I will invite the dead to a feast."

He collected all the vessels with urine in them from the village and gave one to each of a number of assistants whom he stationed around the walls of his house hidden beneath the roof. Then he invited the dead, who assembled with the exception of the woman who was taking care of the little girl. After repeated invitations she too came, and took her place on the chief's seat behind the fire, with the weeping child in her arms. Ëipdzc gave the signal and his assistants emptied the vessels. At once the dead people became impotent and sank as heaps of bones to the floor, leaving the little girl apparently unharmed. The parents picked her up eagerly and the bones were swept out to the graveyard.

The child kept crying out for salmon-berries, which were unprocurable, as it was winter. So the parents appealed again to Ëipdzc, who understood that what she wanted were snowberries, which are as salmon-berries to the dead, in whose land she must have eaten them. She would eat nothing else and, as they are not nutritious, she soon died, nor could she again be restored to life.

A similar version omits any mention of a step-mother as the reason for the boys leaving home, and simply begins with their following the dog into a cleft of the mountains. The dead, after receiving the younger boy as in the preceding tale, try to make him eat "cranberries," which are in reality the eyes of corpses. Meanwhile, the older youth encounters the wolves, but in this case is given instructions about entering their house, whereby he escapes being eaten and is greeted cordially and granted a boon before leaving. This is the ability to gain a desire by merely wishing for it. It is by exercising this power that he meets his long-lost brother. In this account the younger boy's name received from the dead is Ëdyakdzwat, and Death, Sa-lma, gives him a stick with which to lift him from his position on the lid of a coffin. In the end Sa-lma, his patron, recalls the young shaman to himself. This version, which is the more abbreviated of the two, makes no allusion to the attempted rescue of a child from the land of ghosts.

Direct Revelations from the Supreme God

As has been noted, a shaman receives his power from one or other supernatural being, not from the supreme god, Alquntám, himself. Yet instances are known to the Bella Coola of such benefactions, and to a visionary so endowed the term sudzum is applied. In every case a revelation of this type is considered to have taken place comparatively recently. In view of the manner in which biblical tales, introduced by Europeans, have spread from tribe to tribe in distorted form, it is not improbable that all such examples of the direct appearance of the supreme being can be traced to this source. Having heard from the white man of cases where the deity has appeared to men, the Indians would be only too ready and willing to accept and transmit such a tale, since it belongs to their general culture pattern. In the example here given, the instructions about dissemination of the knowledge imparted in the vision, as well as the claimed foreknowledge of European houses, strongly suggests a post-white man origin. Further, once the concept of the possible appearance of the supreme god is accepted—and no Bella Coola would question the accuracy of accounts heard from others—it would be a simple matter to attribute the powers of very strong shamans to this source. Accordingly, several typical shaman stories have been included in this section because it is claimed that the principal characters in each was a sudzum; it is highly probable, however, that if such a tale could have been collected when the whites first reached British Columbia, he would have appeared as nothing more than a shaman.

A Sudzum

A man whose home was on the lower Fraser was once cooking fish with hot stones in a box. To do this properly he needed four sets of heaters; when the food was nearly ready and he was dropping one of the fourth collection of stones into the box, the tongs, weakened by much hard usage, broke. The stone fell into the boiling water with a splash, severely burning the man, who, as it was salmon time, wore no clothing.

Even in his pain he thought of the way in which human beings are less protected than beasts and this idea troubled him so much that he fainted. Ăłqunŭm saw that the man was distressed and while he was still unconscious appeared to him, saying:

"I see you are worried about your lack of clothing. I have a message for you. Strange people, somewhat resembling yourselves, are approaching from the far east. They will help you out of your plight. You will find them cooking without the cumbersome boiling box; their houses will be warm and they will even have smooth coverings to their floors; there will be special places for sleeping and wonderful cooking-pots. Though all be warm in these houses, yet the fire will be invisible."

As a result of this vision the man became a sndzum. In the autumn he moved toward the coast and built for himself a house of special type with a raised sleeping platform in it, reached by a ladder.

Ăłqunŭm had told him to transmit his message to other tribes, and for this purpose he travelled to the sites of Seattle, Comox, and Nanaimo, telling what he had heard in his trance. He further said that the newcomers would wear clothing, leaving only hands, feet, and faces exposed. This, too, he had learnt from the vision, also that the strangers would arrive during the generation of his hearers.

His fellow tribesmen used to eat large quantities of clams, which could be gathered only at the time of full-moon or new-moon, when the far-receding tide exposed a great expanse of clam-bed. The people decided to test his power by asking him if he could not gather the shell-fish at a time when the tide was medium and the beds covered. The visionary was on his platform in the upper part of his house, but without raising his head, he said:

"Yes, get ready; I will join you immediately."

He descended, passed through the doubting crowd which made way for him, and went to the ocean, with eyes tightly closed. Arrived at the water, he lowered his hand to feel it, then carefully put his foot under the surface, as if it were a mat. He advanced with short steps, going through the motions of one who rolls something back with his feet, and as he did so the water piled up as if it had been a mat, exposing the clam-bed. When he felt weeds under his feet he knew that the outer edge of the bed was reached and accordingly stopped, turned his back to the sea, which was now high as a wall, and held it back, without becoming wet. He called to his tribesmen who came and gathered the clams, though some looked doubtfully at the wall of water before them. When all who wished had done so, he ordered them to leave and returned towards the shore himself; the water following him, became normal and recovered its former area.

177 The details of this incident are sufficiently circumstantial
* 756 to presuppose a distorted historical event. Moreover, many
* 787 of the old people had heard of the incident, another indication [539] of the accuracy of the tradition. As far as could be judged, [533] news of the vision must have reached Bella Coola about the year 1800.[11] It is said that the snāyom sang the following song in a language unknown to any of his hearers: Aqwimicu aqwimicu sisilı axwamıc qwisiya.[12] None of the older men appear to have any idea of the meaning of these words, or even of the language to which they belong.

No event has had such profound effect on the lives of the Indians of British Columbia as the coming of the white man. It would be surprising if, looking backwards, they did not feel that it had been foretold by prophets. The preceding story is the only Bella Coola example of such a belief, although tales of a similar kind are found widely throughout the province. In addition, there are a few traditions of prophecies fulfilled by the white man. One of these is that long, long ago, a shaman stated that in the future the dead would return with the ability to make fire by rubbing the end of a small twig along a rough surface, and that, soon after, all the Indians would die. The Bella Coola consider that matches are referred to in the first part of the statement, and read their own doom [174] [11]The approximate date was determined in the following manner: The most complete account of the event was obtained from a man fifty-six years old in 1924 who had heard the details from his mother. He was the youngest of a large family, so it is probable that his mother was about forty-five years of age when he was born. When a child of about ten, she had been told of the vision by a woman just passed the age of child-bearing, who had recently reached adolescence when news of the event reached Bella Coola. The figures can be arranged in tabular form.

Duration of the informant's life	56 years.
Interval between his birth and the time his mother heard the news	35 years.
Interval between transmission of the news to the informant's mother and its receipt in Bella Coola	35 years.
Total	126 years.

Allowing for exaggerations, this would make the correct date about 1800.

[126] [12]A phonograph record was made of this song for the National Museum of Canada. Recorded as song VII D 21b; singer, Jim Pollard.

in the second, as indicated by their diminished population. It is also said that about 1850, when a party of Bella Coola had camped for the night near Ocean Falls, one of the sleepers wakened his comrades by calling on them to look at the brilliant lights. No one then understood what he meant, but the meaning has become clear since the installation of electric lights in the town. 177 756* 787*

In addition to the preceding, a number of stories of the regular shaman type were collected, in which, however, the principal figure is said to have been a snāyem. They are included in this section for the reasons already mentioned. 539 756* 787*

A POTENTIAL Snayem

The mother of an elderly Bella Coola used to receive direct communications from Ālqunṭām which gave her the necessary qualifications for a snāyem, though she did not wish to exercise her power. She was able to see over the whole earth, and to talk to sun, moon, and stars in a language which the other Bella Coola did not understand. She built a small house for herself in the woods where she usually slept alone; sometimes her husband joined her, but he was always afraid of the gigantic toads and other monsters that were her companions.

THE WOMAN WHO COULD CALL THUNDER

About one hundred years ago there was living in a village at the mouth of the Dean River, a man, ᵊwinᵊdla, and his wife, Swuqnaix. He was a famous hunter who frequently observed ceremonial chastity and his wife claimed to be a shaman, but the inhabitants of the villages on both the Dean and Kimsquit rivers doubted this, as did also those living in the lower Bella Coola valley. Swuqnaix was so boastful and disagreeable that at last the chiefs held a meeting and went one day to her house, where they told her that if she failed to give a satisfactory demonstration of her powers she would be killed.* Some were ashamed to doubt her word, but the concensus of opinion was that she should prove her claims, so they all sat down in her house and waited. She looked around and selected one man, Kulkal, without apparent reason, and told him that he was to

*Such power on the part of chiefs is most unusual and, though it was related without comment by the narrator, should not be regarded as historically correct. [622] summon Thunder for her. The spectators began to beat time while she danced sunwise. After some time she told Kuelkuel to call Thunder, telling him what to say, and to address this supernatural being by his shaman's name, Xwinowitsakmlaix, instead of the usual Sniaxl. Kuelkuel did as she bade him. Then the spectators again beat time, and again she danced, and for the second time her helper called to Xwinowitsakmlaix. A third time the performance was repeated and after Kuelkuel had called she said to him:

"You have reached him, he is looking back towards us."

Some of the spectators began to be frightened. After the fourth time of dancing and calling, a violent peal of thunder was heard, and all believed her. Then she stood up and stated that she had learnt a song from Alqunstm, who had given her power in a dream. She taught the singers the following words:

"Our father is Alqunstm who is going to look after us."

After this she told the people to go to the river, throw water over their heads, and pray to Alqunstm to help them.

Next day she announced that she was going to a village on the Dean River to give a demonstration of her powers to convince the sceptics, and that she would like a number of the Kimsquit River people to accompany her. Some were unwilling, because they thought that if she were unsuccessful they would be held up to scorn, but Snaqnaix assured them that if she failed she would commit suicide, so they consented to go with her. Arrived at the Dean River village, all the inhabitants gathered to meet her in the house of one of the principal chiefs. She danced as she had done in her own house, four times, and after each dance Kuelkuel summoned Xwinowitsakmlaix on her behalf. After the fourth calling there was a violent peal of thunder, which convinced all of her power. She likewise taught them the tune that she had learnt in her dream from Alqunstm.

After this second demonstration Snaqnaix asked some of her fellow villagers to accompany her to Bella Coola. Again they were afraid, especially as it was November when thunder is most unusual in British Columbia, but she quieted their fears and they set out with her. On reaching Qemqo'ts she went to the house of a chief, where the inhabitants both of that village and neighbouring ones soon gathered to greet her in such numbers that many had to remain outside. The shamaness danced as she had done on the previous occasions, and as before Kuelkuel called to Xwinowitsakmlaix:

"Your comrade wants you."

Immediately after the fourth summons there was a violent peal of thunder, and those Bella Coola who had been uncertain of her power were convinced. She taught them the tune that she had obtained in her dream and for eight days remained in the vicinity, carrying out the instructions of Alquantsw by healing the sick. She was able to cure a patient by merely looking at him, and pressing the place where the pain was situated. It was universally agreed that she had justified her claims to shamanism; the coming of Thunder three times could be no accident. Alquantsw had given her the power and designated Thunder as the particular supernatural being to bring it to her. From him she received the name, Xwinwintsakmlain.

When Swaqwair returned home to Kimsquit, she told her husband that he must never again hold intercourse with her or she would die. This is in accordance with an old tradition; at her suggestion they continued to live together, and he strictly obeyed her command for one year. Then he disobeyed it and she died immediately.

A KIMSQUIT Sndqum

A Kimsquit woman, Xaciyat, claimed to be a sndqum, but the Bella Coola were unconvinced. On one occasion she, and a large number of Kimsquit people, came to Bella Coola where they were entertained in the house of Pasha; guests from the whole valley came there to see her and a doubter asked her to show her power. Xaciyat complied with the request.

"I want a man with a strong wash-basin," she said.

When she had chosen her assistant she said to him:

"You shall be my medium. The people have asked for an exhibition of my skill, and I want you to repeat to the powers above what I tell you."

She said something to him, which he repeated. Xaciyat laughed.

"That is good. They are moving," she remarked, "speak to them again."

He repeated her words a second, third, and fourth time at her bidding. Then she said to the spectators:

"Hide all the small children under the blankets."

Some were impressed and did as she had ordered, but others were sceptical and refrained. There came a crash and a blinding light, whereupon those who had neglected to cover their children hastily did so. A second, third, and fourth peal of thunder succeeded the first until the house boards rattled. Then she said to the doubter:

"What manifestation would you like, the powers are ready?"

"That is enough," he answered tersely, whereat everyone laughed.

Xaciyat dismissed her mouthpiece and the meeting broke up. Next winter the smallpox reached Kimsquit, claiming among its other victims

* 756 a boy who was dearly loved by his father. The latter, thinking that
* 787 Kusiyot was responsible for his son's death, killed her and was slain in Power Localized in Certain Spots

778 To the Bella Coola every supernatural being is, or should [776] be, able to move, in fact many of them can travel with phe-
[773] nomenal rapidity. But, in the beginning of time, when Ăłquntăm was populating the earth, he sent down certain creatures which were later turned to stone, thereby localizing their power. The term for a place where this happened is smä·tl, which can be translated with accuracy as, "A Locality Where Power has Become Petrified." It follows that anyone desirous of coming in contact with supernatural power of this type can do so by visiting the spot where it is situated. There [773] are not many of these places, nor do they figure prominently in Bella Coola mythology, and, as usual, there are many contradictions in the accounts. Apparently there is a tendency to ascribe the occurrence of peculiar experiences to localities where power is petrified. The following are the more important spots of this type, with a short account of the specific attributes of each.

773 (1) Smaien·a, also called Slexlekwaily: At the head of the 778 Clearwater, one of the sources of the Bella Coola River, and 539 the place from which comes the warm east wind.

Concerning the origin of the power in this spot the following tale, which is regarded as very ancient, was obtained.

Long, long ago, the ocean spread far to the east, covering the whole Bella Coola valley.[14] The shoreline of the ocean was at the village Slexlekwaily, so called from a chief of that name living there. Mount Xlikwals, which is now several miles inland, was then a point around which surged dangerous [14] It is assumed that the world was unpopulated at that time, though mention is made of people who were living there. This does not strike the Bella Coola as a contradiction; the accuracy of an ancient story is never questioned; hence it is taken for granted that "people" in the modern sense, were not then in existence.

currents, and where there was always much wind, making it feared by mariners in those distant days. Tradition does not state what being drove back the ocean to its present position; it may have been Raven who made the Bella Coola valley habitable. 773 778 539

Once a war party from the north swooped down to attack Sluxlekwaily's town. Although the chief's herald, who was stationed a mile below the settlement, called out a warning, the raiders were successful and carried off a number of slaves. Sluxlekwaily could not bear to think of his people as captives and accordingly exerted his miraculous power to turn the whole place to stone. Houses, raiders, captives, canoes with their carvings, and paddles can still be seen there, all petrified. They have become smä·tl.

According to another account, Sluxlekwaily exerted his powers to petrify the canoes and the bodies of his enemies before they reached his village. He asked the paddlers whither they were bound, and when they told him he, or the mountain which he later became, for there is a confusion between the two, invited them to land. On so doing they were changed to stone, and in this form can still be seen, complete even to the paddles, a proof that the ocean once extended far to the east of its present limit. Many Bella Coola have heard of these canoes, and they are said to have been seen recently.

Since that time the power animating the place has frequently become visible in the form of an enormous snake. There, too, are to be found countless smaller ones, a constant menace to the unwary. The following incidents describe the adventures of people passing near this spot: 778 539 [787]

The trail to the interior makes a detour to avoid Sluxlekwaily, but sometimes one of the reptiles, many of which are enormous, will be found lying across the track. If the traveller is bold and jumps over it, no harm will come to him, but if he should try to avoid it by going around, the single snake will increase to a multitude. Not only material objects, but the intelligence of Sluxlekwaily has become petrified there and resents any slights.

Four men were once passing the spot on their way to the interior when one of them, in bravado, pushed with his stick against the stones which once had been the houses of the village, saying as he did so:

"Sluxlekwaily, petrify us if you can, we are not afraid of you."

When he drew up his stick it was covered with small snakes; more appeared from everywhere and swarmed over the four like ants. They started to run, but three of them were crushed beneath the swarming creatures and nothing was ever seen of them. The fourth man drew his knife and with it slit his clothing, thus dislodging most of the snakes, and, naked, he was able to run away. He succeeded in reaching some people to whom he told the fate of his companions, but soon his stomach began to swell and he died. Snakes had entered his body and his case had been hopeless from the start.

On another occasion four girls had just climbed a steep and difficult trail behind the smā·tl to avoid passing through the place itself. On reaching the level land above, one of them called out:

"Sluxlekwaily, I am glad to be safely past you."

But the jealous Sluxlekwaily heard her. He sent a gale, the ground rocked, trees were torn and broken, and three of the girls were swept away to their death. One only escaped by wrapping herself around the bole of a tree.

Another time four Carriers on their way to the coast passed a boulder on the shore of a pool which is at Sluxlekwaily. Although aware of the power petrified there, they derided it by thrusting poles below the rock and asking it why it did not show its strength by taking revenge for the insults they offered it. When they pulled out the sticks they were covered with snakes, and more appeared from the trees and roots in the vicinity. The Carriers fled, pursued by them, and after running all day, managed to make their escape at dusk.

The place is still allegedly characterized by these reptiles; a recent visitor found the branches of the trees like snakes, and the very roots were in the form of them. The rocks in the vicinity are full of grooves like those made by snakes crawling through soft clay, and the whole neighbourhood reeks with their odour. 778 539

(2) Pa-lsb, Mesatche Nose: The point between North Bentinck Arm and Labouchere Channel. 778

Here is found a swasg, one of the most powerful localized beings, a creature comprising only a head and an arm with a mouth in the palm. The head can be seen in rock on the point not far above the waterline, but the giant arm rests far beneath the surface. At times the swasg bends its elbow so that the fist can support the head, as if the creature were pondering. On such occasions the upper part of the arm remains concealed below the water, while there is a gap about twenty-five yards in width between the upraised lower part and the rocky shore beneath the animal's head. A canoe can pass in safety through this, narrow though the channel is; but if it should take a course on the outer side of the arm the latter will crash down on the helpless craft, crushing it to splinters and driving these far beneath the surface. There has never been a survivor from such a catastrophe. The last time the arm was raised was about seventy years ago when a war party was returning to the north after raiding Tal-ia. They knew the necessity of taking the inner channel, so escaped unharmed, though they actually handled the mighty upraised limb. The Bella Coola firmly believe that the swasg will some day lift its arm again, and will crush the steamer that carries mail and passengers up the coast. 776

It was only a few hundred years ago that a certain Bella Bella learnt of the respect with which the other supernatural beings regard the swasg of Mesatche Nose. The canoe in which this man was travelling was sucked down beneath the ocean, but Qomqum admitted him as a guest to his house. The chief had invited all the underwater supernatural beings to a pot- 778 539

Retainer after retainer was sent after someone, until finally the wondering human heard a steady thump, thump, approaching. It was the Mesatche Nose swaiz, travelling on his single arm, like a looper caterpillar, his head balanced precariously on top while the thump came every time that he brought his fist to the floor. On his entry, the paintings of fish and marine animals, with which the walls and boxes were covered, came to life and cavorted around as if mad, but when the chief took his seat behind the fire they returned to their pictorial form. From this experience the Bella Bella man obtained a sisaol name and myth.

(6) Snawali: On South Bentinck Arm, at a spot where the water penetrates far under a ledge of rock.

(7) Nakilla-ata: On the east side of South Bentinck Arm, where an enormous spider has been changed to stone. The many colours of its body can be plainly seen amid the numerous holes in the vicinity.

778 539 823 103 (9) Mount Nazqalst, the highest mountain in the Bella Coola valley, belongs to the same category, since in the beginning of time it was a man.

He, Nizaalwaist, (which means "Too Heavy" in the sense of "so important") came to earth from above at Cape Mudge and decided to visit Bella Coola. He stalked through the land to the site of the present Mount Nazqalst, wearing a high hat around which crawled two snakes whose heads often crossed. From where he stood, he saw the lofty mountain Xqoiz in the Carrier country, and resolved to visit it. At that distant period this peak was a human being and from him Nizaalwaist obtained two wives, the name of one being Ṭ̌lisla. He returned to Bella Coola with them. 778

Nānalskwitl knew that presently he was fated to become immobile, a seat of petrified power. Since he was able to select where this was to be, he chose the site of Mount Nuxṭalst, midway in the Bella Coola valley, as a convenient place to overlook the doings of men. Before he transformed himself into this mountain, he determined that he would have people visit him; accordingly he changed his axe, Nuxkmidjuste, which he carried concealed beneath his blanket, into xṭalst, a stone much used for axes and adzes. Until the introduction of white man's tools his wish was gratified; people came from far and near to obtain the necessary material. 530 823 103 [316]

The human origin of the mountain is still remembered, since it is often spoken of by its chiefly names, Nānalskwitl and Ṭ̌lisla, relics of its existence as a man. This story is regarded as an origin myth, and as such might have been included in vol. I, chap. vi.

This mountain is regarded with awe by the Bella Coola on account of its great height, but it seems to lack most of the characteristics ascribed to other places where power has been petrified.

(10) On one of the mountains above Cascade Inlet there used to be a stone eagle with outstretched wings which came to this earth with the first people, but was petrified one day when drying its wings after fishing. About 1860 part of its beak fell away. A change in the condition of any of these places had long been regarded as an omen of misfortune, so the epidemic of smallpox that soon after ravaged the coast was not unexpected. 778 [164] [787]

(11) Ālkismos: An unidentified spot where a smnuq of the mountain was petrified. At this place there is a small pool which is the repository (II, p. 8) of a certain kusiut dancer.

(12) uxṭekam, "The Walker," the name both of a supernatural being and the spot where it is localized. This is not far from the glacier that lies near the junction of the trails from Swakli and Tāl-io; it is the largest one in the vicinity of Bella Coola and is said to move its position. The being is in some way connected with it, hence the name. [776]

About half a mile from the glacier there is a large rock shelter where mountain goat hunters are wont to smoke their meat. They are always careful to take with them dyed and undyed cedar-bark and eagle down, knowing that they may encounter the supernatural. Sometimes they hear the voice of uxpéam, a deep, long drawn-out hum, m——. If this sound is repeated four times it is a happy augury, but if heard only once it presages ill fortune. In either case some member of the party, one who is ceremonially clean and is brave, blackens his face, puts on a collar of dyed cedar-bark, covered with eagle down, steps outside, and says in effect:

"Hail! Petrified One. In the beginning you came down from Alqunàm, from all that was wonderful and powerful. You have not changed, hence we mortals can still hear your voice. Please, may it be well with us. There is none other like you."

If the supplicant is ceremonially clean the mountain will answer hi——, four times, and there will be heard what sounds like a great landslide. Then the petitioner takes some small portions of meat, some dyed and some undyed cedar-bark, and eagle down and throws them on the fire.

"Please accept, Oh Kusiam" (Powerful One), he says.

Thus propitiated, uxpéam grants them success in hunting.

778 (13) Spipishàn-i: On the south side of the Dean River about one mile from its mouth. Here, in the beginning of time, Raven cast his war-knife, ipla, which was turned to stone and can still be seen. Its power has likewise become localized at this point.

(14) In the beginning of time Mount Swaky, near the Dean River, was a man who was turned to stone. Across the river is his wife, Ailalusàl, whose ancestral name is Kamilkàn, likewise petrified.

In most of these places[1] a sick person can receive assistance, if he is willing to risk the consequent dangers. The first essential is that he be in a "clean" condition by the observance of ceremonial chastity. This state is pleasing to supernatural beings, who otherwise are likely to punish one trespassing on their haunts. The Bella Coola have not clearly formulated their beliefs with regard to these places, consequently the experiences of one individual are usually quite different from those of another, a circumstance regarded as quite natural on the assumption that the supernatural beings are able to manifest themselves in many ways. 755 778 [785]

Shakhwaily and the Hot Springs on Labouchere Channel are the places that figure most commonly in mythology. At the former is Shakhwaily's chamber-vessel, a pool always full of clear water though not fed by any spring. If a person suffering from the virulent skin disease known as lhkaly swims in it, drinks some of the water, and then vomits, he will recover.

Not only the pond itself, but the whole neighbourhood, is the seat of mysterious power, as the following tale describes. 755 778

Near the western end of the pool there is a rock from which long ago three men dived and failed to return. A sick man decided to do the same and leapt in, feet first, wearing around his chest some dyed cedar-bark. He plunged through the water and found that he was standing on the roof of a house; he walked around it, then returned to the surface, and back to his starting point. He dived three times more, and when he emerged for the fourth time his sickness had left him. He returned to Bella Coola and told of his experience. Since that time sick people have been carried to the pool, and have dived in from the same rock, always feet first, and always wearing dyed cedar-bark. All are able to feel the roof of the house, and are cured by the immersion. 539

The trail used by the Carrier Indians when raiding the coastal tribes passed by this lake, and on one occasion the Bella Coola, bent on retaliation, used the same path and paused to rest on the shore. They all bathed in the pool and asked help from the power there localized, then as they lay on the grass drying their long hair in the sunshine, a house emerged. Slowly it floated upwards, filling the whole area formerly occu- 778 787* 539

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

778 pied by the water, and came to rest when it had risen to the
* 787 usual height of a house. As each of the spectators gazed upon it he saw within that on which his own mind was centred. As 539 it were in perspective he visualized his whole life, both past and future. One man saw the slaying of an enemy, another a potlatch with himself in the role of donor, another his children, and a sensual individual saw a man and woman in the sexual act. To each it appeared that the house contained only one image. Then slowly the house sank into the depths. The party went on and had great success, killing their enemies, who were powerless before them, without the loss of a single Bella Coola. It was this house which the sick people felt with their [755] feet; the sight of it had given the warriors phenomenal ability.

778 Another seat of power is near the western end of the lake
* 787 where the trail passes between two piles of dark red rocks that rise to a height of three or four feet. Each is roughly squared like a brick with dimensions of approximately 8 by 6 by 6 inches. The heaps are not regular, and yet form a distinct cairn. If a passer-by wishes to ascertain the length of his life, he takes a stick and shoves out one of the stones, which rolls far down the hillside; if he can do so without disturbing the rest, he will have long life, but should fate decree for him a short one, the whole pile falls in disorder. Another sign of long life is when the mass sways back and forth, emitting a squeaking sound like the leather in a new shoe, as he endeavours to poke out one of the rocks of which it is composed. On the traveller's return from the interior the heap has always assumed its original shape, though no one has ever seen one of the stones being picked up by human agency.

778 Sick people also derive benefit from immersion in the Hot [755] Springs on Labouchere Channel. The following account was obtained from a man who himself underwent treatment there.

539 When a young man he had been initiated into the kusiut 778 society as a Breaker (II, p. 123) and as such wore a bear-skin cloak. His relatives were wealthy and advised him to keep his robe, saying that they would make it possible for him to

Libr. Swanton E-5 (1922-1924)948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

dance again in eight years. Four years later, one of his fellow- 778 villagers offered him five skins for the one which he had used, 539 and, when this was declined, the number was raised to ten, then to fifteen, and finally to twenty new bear-skins. As there was no particular value in the mantle itself, the owner became suspicious and asked advice from his mother who admonished him not to sell, in view of the time when he would want it. Accordingly, he did not accept the offer, but when it was increased to twenty-five skins he did so. He did not know that [754] the purchaser's desire for it was to enable him to injure the seller by magic through the acquisition of this personal possession.

The sale took place in April, and the following December 778 the former owner became crippled with a disease which so 755 weakened his back that he could hardly raise himself from 539 the ground. When the sickness had lasted for one year, his 787 * friends carried him away to the Hot Springs on Labouchere Channel.

It was known that if a patient were left night and day in the spring, scrubbing himself with hemlock boughs, he often was given such power by a supernatural being that, like a shaman of old, he could kill or cure by means of a stick. Many of this man's relatives had been killed by rivals envious of their success in giving potlatches, so it was feared that he might wish to retaliate if he gained too much power. To prevent this, he was removed from the spring at night. On the first day as he lay on a mat in the warm water, there appeared on a flat stone a diminutive man, about two feet tall, resembling a Bella Coola except for a short tail. It was probably a tłāqmā·ks, [776] such as his first ancestor had obtained (I, p. 688). The little creature ran around the stone; when it returned to the starting point it stopped and was joined by a second one of the same kind. The two circled the stone three times, on each occasion stopping at the starting point; they then vanished. The next day while the patient lay in the stream he heard from within the mountain four beats of a drum and a sound as if a large number of people were talking and calling together, though he

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

778 could not distinguish any actual words. This ceased, to be 755 followed by the hissing sound of escaping steam; the water became so unbearably hot that, crippled though he was, he 539 managed to crawl out. His courage soon revived, so, wrapping
* 787 his head in his blanket, he returned to the spring. The water was still unpleasantly hot on his body and legs, but the covering protected his head. The same phenomenon occurred on the two following days. Four days later he was well enough to walk and was brought home. During his treatment he saw supernatural beings, and is still hoping for a further revelation that will make him a shaman. He believes that this would have been granted to him if his friends had allowed him to remain in the spring overnight.

755 During the four days of his immersion he ate nothing, and his only nourishment was a little mountain goat grease which he did not swallow but kept in the right side of his mouth. After each bath he scrubbed himself with hemlock boughs. As in all
[785] such cases, for one year he observed continence and refrained
[761] from eating unsmoked salmon. Failure to observe these taboos would have caused his death.[14]

755 According to another account the creature that visits a patient lying in the Hot Springs is a bäbınk'. As already de-776 scribed, it is a hairless animal, about as large as a small moose, with legs so short that its belly almost scrapes the ground, no tail, and a large head with glass-like eyes. The whole appearance suggests an enormous walking snake. This animal approaches the sick person, as he lies on a flat stone[15] in the spring, and takes a bite from wherever the sickness is situated. No wound can afterwards be seen, but the ailment is carried away with the biting. If the patient should lack courage and endeavour to escape he would soon die.

776 Others of these animals of the same or similar variety have been observed about forty miles up the Bella Coola valley.

[14] See vol. I, p. 609 for further results of this treatment.
[15] There are two of these, one used by men and one by women.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

Between 1890 and 1900 two more were seen near Double Mountain. The last Bella Coola to see these animals left Stuix one morning armed with a light shot-gun. He followed the trail to the interior and was crossing the bare mountain, Kotink', about forty-eight miles from the sea, when he decided to turn aside to shoot some of the ducks which breed in great quantities on the small lakes near the top of the mountain. As he stalked through the grass he heard a rustling, and crawled so that he could get a better view of the place whence it came. He saw two babink' which were catching ducks with their long tongues by shooting them out from their mouths. After watching them for some time the man returned to the camp without disturbing them. This man has only recently died. In former times they were more common, but one was seen not many years ago by a Carrier Indian. 776 787 * 539

According to other informants, no one knows what supernatural visitor comes to the spring, since it always appears at night, and any one who is rash enough to look at it dies immediately. A bold patient lies still, with eyes closed, while he is massaged back to health. 778 [755]

Another man, while fishing for one of the canneries, had been in the habit of landing at the Hot Springs to get hot water for his tea. He drew it from a small trickle which emerged from a rock near at hand. On one occasion the flow stopped when he put his pot beneath, but recommenced on his withdrawing it. Thinking this a mere accident, he reinserted the vessel only to have the water cease again. When this had happened four times, he realized that the cessation had been intended by some supernatural power. 778 539

"Hail! Powerful One," he called out. "I understand you now."

He knew that it must be some creature within the rock that had stopped the flow, not wishing it to be so used, and since then he has obtained his water elsewhere.

Leaving these tales of the past, which stress the supernatural, and passing from the experiences of men of sensitive, imaginative disposition, it is possible to describe the methods commonly employed by the Bella Coola when wishing to take advantage of the curative properties of these localities. In cases of serious illness it is common for a sufferer to make the rounds of all five places located on the ocean. This was done, for example, by the father of an informant who had seen what he took to be a spring salmon in an inland stream where no ocean salmon should have been. He was foolish enough to leap in to catch the fish, which was really a sisiutl, and as it 778 755 787 * [539]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

778 rushed past him it brushed his legs. From its malign touch 755 they became as if tied together at the knees, so that he could hardly walk. When all other cures failed he bathed in all the
* [787] healing places on the coast, and was cured by the time he had returned to Bella Coola.

[785] Before embarking on such an expedition, a sufferer must observe continence for at least three months, and continue this after his return, otherwise he will die. It is wise to start at Snuwals, on South Bentinck Arm, proceeding from there down South Bentinck Arm, across Labouchere Channel, and towards Kimsquit, since in this way the patient travels sunwise, increasing the potency of his efforts.

At Snuwals there is a ledge of rock that projects out over the water; the sick person dives through a hole into the fiord. From this point he proceeds to Nukilā·xta, on the east side of South Bentinck Arm, about half a mile above the Hot Springs. This is the place of the giant, many-coloured spider, turned to stone. Among its legs there are numerous holes in which the patient lays a stick and pieces of his clothing, taken from the part of the body affected, saying as he does so:

"Please, Powerful One, help me to return to strength."

The third place of curing is the Hot Springs on South Bentinck Arm, Ixpe·xam. Here the patient lies in the hot water and leaves portions of his worn clothing as some sort of vague offering to the being there. The Bella Coola have no clear conception as to why the scraps should be left; apparently they have never considered whether it was actually of service to the being. At the present time it appears to be only a ritual handed down from great antiquity.

Leaving South Bentinck Arm the patient proceeds to the Hot Springs on Labouchere Channel, the characteristics of which have already been described. The final place visited is Anulxwam, on the west side of Dean Channel about nine miles below Kimsquit, where the ocean penetrates far under a ledge of rock. The sufferer is lowered through a vent about six feet in diameter until he stands on a boulder at the edge of the sea

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

in a kind of a cave. He here unties the rope, dives into the water and out through a narrow passage to the open fiord where he is picked up by a waiting canoe. 778 755

If he is to recover, he feels as he dives the scraping of some rough-skinned animal against his side. No one knows what this is, perhaps a fish about seventy yards in length which was seen near the place about 1905. If a person is too ill to make the dive unaided, a stick is forced through the entrance from the fiord, with a rope attached. The patient, who has been lowered to the ledge from the upper air, is then tied firmly to the stick and hauled out. Before leaving, shreds of his clothing are always left at the mouth of the cave in payment to its supernatural occupant for his assistance. [787] *

The method of curing at the spot, Allssmos, differs from those previously described since it is only the man whose repository (II, p. 8) is there who is able to exercise the power. Patients whose flesh has become rotten are carried to the place and he scrubs their bodies, in the water, with various prickly bushes. This man is not a shaman, his power rests solely on the fact that this curing place is his repository. [756]

At uxsekam the virulent skin disease Hokils can be cured.[17] This is caused by a morsel of cohoe salmon or fern root passing from the mouth up into the head, instead of down into the stomach. The Bella Coola have only slight knowledge of anatomy, and by "head" probably mean the passage connecting mouth and nose. In this spot the food becomes a frog egg, hatches into a tadpole, and finally transforms into a frog. If a shaman is called on immediately, he can remove the frog by thrusting his finger up the nasal passage and banging down on the patient's head, but if he delays, the ears and nose become clogged, the hair falls, and the flesh on arms and body wastes away until the skin is shrivelled. Then the only hope is to visit uxsekam. [753] [826] [753] [756]

Friends of the sufferer carry him to the spot and place him in an ice cavern, roofed by the glacier itself, and then retire to 778 the rock shelter half a mile away. Here he must lie alone, without food, for four days. If he is in a pure condition from 755 the observance of chastity, he then feels the earth shake and * [787] hears a sound like a mighty landslide, though it is inaudible to those waiting in the cave. If the patient is frightened and tries to flee, he will die, but if he lies still he will be able to spit out the dead frog, or it will become so soft that it can drip from his nose. He then washes in the stream that flows through the ice-cavern, thus completing the cure. The malady [785] will return unless chastity is practised for one year.

756 Finally, in dreams a man is sometimes carried away to one or other of these curing places, or to several of them, and is * 787 there made a shaman. It will be noted that this method of acquiring the ability differs from those previously described, but his functions are the same as those whose power has been obtained in one of the usual ways.

Dreams

* 787 The last type of contact with the supernatural is by means of dreams. Psychologically, these are akin to visions; indeed, it is often impossible to learn whether the experiences described in an ancient story occurred during sleep or when awake. The [774] Bella Coola believe that dreams are caused by the spirit of the individual; they are, therefore, supernatural and worthy of attention, but in spite of this, it was difficult to obtain detailed accounts. The reason seems to lie in the intangibility of the experiences themselves. Unless one is sufficiently striking, it passes into oblivion as a fruitless manifestation of the workings of the spirit. Many of the visions seen in ancient times by those who had fasted or otherwise reached an emotional state, must have been dreams, but they have ceased to be recognized as such in the course of generations. The Bella Coola of today [159] state emphatically that they receive warning of future events during sleep, but the only individual from whom it was possible to obtain coherent descriptions was the elderly man previously described as X (I, p. 515).

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

In his younger days X was somewhat wild, taking his full share in the frivolities of the village, and having a fondness for wine which he brewed himself. On one occasion he prepared a barrel of the mixture, half of which he promptly consumed with the aid of a few friends, then, semi-intoxicated, he fell asleep. He dreamt that there came to him what must have been a male being, although all that was visible was the lower half of his body, which was gleaming white. The apparition seized X by the nape of the neck, lifted him from the floor, and carried him across the house to the barrel of wine, revolving sunwise on himself the while. 159 787 * [273]

"You made this fearful stuff," said his supernatural visitor. "It will make your life dirty, as dirty as this."

Still turning sunwise on himself, with these words he carried X to the doorstep and held him suspended, face downwards over it. Everyone who enters must tread there, so that it is recognized as being the dirtiest part of the house, and X had no doubt about the meaning of the apparition's remark. This experience was so vivid and impressive that X asserted he immediately became a Christian and abandoned his evil ways. At the present time he is one of the few Bella Coola not addicted to home-brew. [797] [273]

A few years later the same being came a second time. X had been ill for a number of months with a sickness caused, so he believed, by a sorcerer. His friends had carried him to bathe in the Hot Springs and the treatment helped his condition considerably, but a little later he suffered a relapse, and was so wretched that he told his mother he would die presently. The same night he was visited by his apparition, but this time he could see the whole body; it was a man with large, powerful frame and a face so white that he could not bear to look at it. The figure was clad in undyed cedar-bark, and X immediately realized that he would recover, though he knew he would not be granted the same power as if the clothing had been of dyed cedar-bark such as is worn by supernatural shamans. The dream-man told X that he had come to him because of the clean condition he had attained by washing in the Hot Springs, followed by continence, and warned him that he must continue this for a year from the time of his immersion or he would die, but that if he obeyed this injunction he would recover. His visitor, who was, of course, a supernatural being, took X under one arm and carried him far to the south, where he washed him in a hot spring at the base of a steep mountain. Then he vanished; X arose and prepared to make his way home, but, lo, he was there already. Rationalizing later, X concluded that his body must have remained in his house, and that it was either his spirit or his life that had been carried away. [755]

As X lay asleep the next night, the same being came to him and carried him far away to the west, where he was washed in another spring, and as before found himself at home immediately after his immersion. The following night the apparition took him to the north; he found himself on the shore of a lake where an expert carpenter, Qwaiutsamlaix, was making tiny canoes of jack pine. The trees were only about six feet in height, smaller than any human craftsman would think of using. The supernatural being told Qwaiutsamlaix to make a canoe for X; he did this within a few minutes and the apparition vanished as soon as X was aboard. The craft moved with the speed of light and X was carried across the lake, only to find himself once more at home. The fourth night the being bore him to the east, washed him in a hot spring, and vanished as he had done on his first and second appearances. The repetition of this experience four times fully convinced the patient that he would recover. His health improved at once; in fact, his appetite had returned after his first dream.

As X lay sleepless[18] the next night, it suddenly seemed to him that the world had become flat and open. From his couch he could see in all directions; the trees had disappeared, the mountains had vanished, and the walls of the houses did not bar his vision, so that he could watch what was happening in Tcimott several miles up the valley. He saw a naked, black creature, with curly hair like that of a negro, rise from one of the small ponds on the south side of the Bella Coola valley about two miles from the sea. Helpless, he watched the being draw nearer; it entered his own house, seized him, and rolled him to and fro on the floor with wild contortions. Then it passed on to the next house where X saw it grip a sick girl lying there and treat her in the same way. After a few minutes the black apparition fled far away to the south where at length it vanished from view. In the morning he told his mother what had happened, adding that he thought he would lose his senses.

His mother, worried at her son's hallucinations, agreed to remain awake with him the following night. Again he saw the black monster rise from the lake, and he called to her in fear, but she could see nothing. Once more it came nearer, entered the house, and rolled X over and over, in spite of his struggles and in spite of his mother's presence. She could see his movements, but could neither restrain him nor see the cause. When the being left him it entered the adjacent house and again attacked the sick girl lying there, then disappeared southward. The same procedure was repeated on the third night, but on the fourth, after pummel-

[18]As already mentioned, it is often difficult to differentiate between dream and vision. X definitely stated that he was awake at the time, but the experience seems to be of the nature of a dream and has, therefore, been included in this section.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948

ling X, the monster carried away the girl. X watched and knew that it must have taken her life; so it transpired, for in the morning she was found dead. The black being did not reappear the following night. 159 787 *

X soon became fat and well, to the surprise of all, and many of the chiefs asked him to give a shaman's dance. He declined, not having received name, instructions, song, or tangible object from the white, supernatural being who had befriended him. He did not even know his benefactor's name. [756]

At intervals during his life-time, X has seen the white supernatural being and, more rarely, the black one in his dreams. The most vivid occasion was when he heard a sound in the attic of his house and climbed up outside to investigate. The ladder broke, precipitating him through an unglazed window into the loft with a broken leg. All night he lay there in agony, and it was not until the next day that his friends were able to lower him in a sling and take him to Ḷomqo·ts en route to the hospital at Bella Bella. Their departure was delayed by a storm and as X lay suffering he told his wife that it would have been better if he had broken his neck instead of his leg. That night, while half-asleep, the world again became open to him and he saw the black creature come bounding along the trail towards him; it entered the house, jumped around him, and finally leapt into his body. He called to his wife to burn dried salmon beneath his bed to expel the evil monster; this had the desired effect though he did not see its actual departure. The next night the white apparition came to him, telling him that he had erred seriously in wishing for death, that one should accept what was in store for one and not oppose Älquntäm's wishes. The being went on to say that it was wicked to prepare too far in advance, and intimated that X's misfortune was the result of having made ready tools for clearing an unnecessary tract of land.[19] [755]

The white being has even appeared during his waking hours. On one occasion he felt it coming when he was in the mission-house, where the missionary was writing a letter for him. Although still invisible, X knew what was approaching and tried to close the door but he was helpless. In came the apparition, at sight of whom X swayed so violently that the missionary asked what was the matter. It went away again in a moment, leaving X shaken and bathed in perspiration. [797]

The experiences just described lie on the border-line between dream and vision. X has frequently seen the apparition [19]This occurred during the first war, and X remembered having heard that the Germans had laid up stores of munitions. He concluded that this must be evil and that they would fail accordingly. He repeated this statement on many occasions and claims to have foretold the result of the war from his vision.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

159 in his sleep, and hopes that it will grant him specific super-
* 787 natural power. He realizes that he could increase the prob-[785] ability of obtaining this by ceremonial chastity, and believes [797] that it would come to him if he went alone to the woods and lay fasting for some time. Another means would be to concentrate his thoughts upon the desired end, but X is too good a Christian to do so; he is in the unhappy position of knowing too much of two religions to be able to practise either unreservedly. Such experiences are not likely to occur to any but a man of high-strung, imaginative temperament, to whom dreams and mental excitements appear especially vivid. X is intensely religious, so that it is easy for him to interpret every phenomenon in terms of the supernatural. It will be noted that most of the dreams just described took place when he was sick, precisely the time when hallucinations are to be expected. They were more coherent than those of most Bella Coola, though the difference is one of degree rather than of kind.

* 787 Most dreams are comparatively simple, and the information received in them is intelligible. They come to all, irrespective of rank or prerogative. Nevertheless, it is believed [828] that an inheritable tendency runs in some families; this does not mean that all members of such a group dream constantly, [821] but they are more likely to do so than others. Those occurring at the winter solstice are more carefully observed than at other
[773] times, since it is then that the supernatural beings decide events
[777] for the coming year and a man's spirit may be able to inform him of what has been decided. Consequently, as soon as Ałquntäm enters Nusmät·a, wise men separate from their wives
[785] and concentrate on dreaming, hoping to learn what is in store for them. For instance, if a man sees himself seated before a large pile of goods, he knows that he will have the good fortune to do this during the coming year; on the other hand, if he foresees ill luck, it means that he will be unfortunate. Another [821] time when dreams are especially desired is before the summer solstice when hunters in particular observe ceremonial chas-[224] tity. This purification not only increases the likelihood of such [785]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

experiences, but adds to the reliability of their prognostications. At that season, if a hunter dreams that he will not be successful, he remains at home knowing that it will be useless for him to seek game. 787 * [785] [224]

Though dreams are considered and remembered most carefully at the solstices, it must not be imagined that they are disregarded at other seasons. Often there is neither mental picture nor apparition, merely a voice, the sound of which indicates that the hearer will be fortunate the following day. Instead of a voice without body, a dream may consist of a speechless apparition which indicates by gestures the fate in store for the dreamer. One elderly Bella Coola who keeps a small shop states that he can usually tell in this way whether or not he will sell much goods during the coming day. Many years ago, after frequent visits from a being of this kind, the man became the leading fisherman for one of the canneries; he attributed his success to his nameless benefactor, for whose benefit he threw a number of small pieces of food into the fire. Occasionally, specific information or advice is received. On one occasion, when this same man was ill, he dreamt that a supernatural being appeared and told him to wash in the river, that it was breath to all human beings; he did so regularly, and was soon restored to health. Sometimes the information is with regard to the future. On the night of January 15, 1924, he dreamt that two naked Carriers were standing beside his bed. He asked them what they wanted, and why they were without clothing. 159 787*

"We always appear as an omen of trouble in the land," they answered.

Next day there was a heavy fall of snow which he regarded as fulfilling the prophecy. The dreamer was X, the man of imaginative temperament who had beheld the white and black supernatural beings. These instances illustrate the manner in which the same individual has repeated experiences of similar type. X claims that he began to dream when a small child,

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 787 and that his mother stated that all her ancestors had done [159] likewise.

Another instance of advice conveyed in this manner was 756 told by a Kimsquit man who related that a number of years
* 787 ago a pregnant woman had dreamed that Alquntäm appeared to her and told her not to destroy what she would presently bear. In due course she was delivered, but the infant was a [847] repulsive cripple, blind and deformed. Remembering the admonition, the mother refused to slay her child as many of her friends advised. Soon it was apparent that he was supernaturally endowed; as proof of this he repeated comments which had been made to his mother within a few minutes of his birth. As he grew older he developed shamanistic powers so that he was able to converse with the dead, the only instance known of this ability being granted from birth. He also had wonderful talent as a singer and, though he must have died about 1850, the Bella Coola still recount his skill in this respect.
[847] He would unquestionably have been killed but for his mother's warning.

* 787 Instead of imparting verbal information, dreams frequently foretell the future by means of images of events about to happen. For example, if a man dreams of owning large num-[224] bers of pelts, it signifies that he will have success in hunting, and he starts for his trap-line without delay. So, too, warnings are conveyed. A number of years ago a slave woman of Sinxł, who was not a member of the kusiut society, dreamt that she saw herself bitten in many places and lying covered with blood. Within a few days she met a Cannibal dancer (II, p. 71), who was supposed to have vanished into the land above; he killed her and lacerated her body, as she had seen. A Kimsquit man told of a similar instance that happened to a member of the party with which he had been hunting a number of years previously. One night he was wakened by one of his companions, Tsälits, calling out that he was afraid because he had dreamt that one side of their canoe was shattered. The hunters were impressed, because they knew he had long observed ceremonial chastity and was, therefore, in a good position to receive premonitions of this kind. The next day, as they were paddling down the river, they came upon some treacherous ice. Forewarned, they hastily abandoned their canoe, one side of which was soon broken in the way Tsälits had described; if they had continued their journey they would certainly have been drowned. 787 *

The dreams thus far recorded have all been capable of simple explanation; in fact, their meaning is obvious, either visually or audibly. In addition, there are a number of types considered to be symbolic by the Bella Coola. There are no professional interpreters, but it is believed that in ancient times shamans learnt the significance of certain images and this knowledge has since been transmitted from generation to generation. [791] [756]

One type indicates a coming birth. If a woman dreams that she travels to some distant spot, under the ocean or into the mountains, and there takes something in her hand, it signifies that she will soon bear a male child; on the other hand, if she picks up some small object when gathering berries, a daughter will be born. A Kimsquit informant stated that before his birth, his mother dreamt that she had gone far under the mouth of the Dean River to the vicinity of Q̓omoqwa's house, where she had taken up a child. From this she knew she was pregnant and he was born in due course. If the scene of the dream is in the mountains, it means that the child will be a good hunter; if under water, that he will be a successful fisherman, as it proved in this case. There is a vague belief that death takes place either near the spot where the mother received indication of conception, or that the life and spirit of the deceased visit the place before setting out on their journey back from generation to generation. The old man from whom this information was obtained expects to meet death by drowning, though he is himself uncertain whether his premonition is due to his mother's dream or to the fact that there has been a tendency for this to occur in his family. 787 * 843 787 * [761] [775]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

* 787 843 If a woman dreams that she has caught two salmon, two small birds, or is holding two infants, the birth of twins is foretold. This type of explanation is obvious; in fact, these examples lie on the border-line between direct and symbolic interpretations.

* 787 843 775 Another indication of approaching pregnancy is for a woman to dream of a dead relative; this means that the latter will soon be re-born. An elderly Kimsquit man mentioned that some fifty years earlier his mother dreamt that her dead mother came to her, saying that she was lonesome and wished to return. Soon afterwards she conceived, and the daughter born was considered to be the reincarnation of her own grandmother whose names she was promptly given. [553] At the present time, this informant addresses his sister as sister, though he states that as a child he was taught to call her grandmother. As already mentioned, if a new-born infant is a reincarnation, the fact can often be recognized by holes or dimples in the ears, relics of previous borings for rings. Unless such a birth has been foretold in a dream, it is impossible to learn whom the child re-embodies.

* 787 A dream of frequent occurrence in Bella Coola is the return of the sleeper to the scenes and activities of his childhood. [761] This always signifies a long life. Strangely enough, to dream of being nailed in one's coffin and carried to the grave is translated conversely, and likewise indicates a long life. It is remembered that there were many dreams of fire before the [731] outbreak of the smallpox epidemic, so it has since been assumed that such presage an outbreak of this disease.

* 787 224 The only dreams of which the interpretations are wholly symbolic are those experienced by hunters. The Bella Coola explain this by saying that hunters always observe ceremonial [785] chastity and their spirits are, therefore, in a receptive condition to supernatural impressions. When a man has set his traps, he is able to tell from his dreams whether or not any animals have been caught:

To dream that a canoe has been upset in the river and that

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

a lad has been drowned in spite of efforts to rescue him, means that a beaver has been caught. 787 * 224

To dream of seeing a kusiut dancer in full costume means that a fisher, lynx, wolverine, mountain goat, wolf, or black bear has been caught.

To dream of fighting people, especially if arrows are used, means that a grizzly bear has been caught.

To dream of playing children means that deer will be seen the following day.

To dream of swimming means that an otter has been caught.

To dream of fondling a woman and playing with her breasts means that a marten has been caught.

Obscene dreams mean that squirrels or pack-rats have been caught.

To dream of a woman with whom the hunter has held illicit intercourse means that absolutely nothing has been caught.

Until recent years these interpretations were believed without question and no hunter bothered to examine his traps unless he had received such indications of success. A hunter's wife likewise obtains information of her husband's fortune in dreams. [178]

All dreams cannot be translated. One man, for example, stated that in his sleep he had often seen a supernatural being enter his house, turn to the left, pick up one of the heavy floor boards and carry it around the fire as if it had been a tray. The apparition always told him to do likewise, but though he has tried repeatedly in his dreams, he has always found it too heavy. Such an image might serve a shaman as theme for a dramatic performance, though, of course, the element of curing the sick would be lacking. Another dream experienced several times by the same man when ill is that of being carried with the speed of light to a flat land somewhat similar to this, but located on the top of a range of lofty mountains. It contains numerous grassy meadows studded with trees of which the 787 * [756]

787 tops are all dead.' Here he meets all prosperous Bella Coola, but as soon as a man has fallen into poverty he ceases to be present in the dream land. The visionary regards this as an indication of a speedy recovery.

An effort was made to learn whether or not the Bella Coola are acquainted with several of the types of dreams experienced by other peoples. Some of these have already been mentioned. Dreams of fire are common, and one elderly man described one in which he saw on Mount Qimux a mighty conflagration from which sparks flew all over lower Bella Coola valley, severely burning those on whom they lit. Another type is for the sleeper to imagine himself so heavy that he presses down the earth until he can see in all directions, and still another of losing one's teeth. No interpretation is offered for either of these. To dream of climbing a tree seems to be unknown.

As already mentioned, the subject was difficult to investigate. This section undoubtedly does not exhaust the lore of the Bella Coola concerning dreams, but it is a fair presentation of the part which they play in the lives of the people.

CHAPTER X

STORIES ILLUSTRATING THE SUPERNATURAL

Stories Illustrating Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate —Stories Illustrating Supernatural Good Luck—Stories Illustrating Shamanism

KNOWLEDGE of the contact between supernatural and human beings is based largely upon tales describing such incidents; in fact, generalizations like those made in the last chapter are, as has been already stated, contrary to Bella Coola practice. Such tales are, however, so numerous and so long that their inclusion in the sections describing the kind of experience they illustrate would have made the last chapter unduly cumbersome and confusing. Stories recounting three types of contact with the supernatural are brought together here, not as items of folk-lore, but as basic material to supplement the relevant sections of the last chapter. These legends are not family property, but are considered to be historical incidents which can be related by anyone. 538 787* [424]

Stories Illustrating Supernatural Aid Granted to the Unfortunate

THE GAMBLER'S SUCCESS

Four brothers, of whom the youngest was named Djusdjw-sa, were very fond of gambling with crabapple sticks. They played on all occasions, but with such lack of success that they lost first their goods, then their houses, their mother, their children, their wives, and finally themselves. The three older men went hunting every day, but Djusdjw-sa remained in the house as if he had no heart to do more than lie down and die. Perhaps he had an inspiration; at any rate he was deceiving his brothers, because as soon as they had gone out he used to get up and collect clams which were plentiful below the floor of the house. These were his sole sustenance, but he also chewed the fin of an old salmon, which served to exercise his jaws. Before his brothers' return Djusdjw-sa always lay down in his corner, covered with an old dirty blanket, as if he 525 539* 787*

525 were about to die. During the day he spent much of his time aimlessly
+ 539 making miniature wooden darts and circles of pitnut-wood, such as are
+ 787 used in a game, and idly tossing these around. One day when he was so engaged he heard someone come to the door, and looking up he saw a strange man.

"A wine[1] is coming to Djuxdjw-xa," said the stranger.

"Come in," replied Djuxdjw-xa.

The stranger was a supernatural being, though whether Djuxdjw-xa was at once aware of this is doubtful.

"What do you bet?" asked the stranger, assuming that they would play with the darts and hoops which Djuxdjw-xa held in his hands.

"Alas, I have nothing," said the miserable man, though all his gambling instincts were aroused. "All I own in the world is a dried salmon fin which I use to chew on; I can barely keep alive with that and clams."

"Come on," said the supernatural stranger; "I will wager this pair of decorated moccasins against your salmon fin."

They gambled and Djuxdjw-xa won.

The loser handed over the moccasins, saying, "Go down to the beach and put just the toes of these shoes into the ocean."

Then he disappeared.

Djuxdjw-xa placed the toes in the water, and instantly the sea was filled with small herring-like fish called ǵmdx-i. Djuxdjw-xa caught and devoured as many of these as he wanted, but he did not clean himself, nor did he tell his brothers of his good fortune on their return.

Next day the supernatural stranger again appeared, offering to wager another pair of shoes against one of the hoops which Djuxdjw-xa had made. Once more the lad was victorious, receiving a pair of moccasins which, when dipped in the sea, brought countless spring salmon. The following day he won a pair which attracted the sockeye salmon, and on successive days ones to bring other species of salmon, until he was able to attract every kind. Finally, during his brothers' absence one day, Djuxdjw-xa, throwing off his disguise of lethargy, filled the house with all kinds of salmon. Great was the surprise of the hunters on their return; they asked him if he had become endowed with supernatural power, and he replied that he had. In exchange for being taught to gamble with crab-apple sticks, the supernatural one had so cleansed Djuxdjw-xa's eyes that he could see where the king-stick[2] was concealed; hence he would be able to win on all occasions.

[1] Wine, the term used for a raiding-party, is also applied to a contest in any game of skill, especially one in which teams or individuals from different villages take part.

One day the supernatural one appeared, asking Djendje-se to prepare a large number of the sticks and rings and be ready to follow him on the morrow. Djendje-se complied and the next day set off with his benefactor. They followed a well-worn trail, but one which Djendje-se had never seen, although he had lived all his life in the vicinity.

"You must follow me carefully," said the supernatural one, "and watch especially when I disappear."

Before long Djendje-se saw a man with a big hat sitting at the side of the road beneath the shelter of a huge cedar.

"You are going to a very dangerous place," said the man, "but nothing will harm you if you are bold. Soon you will reach a stream with four boulders projecting above the water; jump across in four leaps from stone to stone and you will be all right, but if you slip, or if you put your foot on the river-bottom, you will die."

The trail led across a stream at the bottom of a canyon. The supernatural one crossed without delay and Djendje-se saw that there were four boulders rising from the surface of the water. Remembering the instructions, he jumped from stone to stone, now, until he looked back from the farther shore, did he realize that what had seemed to be stones were really the heads of four ejemeta which would have devoured him if he had slipped.

The supernatural one had waited on the farther shore to guide him to his own house, the Sun, where he accepted the sticks and rings which Djendje-se had been carrying. After spending a few days with his benefactor, Djendje-se returned home, where he built a new village and in time became wealthy owing to the salmon which he was able to catch by means of his supernatural shoes.

THE LAD WHO WAS HELPED BY MOUNTAIN GOAT

During a famine long ago, a certain family was on the verge of starvation. One of the sons set out with his bow and arrows, and near a waterfall on the south side of North Bentinck Arm, not far from its head, he saw a pure white bird, something like a gull, only much smaller. He shot at it but missed. It went only a short distance away, and the hunter shot again, unsuccessfully. The bird led him on for some distance; then it turned into a goat. More eagerly than before the boy discharged his arrow, but the animal was unharmed. Following his quarry, he presently found himself within the goat's house, where all the animals were seated according to rank, from the ground-hog at the bottom to the porcupine at the top. In accordance with the knowledge of the lesser's rank gained on this occasion, men have since called Porcupine, Great'. [825] ma'ha, "The Eldest," and have spoken of him as the oldest of all animals. His goat-guide said:

"I am going to help you on account of your woes. Henceforth you will be able to see the smoke rising from the houses of the different animals."[7]

Thanks to the assistance thus vouchsafed to him, the lad was able to save his family from starvation.

THE FORTUNATE GLUTTON[8]

About four generations ago there was living in Bella Coola a young man who had a prodigious appetite. He used to eat everything, including vast quantities of rotten salmon eggs and other putrid foods until arms, face, and stomach all became fat, oily, and flabby, and he gave off an offensive smell. He was a chief and had married a chief's daughter, but she left him because of his grease and stench. Then he took another girl, who in turn deserted him. His parents arranged for him one marriage after another until he had become the husband of every available chief's daughter, but not one would stay with him because of his objectionable odour. Finally he wedded a poor girl who alone remained faithful and bore him a child. The glutton determined to improve his appearance. Accordingly, he obtained a large quantity of mountain goat grease and eagle feathers; then, taking these with him, he left the village and his family without saying where he was going, in fact, he did not know himself.

He went up the west bank of the Nechestaconnay River until it became a mere brook, then crossed over and returned down the east bank, strewing his path with eagle feathers. Then he went up the north bank of the Bella Coola River, penetrating every affluent coming from the north; in each case he went up the west bank, crossed the stream when it had become a rivulet and descended on the east side, all the time leaving behind him a trail of eagle feathers, and all the time eating nothing but the goat grease which he carried with him. When he had penetrated far into the upper reaches of the Bella Coola River, he crossed it and descended its south bank, investigating all tributaries as before. Near the Whitewater he heard a number of young girls singing happily, and a little below this place he came to his own village.

[7] As every Bella Coola knows, the animals appear in beast form to mortals only. They really have their own houses, dances, and other forms of activity in which they partake in human shape. Any one who is fortunate enough to obtain supernatural aid enabling him to see the smoke from their houses can easily locate them, and thus have phenomenal success in hunting.

[8] For another version of this story see Boas, p. 108.

According to his usual practice he did not enter it but went up the creek behind, which flowed into the main Bella Coola at this point. Presently, he came to a clear pool, caused by a spring, immediately above which rose a crag about twenty feet high. Here, where the pond on one side and the rock on the other prevented him from hiding, he met a stranger. This was a supernatural being in the form of a handsome man with a fine-featured face, long, glistening hair, and a well-formed body which radiated beauty. 539* 787*

"I am what you have been seeking," said he. "It is the fault of your own gluttony that you have been having trouble with your wives. Come to the pool."

It was clear as a mirror. The supernatural one told the fat man to bend down, take up water in his hand, and to drink until his stomach was stretched. When he had done so, the stranger struck him several blows on the back and out gushed masses of putrid food. This was repeated several times.

"Just look at that filth," said his friend. "That is why you have had troubles."

The glutton looked at himself in the water, comparing his reflection with the radiantly beautiful being who was helping him, and expressed a desire to be handsomer. The supernatural one agreed to grant his request, and told him to shut his eyes. This done, he began to wash and massage the glutton, starting at his head and working downwards; when he had finished there was a marked improvement. The rubbing was repeated several times, and after each treatment the man saw himself becoming better looking until all that was lacking to make him as handsome as his supernatural friend was long hair. The mysterious one washed and rubbed his hair until it grew down to his hips; he was now a model of beauty. Then his benefactor said to him:

"Go and sit on that high rock over there. All those girls whom you heard laughing down in the valley will soon be passing, and they will all fall in love with you. But you must have nothing to do with any but the wife who was faithful to you in the days when you were ugly and objectionable. Your name henceforth shall be Xoltzwesem."

After giving these instructions the stranger disappeared.

The transformed man seated himself on the crag and presently one of his fellow-villagers came along without recognizing him. In answer to his question, the friend replied that the people were going up the small valley.

Soon the villagers began to pass, and as the supernatural one had foretold, all the girls fell in love with the handsome youth seated on the rock. He would have nothing to do with any of them, and did not reveal

*539 *787 his identity until, last of all, came his faithful wife with their child. He returned to her and in the course of time became wealthy.

THE GOOD FORTUNE OF Tsaixlitl

Long, long ago, there lived at Kimsquit a very successful hunter whose name was Tsaixlitl. One day, during a great famine, he went into the mountains carrying, like all hunters, a walking-stick about eight feet long.[1] Tsaixlitl met Twalàllit, the supernatural hunter, who like himself was carrying a stick and was accompanied by a dog. Twalàllit greeted him: [224]

"I hereby give you good fortune. Let us exchange sticks. Do not hunt until tomorrow, then make the motion of hurling my staff at mountain goats and they will fall dead."

"I am delighted," Tsaixlitl replied. Twalàllit continued:

"I must give you some instructions. When you leave this spot do not go either up or down; keep on the same level around the mountain. When you hunt tomorrow, first kill a porcupine, because he is the oldest of all animals. If you fail to do so, you will lose your power."

Then Twalàllit vanished, and Tsaixlitl moved on, taking care neither to go up or down. Presently the spot on which he had been standing fell away in a landslide, such as is caused only by Twalàllit or a tsiutl. Famous hunters have sometimes seen Twalàllit's stick moving, or the impressions of it on the ground, and from these visions have gained extraordinary ability to see goats; but Tsaixlitl alone obtained supernatural good fortune from this hunter, owing to the stick given to him. The exchange was of equal value to Twalàllit, since the staff which he obtained was as potent among supernatural beings as his among mortals. Tsaixlitl was especially lucky, obtaining, as he did, supernatural good fortune on two separate occasions. [224]

When he returned home he concealed the stick in a tree, though there was really no need for doing so, because, as a supernatural possession, it was invisible to ordinary mortals. He did not tell his wife what had happened to him, and she was very angry at him when, for a whole year, he did not hunt to provide his family with food; this was because he remembered that to the supernatural ones "tomorrow" means "next year." It was a time of famine, and the family of Tsaixlitl was saved from starvation only by the food which he had stored up previously. When a year had elapsed he went hunting, spending four days in procuring a porcupine before pursuing other game. His success was prodigious, in fact but for his efforts the whole village would have been

[1] Made of hemlock, spruce, or fir, never of cedar.

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

blotted out by starvation.[8] His fame was so great that many people brought their infant daughters to him as wives. 539 *

Ṭsaixlitl had a brother and a sister. The former, whose name was Stuux, was driven by famine to Ḳisiqwatl in the country of the ułāmx people below Kimsquit. Here he, too, obtained supernatural good fortune from Twałłłit, in exactly the same way as his brother, and like him saved the whole population from starvation. The sister had been married to a Bella Coola, by whom she had two daughters. When one of them, a girl about fifteen years old, had starved to death, the people determined to abandon their village and seek refuge with Stuux among the ułāmx. On the way there, they camped on the shore of Labouchere Channel, where the remaining daughter was bitten on the arm by a packrat, as she lay sleeping beside her mother in a cave. Weakened by lack of food the mother died, and her husband abandoned her corpse and his injured daughter. Some time later a party of Bella Coola chanced to land at the same spot, found the deserted girl still alive, and carried her to her mother's brother, who looked after her. Though angry at his sister's husband, he did not wish to start a feud; to have done so would have grieved his niece, as well as have shown disrespect for the man his dead sister had loved. 787 *

During the four years that the famine lasted no berries ripened and there was a universal lack of food of every kind. Soon after it had ended, Ṭsaixlitl went to the Bella Coola town of Älqälaxl to obtain a second wife. He married a young woman, but for almost a year neither slept with her nor went hunting, omissions which so angered her mother that she chided him one day for his failure to carry on his previous occupation. Annoyed by her criticism, Ṭsaixlitl left the house. Several of those who had heard her upbraided the old woman for speaking harshly to the famous hunter and her daughter joined in the chorus of disapproval. Although it was winter, Ṭsaixlitl caught four geese which he carried home, using his blanket as a pack, and dumped them on the floor before his mother-in-law without saying a word. She fell dead instantly; the sudden start had caused the spirit to leave her body. Ṭsaixlitl might have used the stick obtained from Twałłłit, which had in it the power of life and death, but instead he had merely used the accumulated power which was his through long continence. In fact he never disclosed the power of his stick.

[8] The method of hunting introduced by Ṭsaixlitl has since been employed by all wise hunters. Whenever a porcupine is seen the observer kills it, saying: [224]

"Please, may your younger brothers and sisters come."

A man always tries to kill a porcupine when he starts on a hunting trip, and if one should appear when he is stalking bigger game he will stop to kill it, knowing that the time so spent will not be wasted.

The woman's husband was not dismayed at her death, knowing she deserved it on account of having spoken harshly to her son-in-law. This was the only occasion on which T̓saixtit̓ killed anyone. After the funeral he said to his father-in-law:

"I am sorry for what has happened. If I had intended to slay your wife I should have done so by means of my supernatural power, whereas her death was caused accidentally by the too-great force latent in my own body."

"Do not let this event trouble you," the other man replied. "We all realize that my wife was in the wrong and thus caused her own death. I will take a new wife from among your relatives, and there the matter will drop."

A year later the marriage took place and the death of T̓saixtit̓'s mother-in-law was thus amicably settled.[7]

THE GOOD FORTUNE OF Yelhal·a

Yelhal·a was very poor. He hunted diligently but was never successful, and the people of the village used to laugh at him. When feasts were given, Yelhal·a received a share, but he was never able to reciprocate, and this preyed on his mind. One day he set out at dawn for the mountains with his stick and his dog, but though he hunted industriously he returned at night with nothing better than herbs to cook for his supper. Undaunted, he set off again the following day, but had no better success, and again brought back only vegetables for his evening meal. He placed these on a stick before the fire to dry, and lay down, weary and depressed. Presently he saw a man enter the house and stand on the other side of the fire; around his head he wore a snake, which stamped him as a shaman. It was Twalältit, but Yelhal·a did not know this.

"Yelhal·a, what are you cooking?" asked the visitor.

"Mountain goat liver," he lied in answer.

Twalältit next inquired, "Is your dog a good mountain goat dog?"

"Yes," replied Yelhal·a, untruthfully. "Every day he goes hunting he kills twenty mountain goats."

"Is your stick a good one?" inquired Twalältit.

"Yes," answered Yelhal·a, "I always kill a great many mountain goats with it."

Twalältit then suggested that they exchange dogs and sticks. Yelhal·a, though at first unwilling, at length consented, and his visitor went away, leaving his own staff and dog behind.

[7]The above is regarded as an historical account, and the descendants of those who figure in the story consider that they have prior rights to relate it. But as it has no ceremonial significance, this claim is not pressed.

The next day Yelhal·a went hunting with his new equipment. As soon as he had reached the mountains he sent the dog after goats, though none were in sight; but as the animal ran around, dead mountain goats lay on the ground, though there was no sign of what had killed them. Without taking aim, the hunter cast his stick down a hillside, but it found and killed a goat. Yelhal·a was overjoyed. He cut off the hind-quarters of one of the animals and carried it home. The people in the village laughed even more than usual at his early return.

"Did you kill any goats?" they asked.

"Yes," replied Yelhal·a.

No one believed him until he showed the hind-quarters which he had brought back, and when he told them that there were many more where he had killed them, they again thought he was lying. Next day he persuaded a number of men to go with him to carry in the game, and they were amazed when they saw how many goats he had slain. Thanks to the dog and stick which Twalàllit had given him, Yelhal·a continued to have remarkable success as a hunter, and in time became so rich that he made himself a chief.

THE TWO UGLY BROTHERS

Once upon a time there were two brothers who were very ugly. Without consulting them, their old mother did her utmost to arrange satisfactory marriages for her sons, but wife after wife left, owing to the husbands' ugliness and disagreeable temper. Among others, each brother had married an ugly wife who had borne him a child. The two ugly wives loved their husbands, though their affection was not reciprocated; on the contrary, both brothers desired only the pretty women who scorned them.

Discouraged and wearied of life, the younger set off one day, neither knowing nor caring where he was going. After travelling for some distance he came to a house occupied by an old woman who called him in.

"Be brave," she said. "There is great danger where you are going, but if you heed my advice you will come to no harm. You will see two houses, in each of which you will hear a woman singing. One song will be, 'Ḳaina, Ḳaina, Ḳaina,' the other, 'Ḳai·na, Ḳai·na, Ḳai·na.' Go into the house where you hear the latter, but not the first, for the woman who sings 'Ḳaina, Ḳaina, Ḳaina,' is very evil."

The younger brother continued his journey until he came to the two houses. Listening attentively, he heard the two songs exactly as the old woman had described and, remembering her advice, he entered the one from which he heard the song, "Ḳai·na, Ḳai·na, Ḳai·na." The singer greeted him.

"I know why you have come," she said. "You have had trouble with your wives, I will be your friend and help you."

Much to his delight she massaged his face, arms, and body until he became beautiful.

"Now go home," said his benefactress. "All the women who divorced you on account of your ugliness will now desire you, but you must treat them with scorn, as they treated you in the time of your misfortune. Only cherish the ugly woman who loved you and bore you a child."

When he returned home the younger brother found that it was as the supernatural woman had foretold. Though all the pretty women who had previously repudiated him now sought him, he cared nothing for them; the ugly one alone appealed to him now, her lack of beauty was of no consequence.

The elder brother now desired to become as handsome as the younger. With this aim in view he took the same road and met the old woman who gave him the same advice. But he, arrogant and foolhardy, forgot which house he was to enter and when he came to the two from which he heard songs issuing, peered into each. The woman who was singing "Ḳaina, Ḳaina, Ḳaina" was very beautiful, whereas the singer of "Ḳai·na, Ḳai·na Ḳai·na" was ugly, so he went into the former's house.

"Will you make me beautiful, please?" he asked.

"Yes," replied the beautiful woman.

With that she seized his genital organs, which parted from his body at her grasp and fixed them to his forehead, the penis projecting like a horn from his brow, and the testicles hanging down over his face. Deaf to his appeals, the woman would do no more. Realizing at last that she would not help him, the unfortunate man left her, concealing his shame by wrapping a blanket around his face. His mortification was almost more than he could stand.

When he reached home he lay down with his head covered, as if very ill, nor for days did he leave the house except when necessary. No one could discover what was the nature of his trouble, until finally his younger brother investigated and found out the reason. Thanks to the massage which he had received from the supernatural woman he had her ability to transform the human body. Accordingly he exercised his power to replace his brother's organs, and to make him handsome, even as he himself. Then the women who had divorced him in the days of his ugliness wished to return to him, but he followed his brother's example, cherishing only the ugly woman who had borne him a child.

THE MAN WHO MARRIED A COPPER WIFE

Tcinutliax was a lad whose parents had been murdered by evil people. He lived with his mother's mother, a woman so old that she could neither see nor walk. Tcinutliax himself was not only poor but he was so weak that the other lads used to bully him and would never condescend to play with him. In the midst of his misfortunes he became endowed with supernatural power. 539* 787*

He said to his grandmother, "Grandmother, please come to me, I want to cure you."

The old woman thought that he was mocking her and struck him so that he began to cry.

"You little brat," she said, "I am old and helpless, you should be ashamed of making fun of me."

But when he had stopped crying he again told her he would cure her and this time she consented. He rubbed his hands over her legs, holding his palms together and spitting in them and again passing them over her, as is done by healers. Then he stroked his grandmother's eyes, spitting and blowing on his hands at intervals, until she found she could see.

Finally Tcinutliax said, "Stand up."

For years she had not been able to rise but now she found that she could walk easily; she had been cured. It was Ālqunūm who had taken pity on the lad's misfortunes and had granted him supernatural aid.

A few days later, when a large number of lads were playing on a level tract near the village, something seemed to draw their eyes upwards and they saw a bright object floating down from the sun. They watched eagerly until, when it drew near the earth, they saw that it was a shining woman whose clothing was composed entirely of copper. She did not descend to the ground, but remained drifting slowly around at a height of about twenty feet. They all knew, in some inexplicable manner, that if anyone could hit her with a stone she would be his wife. All tried, but none could strike the gleaming maiden. Then Tcinutliax came along and, making fun of him as usual, the others called on him to try; his first shot whizzed close past her, his second struck her fairly, and she fell with a crash at his feet.

One of the lads went to the old woman's house, saying, "Your grandson has won the wonderful woman, clean up your house."

But she did not believe the news.

"You are always beating Tcinutliax when you play," she answered. "It is bad enough for you to abuse my grandson, don't try any of your tricks on me."

Finally she was convinced and cleaned up the house, scattering sand

*539 on the floor as is done whenever a supernatural visitor is expected. Tcinutliax entered with his copper bride.

*787 Although no one gave him presents, Tcinutliax's goods increased in a miraculous way. He would leave two blankets in his house and on his return there would be ten, and the same with other goods. He was able to give potlatches, thus wiping away his poverty and making himself a chief. In the course of time he learnt who had murdered his parents and determined to avenge their deaths.

One day he said to his grandmother, "I am going to lie down with my wife. No matter what happens you must not disturb us."

The old woman promised to follow his instructions and Tcinutliax disappeared with his copper wife into the bedroom.

Shortly afterwards one of the murderers of his father was drawing water when an immense eagle swooped down and carried him away, to the amazement and consternation of the people. This increased when a second bird dropped like a plummet on another man, bearing him aloft. Eagle after eagle swooped down, each taking one victim, until half the population of the village had been seized. Tcinutliax's grandmother, realizing that he was responsible for the plague of eagles, was greatly worried; she believed that if she called him the attacks would stop, but she feared to break her promise. At last she summoned up the necessary courage to do so, telling him what was happening.

"Didn't I tell you not to disturb us under any circumstances?" he angrily retorted.

The grandmother drew back, fearing that Tcinutliax would strike her as he followed her from the bedroom. He did not do so, but no more eagles appeared as she had broken his power.

THE MAN WHO MARRIED WOLF[8]

Once a man was walking in the forest when he met the daughter of Wolf. Each felt a mutual attraction for the other so that he accompanied the woman, who was in human form at the time, to her father's house where they were presently married.

"Mortal," said Wolf to his son-in-law, "if you are wise you will take very great care of your wife. Never slight[9] her."

[8]Boas, p. 103, has recorded a myth having many points of similarity with this.

[195] [9]He used the word ɢɛpai, which means literally, "to be in smoke," i.e., he told him, "Never allow smoke to drift over her." Considerable smoke often rose from the open fire of a Bella Coola house, hence the literal translation of his command meant that the woman must never be seated where the draught would blow smoke over her. Of course, the real significance was never to allow anything to impinge on the respect due to his wife.

The man lived for some time in the home of his father-in-law where his wife bore him a sturdy son. When the infant had grown with phenomenal rapidity into a fine lad—it seemed as if he were about two years old though he was only a few months—his father took him and his wife to his own parents' home. His mother and father welcomed their daughter-in-law, and heeded the injunction that she was in some way peculiar and must never be slighted. He for his part faithfully obeyed his wife's wishes that he must never even exchange pleasantries with any other woman: she was very jealous. Previous to wedding Wolf's daughter, the man had been married several times, but he had divorced his former wives. One of them, however, still had affection for him, and when they met at the river bank one day, where each was drawing water, he exchanged a few playful remarks with her. Although he did not tell his wife what he had done she soon learnt of it.

"My father told you never to slight me," she called out in anger.

Then she took the child and lay down with him in the bedroom, nor could the distressed husband do anything to mollify her.

He did not know that the bucket and a skin cord which his wife had brought with her from her home were in reality spies on his behaviour. She always carried the thong concealed beneath her arm-pit, and when her husband brought water to the house she would drop the cord into it. Hitherto it had remained limp, but on this occasion it had curled up like a spring, thus conveying knowledge of her husband's actions.

When the man went to bed that evening he again tried to pacify his wife, but as she remained as angry as before he realized that it was a serious matter and determined to lie awake in case she should try to flee. Towards dawn, forgetting his resolution, he slumbered. Then the woman rose silently and slipped away, taking the child with her.

In the morning when the man awoke he at once felt for his wife, but she was not beside him. Fearfully, he searched the house and village, but all in vain. Wife and child had gone, leaving him filled with woe and anger, coupled with self-humiliation. Then it occurred to him that his wife had fled to her father's home and he determined to follow. Without delay he set out, cheered at intervals by his son's small footprints. Presently his path was blocked by a steep, treeless mountain which had not been there when he last traversed the road. He scoured in either direction in search of tracks, but without avail; it seemed as if they had vanished at the base of the mountain, and the man sat down and began to cry. Presently a stranger appeared; he was Lynx, in human form.

"Why are you crying?" said Lynx. "Have you lost your wife and your child?"

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948

*539
*787

"Yes," answered the man, too grief-stricken to be surprised at the other's knowledge of his misfortunes.

"That is nothing serious," continued Lynx, "they are not far away."

With that Lynx made an opening through which the man hurried. Inside the mountain he found himself in a new land, not dissimilar to Bella Coola, with a sun above and a river flowing through it. Best of all, as he hurried up the river bank, he saw his son's tracks at intervals. At length he came to a lake at the margin of which the footsteps seemed to vanish; once more disappointed, the man scoured the shore in either direction, but not a trace could he find. At last, concluding that his wife and child must have gone into the lake itself, he determined to follow, and walked in until the water reached his neck. He drew back in fear and sat down to cry, convinced that his task was hopeless. Once more a strange man appeared; this time it was Muskrat, who asked the same question as Lynx had done, and who likewise stated that wife and child were not far away.

Then Muskrat opened a path for the man beneath the water where he found himself in another world, with its sun and its river, again not unlike Bella Coola. As before, his son's tracks were visible here and there serving to guide the father. At last he was overjoyed to see smoke rising from a solitary house occupied by an old woman.

"Have you seen any strangers?" inquired the man.

"Why, yes," answered the woman, "a woman carrying an infant passed not long ago."

"That was my wife with my baby," cried the excited man.

The old woman told him that they were staying at a house not far from her own, though out of sight. Towards dusk he hid himself near the door and when his son came toddling out, the father seized him eagerly. The child, who was very fond of his father, was delighted to see him.

"Now listen carefully," the father told him. "When it gets dark I want you to say that you need to leave the house. Perhaps your mother will take you out, but if she tries to send someone else out with you, you start crying. Don't go out with anyone but her."

The little boy, vaguely realizing the importance of the command, promised to obey.

When it had grown dark the child called out that he wanted to go outside. His mother tried to send him with an old woman, but he began to cry. Then she asked one of her sisters to take him, but he only wept the more, until at last she took him herself, though perhaps she was a little suspicious that her husband might be in waiting. No sooner was she in the open than the watcher seized and embraced her. She apparently considered that his pursuit atoned for his folly, at any rate, instead of being angry, she took him into the house, where he was received courteously by his wife's relatives. For a long time the man lived happily with her in her village.

One day a large party, including the man, his wife, and several of her sisters, went on a visit to a neighbouring village. All his wife's sisters were very beautiful, but one of them, the most lovely of all, had fallen violently in love with her brother-in-law and had tried to seduce him whenever his wife was absent. For a long time he resisted, but on this occasion he yielded. As soon as his wife returned she knew what had happened.

"Did not my father say you must never slight me?" she burst out angrily.

While her husband was seeking some plausible excuse his wife seized the child and fled away, nor was her husband ever able to catch her.

THE MAN WHO MARRIED WOLF
(Second Version)

Long ago there was a young man who lost his wives, his house, and all his possessions through gambling at the game played with crabapple sticks. His father, becoming disgusted at his son's folly, determined to move away and abandon him to starvation. Following the father's instructions, the villagers collected all the food and all the blankets, took down the plank walls of the houses, and departed, leaving the young man alone. Only an old slave woman took pity on him by secreting some embers in a large shell which she concealed and told him where to find.

Abandoned by his friends, the young man was soon in difficulties. He blew the embers into a fire which he kept blazing, but he could obtain no food until finally he was reduced to a skeleton and lay down to die, covered with moss. As he lay there he heard in the distance a woman's voice, a.....

He thought to himself, "Well, that can be no mortal. If she comes to me, I will die, but as I am to die anyway it does not matter," so he lay inert.

The voice kept sounding, always nearer and nearer, till presently he saw a beautiful woman with two long braids of hair and two blankets.

"My father has sent me to you," she said to him. "He has seen your misery. I am to help you."

Though he did not know it, the woman was Wolf. She had brought with her some mountain goat grease which she chewed, then spat out into her hands, with which she proceeded to massage the dying man from head to foot. After the first application he felt better and she told him to get

*539 *787 up. But he realized that she was bringing him supernatural strength and resolved to obtain as much of this as possible. Accordingly he said he was too weak to rise, and again she massaged him. She repeated this several times; each time the man felt he was gaining more and more strength, until finally he consented to get up.

The woman now asked him to go home with her, which he did. It was winter and they had to use snow-shoes; there was only one pair available but they had no trouble travelling on these, each placing a foot on each shoe. When they reached Wolf's house the old man, the woman's father, welcomed them and showed his pleasure by insisting that the young man marry his daughter; this he was only too ready to do. The youth taught his father-in-law the gambling game which had been the cause of his own downfall, and the old man was so delighted that he gave his daughter's husband supernatural power to succeed at it. The youth lived for some time in Wolf's house, when presently his wife bore a son who grew with such phenomenal rapidity that in a few months he was like a child of two. After a time the husband wanted to return to his old home and broached the subject to his wife and her father. They were willing, but Wolf told his son-in-law that he must never allow smoke to drift over his wife. The youth, puzzled at this injunction, asked for further information; his father-in-law told him that if he paid attention to any other woman it would be as if his wife were sitting in smoke, and that disaster would follow. He added that she would have means of knowing whether or not he obeyed this command.

With his wife and child the man returned to his old home where again he began to gamble. But now his luck was unfailing. As he had been unfortunate before, so now was he fortunate until he had won more than he had lost and filled his house with food, goods, and slaves. He always remembered his father-in-law's instructions and took great care of his wife, even acting as her servant, in that he drew water for her in a bark bucket. But one day as he was doing this he met a former wife, now a slave, who was accompanied by a favourite dog. The animal gambolled over to him and his old master petted and made much of it. Whenever he returned with water his wife always dropped in the bucket a piece of mountain goat sinew which had the power of curling if he had shown affection for anyone during his absence from her; up to this time the thong had always remained straight, but now it rolled itself tightly, and the wolf woman knew that her husband had allowed smoke to drift over her.

She upbraided him, "Did not my father tell you never to allow smoke to drift over me? Why have you been so foolish?"

The son, who was just learning to talk, joined in his mother's chidings and the father was speechless. The woman refused to drink the water, but threw it out of the door and fled away to her father's house. 539*

The heart-broken man determined to follow. Sometimes her track led under lakes, but he pushed on bravely until at last he drew near Wolf's village, at the lower end of which there was a single house occupied by an old man. 787*

"Have you seen my wife and child?" the husband asked.

"Yes," answered the man, "she arrived home several days ago. She is afraid you will pursue her and, therefore, remains inside most of the time, but the boy plays fearlessly. Wait here and you will probably see him."

In a short while the child drew near and the father rushed out and seized him. He was very pleased to see his father, and the latter conceived a plan to use his son as a means for catching his wife.

He said to the boy, "Tonight, when everyone is in the house, you must say that you want to go outside. Your mother will probably try to send you out with someone else but you must cry until she consents to take you herself."

The son agreed. That night the child said that he wanted to leave the house and cried and cried until his mother took him out, though she told her relatives that she was afraid her husband might be watching for her.

As soon as the woman was clear of the house her husband seized her and embraced her. Convinced of his love, she was not angry, but instead took him back with her into the house. He remained with her in Wolf's village, became a real wolf himself, and never more returned to the land of mortals.

THE ORPHAN HUNTER

Kaldrap and his sister, two Carrier Indians, were orphans, alone in the world. Though Kaldrap was little more than a boy he took great care of his sister and hunted assiduously for her with bow and arrow, killing many squirrels, rabbits, and mallard ducks. The first two he skinned, so that his sister could make blankets from their fur, while the ducks were used for food. He was very successful, but one day he broke his bow-string.

"Will you not give me some material to make a new one?" he asked his sister.

"What do you want?" she inquired.

"Some strands of pubic hair," replied Kaldrap.

His sister gave him some with which he made a string. Soon afterwards he met twelve grizzly bears, at a time when he carried twelve arrows. The bears said to one another:

"Let us kill that puny man."

When they began to uproot trees to show their strength, Keldcap replied:

"All right! Do your worst. I will kill you all."

He shot his arrows, shattering the trees behind which the grizzly bears were standing, and after a tremendous fight succeeded in killing them all. He returned to his sister and told her that he had killed twelve grizzly bears, but had almost lost his own life in doing it. She was much alarmed, and, fearing for his safety, asked him to abandon such dangerous hunting.

A few days later when he shot at a squirrel in a tree he missed it, and his arrow lodged far above the ground. Keldcap climbed after it, and, as his eyes were always fixed on the arrow above him, he did not notice that the trunk was growing rapidly taller. Finally, the tree passed upward through a hole in the land above and Keldcap crossed to it, using his bow as a gangplank. He found himself in a fine, level, treeless country, containing game, at least so he judged from a well-defined runway which passed near the place where he stood. It was evening by this time, so Keldcap made a snare of his bow-string and set it in the path, hoping that the animal which had made it, whatever it might be, would be caught during the night. Then he lay down and slept.

Early the following morning he heard a low rumbling, and to his amazement he saw the sun heading straight for his snare. Keldcap thus realized that the runway was its path. He expected that his bow-string would be broken by the impact, but to his surprise the snare held and the sun was fairly caught. Its chief emerged from within and looked around without noticing the frightened lad who lay perfectly still.

"Who did this?" he demanded angrily, but Keldcap did not answer.

Presently the mice which are plentiful in the land above came to him and asked:

"Did you do this? It is a terrible thing, a great mistake which you must rectify."

"How?" inquired Keldcap.

"Cover our bodies with paint[19] and we will gnaw through the string of your noose."

Keldcap smeared the mice with paint, but when they tried to penetrate to the cord they were driven back by the intense heat.

[293]

[19]It was formerly customary for all Bella Coola to carry small pouches containing paint.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

"You did not paint us all over," said the mice. "Do our eyes and our recta." 539 *

Kaldcap did so. Then the mice reached the string and gnawed it, freeing the sun to hurry off on its course. 787 *

"Never come here again," said the mice. "It is a bad place. No people ever come here."

Kaldcap, who was terribly frightened, was only too willing to follow their advice, so he extended his bow to the tree, which had remained in position, crossed to it, and began to descend. As he did so, the trunk rapidly became shorter until at length he reached the earth. His sister, who did not know what had become of him, was weeping at his long absence.

"I thought you were dead," she said to him.

"I have had a narrow escape," he answered, "I've been to the land above though I did not know it."

When he recounted his adventures, she was terrified at the dangers through which he had passed and again besought him not to go on any more such expeditions. Not long afterwards, when he wanted to hunt mallard ducks which were plentiful on a near-by lake, the sister insisted on accompanying him. On reaching the shore, he threw off his clothing and dived into the water to pursue the birds while she remained on the beach. After swimming a short distance, Kaldcap's legs were seized by a sîdmsk which dwelt in the lake. He was not swallowed immediately and retained sufficient presence of mind to call to his sister to throw him her long rope of caribou hide.[11] He caught one end and tied it round his stomach, directing her to fasten the other to a tree-trunk. Then he told her to throw him his stone knife, and with it he slew the monster. Inside the animal's stomach they found the bones of many people whom it had devoured. This adventure terrified Kaldcap as much as it did his sister, who pointed out to him that he would have perished but for her help. Thenceforth he abandoned hunting.

In spite of his good intentions, Kaldcap seemed fated to have adventures. One night, soon after his experience in the lake, he was sleeping in his camp on the brink of a precipitous canyon when he was awakened by someone shaking him.

"Get up!" He heard a voice say.

When he opened his eyes the only living creature in sight was a mouse which rapidly disappeared beneath a stone. Kaldcap, concluding that he must have been dreaming, again went to sleep. A second time he was aroused by being shaken, and a second time he heard the voice, but as before he could see no one. Determined to solve the mystery, he made a

"Don't vanish," Kaldrap said to her. "I see you."

The woman, not at all perturbed at being seen, merely answered:

"Come to my house."

Kaldrap followed his visitor, a mouse in human form, down under the earth to her home, a cave on the very edge of the precipice. One side of the house opened out into the canyon without a wall of any kind. Here the mouse-woman's three beautiful sisters were waiting.

"Let us play," said the mice. "Won't you swing us?"

[524] From the roof was suspended a swing consisting of two long ropes with a small cross-seat at the bottom, and a long rope by which it could be hauled back and forth, exactly like the swings formerly used by Bella Coola boys. One of the sisters took her place on the seat and Kaldrap pulled her back and forth so that she swung far out into the canyon. Then another took her place, followed by the third and the fourth, until he had swung them all. Next they suggested that he take his turn. A second rope was attached to the seat, Kaldrap took his place, and the four women, two on each side, pulled so strongly that he, in turn, swung far out into the canyon. Then the treacherous mice jerked the ropes violently, throwing him from the seat down into the depths.

Even as he was falling Kaldrap retained sufficient presence of mind to thrust out his bow, in which his supernatural power was localized, and to which he had clung. It lodged in a cranny of the canyon wall, arresting his fall, and he, being small and light, succeeded in gaining a foothold on a rough path. He crawled up it to the surface of the ground at some little distance from the place where he had camped, but on the same side of the gorge. Full of anger, he made his way back to the house of the mice.

"Let's play some more," he said to them.

But the mice, amazed at seeing him alive, were afraid to trust themselves to his swinging, even though he promised that they should later have an opportunity of doing the same to him.

"No," they said. "Sometime we will allow you to return and play with us, and you can sleep with us if you like. You had better go home now."

Kaldrap returned to his camp. When, the next day, he told his sister of his adventure she was terrified, and once more besought him to avoid all dangers.*

[538] *Though in this case the have mentioned scheming women, it is said that in many ancient stories the reverse was true.

THE ORPHAN HUNTER
(Second Version)

Djuskp[a] was a poor orphan boy who lived with and looked after his sister. Eager to be a hunter, he made a bow for himself and begged her to make A string for it. First she offered to braid it of cedar-bark, but he would have none of it, and, when he likewise refused to accept one of moss, she was in despair, saying that she had nothing more that she could use. Then Djuskp persuaded her to give him some of her hair, which he twined into a bow-string. His sister told him never to shoot upwards, and he promised to obey her injunction. He was a fairly successful hunter, and killed a large number of squirrels whose skins his sister sewed into clothing for her brother and herself. 539 x 787 *

One day when Djuskp was hunting he saw a black bear in a tree. It seemed an easy mark, so easy that he felt certain of success and quite forgot his sister's instructions not to shoot upwards. Already he seemed to see himself clad in a fine bear-skin cloak, and ripped his squirrel-skin covering to pieces in anticipation. He shot at the bear, but the arrow, missing its mark, lodged in the tree; again he tried with like result. As this exhausted his quiver, Djuskp decided to climb after his arrows. Up he went, the bear clambering up and up above him, but he did not realize that the tree was growing rapidly, until, when he looked down, he saw, to his amazement, that the earth had disappeared from sight. After a moment's hesitation, he resolutely continued his climb. Finally the tree penetrated the floor of the land above, to which the hunter crawled with the aid of his bow.

Djuskp found himself in a flat country where he wandered on until he reached four large runways, such as any large animal might have made. Presently he heard a far-off rumble, a light appeared in the distance, and the sun came roaring up one of the paths. The heat became intense, but as the sun disappeared, the temperature returned to normal. Djuskp decided to set the string of his bow as a noose in one of the runways and, when he had done so, lay down to sleep.

Next morning he was awakened by the same distant rumbling; again the sun came near and was caught in his noose. As the heat was unbearable, Djuskp tried to reach with his bow to pull away his loop, but was driven back by the warmth. Then a mouse came to his aid, which Djuskp sent in to gnaw at the string, but the animal was roasted to death. He pulled it forth with his bow and revived it by sprinkling it with paint. Again he despatched the little creature, but a second time it was overcome

[a] The name of the hero appears in different forms; it is probably a Carrier word [177] incorrectly pronounced by the Bella Coola.

*539 *787 by the heat. This happened a third time, but on the fourth attempt the mouse succeeded in cutting the string, whereupon the sun went bounding away.

The orphan walked along a good road until he came to a house from inside which he could hear women's voices and the sound of bark-beating. Peering in, he saw a number of women preparing soft bark coverings for an infant who was lying in a cradle-box; they were the supernatural cedar-bark beaters who live in the land above. When Djuskip walked in, they asked him whence he had come; he replied by inquiring why they were making bark cloths, and they answered that they were for a cradle. They told him to lie down in it, saying that it was so comfortable that he would soon fall asleep. Though Djuskip suspected that they were plotting against him, he felt so secure in his great power that he did as they asked. As soon as he had lost consciousness, the box rotated on its axis so that he was projected through the floor itself, down into the region between the upper land and this earth. After falling a short distance, Djuskip changed to eagle down and floated back up to the house, where he reappeared to the women in human form once more. They were amazed at seeing him again, but once more he obligingly went to sleep. Again the box rotated to cast him down below, and again he became eagle down and floated up. When this had happened four times, Djuskip became angry.

"I am a shaman," he said to the women, "and will kill you if you are not careful."

The supernatural bark beaters advised him to go back to his sister, telling him to return by the way he had come. He decided to follow their counsel, found the tree still in position and climbed down, the trunk growing shorter as he descended. In this way he reached home in safety.

In a third version, collected from another informant, the hero is named Tsalkwap. He is described as a lad who supported his sister on small game, while dreaming of the time when he would be a real hunter. He decided that a bow-string of pubic hair was necessary, and obtained the wherewithal to make one from his sister, after refusing to use any other kind of hair. The story relates how his arrow lodged in a tree-top, where he attempted to climb after it, ultimately reaching the land above. Parallel game trails crossed this territory, in one of which he set his bow-string as a noose and in this way snared the sun. After a mouse had released the captive Tsalkwap returned to earth.

[821] This account states that each parallel trail was the track of the sun on a successive day and that after being captured the sun resumed its course. This is said to be the origin of the solstices.

There are many other versions of this tale current in Bella Coola, in some of which the hero is said to have been a native of Green Bay.

THE BOY WHO WAS BEFRIENDED BY GRIZZLY BEAR

The youths of a certain village were very fond of wrestling, spending most of their time in bouts. Proud of their strength, they used to unite to bully one of their fellows, a weakly youngster quite unable to hold his own among his more vigorous companions; they not only mocked his lack of strength, but, when wrestling, threw him around as if he were a plaything. For a long time the lad remained passive under the taunts and ill-treatment of his companions, then determined to seek supernatural aid. Adorning himself with eagle down, dyed cedar-bark and undyed cedar-bark, he made his way to a small pool up the valley, where he knew that grizzly bears were in the habit of washing. For four days he lay down by the water, without sleeping or eating. At last he saw a bear approaching, but, strengthened by his fast, he showed no sign of fear.

"You have come to obtain power from me," said Grizzly Bear.

"Yes," answered the boy.

"Very well."

Grizzly Bear washed the lad in the pool, and as the creature passed his hands over him, the youth felt an increase in strength. There was a large boulder near the edge of the pond, one which the bears used to toss around when playing.

"Throw me that rock," said the bear, wishing to see how strong the lad had become.

But the latter, though strong enough to throw it, determined to plead weakness with the intention of obtaining greater strength by more washings. In this he succeeded. When he pretended to try to lift the stone, but failed to do so, Grizzly Bear again washed him, and again he felt increasing vigour.

"Try now," said Grizzly Bear.

A second time the boy pretended that it was too heavy for him.

"Pshaw!" said Grizzly Bear. "If you had any mental courage you would be able to throw it as I do."

As he said this he tossed the boulder a considerable distance as though it had been a pebble.

Nevertheless he consented to wash the youth a third time and even, when again he failed to lift the stone, a fourth time. Now the lad decided that he had obtained as much strength as he could, so he picked up the boulder and wound it lightly, even further than Grizzly Bear himself had been able to do.

"Now," said Grizzly Bear, "go home. But don't display your powers immediately. If they start to handle you roughly as before, just pretend still to be weak, and watch who are your chief tormentors. Then, if they anger you too much, exert your strength."

When the youth returned to his village his companions, who knew of his search for supernatural help, came running out.

"Here comes so-and-so," they said, "who went away to get power."

They were all eager to learn whether or not he had succeeded, but the lad did not gratify their curiosity. After a time they began their usual sport of wrestling, nor was it long before they had begun to throw their playmate to and fro, as they had often done. He allowed them to believe him a weakling until the whole crowd jumped on him, forcing him to the ground, and derriding him for his failure to obtain supernatural help. Then he exerted his strength. Catching one of his persecutors by the neck he squeezed him until his head was separated from his body; next he seized two, one in each hand, and crushed them together with such a shock that they were killed. Grizzly Bear had endowed him with the strength of a bear, which he used to slay all who had molested him. Once avenged, he assumed the form of a grizzly bear and ran away, never to return.

THE DOG'S WIFE

A chief and his wife had a daughter who, not having reached the age of puberty, always slept beside her father. One night she was startled by feeling a man holding intercourse with her, but she could not tell who it was. The same thing happened repeatedly just before dawn, her seducer always fleeing so rapidly that she could not identify him. Greatly puzzled, she at last hit on a plan to find her lover. Like all women she carried a small bag containing the paint used to decorate herself; she took this to bed with her, unclosed, and determined to throw it at the person who was visiting her. Towards dawn she was wakened as usual, hurled her pouch in the darkness, and heard the thud as it struck someone. In the morning everyone noticed that an ugly old dog living in the house had a smear of paint over its face and there was considerable discussion as to how this could have happened. The girl was terrified, suspecting, as was the case, that the dog had heard her make some unkind remark about its face and had become her lover in revenge.

The girl soon felt that she was pregnant. The time of delivery arrived with unprecedented rapidity, and she gave birth to four puppies, three males and one female. The anger and wrath of her proud parents was beyond expression, since such a disgrace had never been known in their illustrious family. To mark her shame, they dubbed her Nemtlah, "The Mother of Dogs." Her father wished her to die but, unwilling to slay his own daughter, decided to accomplish this end indirectly by abandoning her without food or clothing to die of starvation. He instructed the people to gather up all the provisions and household utensils and to pile them on planks removed from the walls of the houses and laid across canoes. Then they moved away. The girl's only friend was a kindly slave who, taking advantage of a time when no one was looking, hid for her one old copper tsmal as a protection against rain, and a few cinders contained in the shell of a large mussel.

As soon as the people had departed, Nemtlah took out the shell and blew the coals into a flame with which she started a fire. Then she started out to hunt clams. No sooner had she left the house than the three little dogs, the three oldest of the litter, took off their animal skins, hung them on a cross-beam of the house, and began to play in the form of little boys, taking care to send out the single sister to warn them when their mother was approaching. As she drew near, the watcher notified her brothers, who resumed their dog-skins and lay curled up asleep when Nemtlah returned. This went on day after day; the mother went out to gather clams and her offspring became little boys in her absence. She was much puzzled at finding marks in the house, not footprints that could be recognized as such, but trampled earth and small objects moved from the places where she had left them; in fact, just such traces as exist where children have been playing. So she determined to find out the cause. One evening as dusk was falling, she went out as usual to the clam-bed, where she hung her hat and cloak on her digging-stick and crept back naked to the rear of the house. The watching puppy did not discover the subterfuge and her brothers continued their play as boys. Nemtlah peered through a crack in the wall, saw the dog-skins hanging on the beams, and, dashing in, threw them on the fire.

With their skins destroyed, the dog-children were unable to resume animal form, the female alone remaining as she had been. Nemtlah began to weep bitterly.

"See the mischief you have caused," she cried. "My father and my mother have abandoned me because you were dogs. All this could have been avoided if only you had appeared in human form at once."

Nemtlah's children had inherited some of their father's supernatural power and they now intimated what prodigies they would undertake.

The oldest looked, and then spoke to her in Bella Bella.

"I shall be a house builder," he said.

The second brother likewise barked before saying:
"I shall build canoes."
Last of all the youngest barked and stated:
"I shall be a hunter."

The mother said nothing to the three assertions. Next morning the dwelling had been enlarged and was beautifully furnished with mats, boxes, and all other requisites of a chief's house, and it was amply provided with all kinds of meat ready for cooking. Glancing through the front door, Nawdlaat saw that numerous canoes were lying on the beach.

Not long afterwards, the slave who had helped the girl saw smoke rising from her house and went to investigate, taking care not to say anything of his plan to his master. The visitor was delighted to find Nawdlaat well and prosperous, the happy mother of three sturdy sons. She gave him some seal meat, which he took home intending to eat it secretly with his wife and child during the night. The slave heated it without attracting attention but, unfortunately, a piece of the meat lodged in his son's throat and the lad nearly choked to death. His coughing aroused the chief's wife with whose assistance the obstruction was removed, but she saw what it was and insisted on being told whence it had been obtained. So the slave recounted his visit to his master's daughter, adding that the latter was prosperous and did not want to see her parents. In later years, however, when they were old and feeble, Nawdlaat brought them to her house and cared for them.

A second version, collected from another informant, states that the leading character of the story was a Bella Bella girl secluded at puberty, and that the dog visited her in her place of concealment in a corner of the house. She learnt her lover's identity by the device of paint and in time gave birth to five puppies, whereupon her father abandoned her. An old slave, alone, helped her by leaving a few glowing embers. The girl supported herself on clams which she dug at some distance from the house. During her absence her offspring became human children; when she discovered this she threw their discarded dog-skins into the fire. Then the one female puppy spoke, telling her eldest brother to become a house-builder; the second, a canoe-maker; the third, a hunter; and the fourth, a halibut-fisher. She, herself, then ran away and was never seen again.

This version describes how the dog-children exercised their respective abilities until their mother became wealthy, and how her former associates, seeing smoke arising from the deserted settlement, were curious. The friendly slave finally investigated, and was given the seal meat on which his child choked. Thus her father learnt of his daughter's prosperity, but he refused to allow his followers to join her, until driven to do so by famine. Then the Mother-of-Dogs received all of them hospitably except her own father.

Qwinas's REVENGE

Long, long ago, a few generations after the earth had first been settled, the principal Kimsquit chief was named Smaoan. He was very wealthy, largely on account of the sole possession of a suitable place for netting olachen. Becoming jealous of his good fortune, four brothers determined to murder Smaoan, and did so one day as the unsuspecting chief was, as usual, catching fish. He had only one child, an infant named Qwinas, who was now left destitute and poor. Sometimes he lived with his mother, and sometimes with a sister of his father, according to which of them was able to feed him; his clothing was rags, for they were all very poor. Meanwhile, the four wicked men were prospering. Every year they caught large quantities of olachen on the fishing ground which they had stolen from the murdered man.

The years passed until Qwinas grew into manhood. One spring he asked the four brothers for some olachen and they gave him some, which he gleefully carried home to his aunt. As she was cooking the fish he told her from whom he had obtained them.

"That is what killed your father," she said.

She then told her nephew for the first time the reason for his father's murder.

Qwinas felt very sad. The next morning at daybreak he washed in the river, and then set off into the mountains, ignorant of where he was going, but determined to obtain power and have his revenge. He travelled on aimlessly, day after day, until he heard voices which seemed like those of women at play. Going nearer, he saw that the speakers were really mountain goats, and when he drew still closer he saw that they were hermaphrodites, which explained their feminine voices. The animals greeted him in a friendly fashion but told him not to come where they were.

"We know what you want," they said. "You want to obtain supernatural strength from Grizzly Bear, but you are on the wrong track. Take that path over there, it is the road of the bears, and presently you will see where the road of the grizzlies diverges from that of the black bears. Follow the former until you come to a lake where you must hide. The bears will come to you before long."

The friendly goats had given to Qwinas their own marvellous ability to scale mountains and their own power of vision. Thanks to these gifts the young man was able to pick out and follow the bear road as it led over the rugged crests, and to distinguish where the black bear road diverged. As his guides had told him, he came to a pool and there hid himself, wondering the while for what purpose could be the bundles of thorny branches tied up like balls.

Presently a mother grizzly bear and three cubs appeared, doffed their bear-skins, and in the form of human beings dived into the pool. In their exuberance of spirits they threw heavy stones to and fro as if they had been pebbles. Qwinao watched for some time, then jumped forth from his hiding place and seized their animal cloaks. Dispossessed of their skins, wherein lay their power, the bears were helpless.

"Please give me some of your strength," said Qwinao to them.

"All right," replied the mother bear, "come in and swim with us."

Qwinao dived into the pool among the animals, swam around for a few minutes, and then returned to the shore.

"Come in again," said the bear.

Once more he dived in, and as before returned to the bank after a short swim. A third time the bear called him back into the water, and finally bade him come for a fourth dip. When he had returned to land for the fourth time she said to him:

"Now lift that stone."

The stone was one of the heavy boulders which the bears had been tossing to and fro like balls. Qwinao tried to lift it, but it was too heavy.

"The food that you have been eating has weakened you," said the bear. "You must get rid of it."

She held before him a circular wooden dish which appeared to Qwinao to have been produced from the air, and bade him vomit. He tried to eject the contents of his stomach but could only gulp. Then the bear patted him on the back so that he was able to void large quantities of water in which dog salmon had been soaked; to this miserable fare his poverty had reduced him. Now that he was free of this baneful food, Qwinao was in a position to derive benefit from the bears. Once more he swam in the pool while the mother bear scoured him with a bundle of thorny branches, as though it had been a sponge with which she was washing an infant. During the process Qwinao felt new vigour surging through him. Then the eldest of the cubs scrubbed him in the same manner, and Qwinao felt that he was becoming stronger. In turn the second, and then the youngest rubbed him, until he felt that he had the might of a grizzly bear. But when the mother bear told him to lift the stone he pretended to be unable to do so, in the hope of obtaining still greater strength from them. Puzzled, she came to shore, felt Qwinao all over, and concluded that he had acquired the vigour which she had aimed to impart to him. So she told him simply to come in and swim with them, and again dived back to resume her play with her cubs. After watching the four throwing the stones to and fro, Qwinao dived in, joined their sport, and threw the boulders even as far as they were able for he had acquired the power of a bear. The five left the pool together and when the animals had reassumed their form they gave Qwinao a bear blanket. On donning this he, too, became a grizzly bear. 539* 787*

"Now," said the mother bear, "you can go home and take revenge on the murderers of your father. Only remember, you must not do so, or show your strength, for one year. Your name is now Nänänllis [a word derived from nän-, a grizzly bear]. Henceforth I and my cubs will be your friends and will be at hand to help you if you ever need us."

The four bears accompanied Qwinao towards his home, all travelling rapidly in bear form. Near his aunt's house he took off his blanket and carefully hung it up in a secure place; this restored him to human form and he went home, while his bear friends went off into the woods. Qwinao thought that he had been absent only a single day, but when he came to the village he found that it was autumn, although the olachen had been running when he went away. This was because he had been in the land of supernatural beings where one day is the equivalent of a year among mortals. He went to his aunt's door in the twilight. The old woman, who had concluded that her nephew was long dead, was delighted at seeing him return not only alive but appearing strong and well. She had very little food but she gave him the best available.

Obedient to the instructions given him by the mother bear, Qwinao did not immediately take his revenge. All winter he remained almost secluded in his aunt's house, but when spring came and the olachen were running, he paddled down in a river canoe to his father's fishing-ground where the four murderers had built four olachen-traps with firm interwoven branches, capable of resisting any flood. In the canoe with Qwinao was a mere child to whom he had given the nominal place as captain in the stern, while he himself poled in the bow. He guided his canoe against one of the weirs which broke before the impact as if it had been made of twigs, then, in succession he destroyed the three others in like fashion. Next Qwinao began to make four olachen-weirs for himself. Under normal circumstances the construction of one is a long and laborious task, requiring the pounding in of heavy stakes with mallets, but Qwinao, endowed as he was with the strength of a grizzly bear, merely shoved in the posts without effort. As he was working, the four murderers came up, very angry at the destruction of their weirs. One of them struck a savage blow at the destroyer with a stake, but Qwinao merely caught it with one [226]

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*539 *787 hand, as if it had been a blow from a feather, and wrenched it from his opponent. Another of the brothers likewise struck at him with a pole, but again Qwinao seized it from his grasp. Then he stretched out one hand, caught the holder of the stick by the neck, and squeezed until the man's head parted from his body. In the same manner Qwinao killed two more of the brothers, allowing only one of them to escape. His bear friends had been in the vicinity, but help from them was not required.

Qwinao finished the construction of his olachen-weirs and then went back to his aunt's house. The brother who had escaped had already brought tidings of what had occurred, and the old woman, fearful of the consequences, angrily asked Qwinao why he had done such a thing. He quickly quieted her by reminding her that it was she who had led him to think of revenge by telling him of the reason of his father's murder.

Qwinao remained quietly at home for the rest of that summer and the ensuing winter, but early in the spring he began to build an enormous salmon-weir. The fame of his strength had spread far and near among the coastal people so that many of them came to assist him. The weir was rapidly finished and was a great success. With the wealth of salmon obtained, Qwinao was able to give numerous potlatches and took for himself the name Łäliäkdja. In course of time he married the daughter of ɯyuyuyuł.

Qwinao was a great inventor. The next winter he made a net for olachen, which he used with great success in the spring. It was the first time that this had ever been done and the pattern he used has since been copied by the Kimsquit people. The following winter his aunt, acting on his instructions, made the first small salmon-net. Not only are the invention of these two useful articles ascribed to Qwinao, but also the first use of the bow and arrow, as well as other valuable appliances. After a long life he died, but he is still remembered for his achievements.[14]

A NEGLECTED OPPORTUNITY

[828] A few Bella Coola believe that supernatural experiences of the foregoing type tend to occur in certain families, although not with sufficient frequency to be called an inheritable characteristic. A middle-aged man who held this belief gave the following account of a personal encounter.

His father had obtained power from a black bear, and once when hunting he himself saw a track of which three footprints were those of a bear, while the fourth was human. Realizing that he was close to the supernatural, he followed the track and after considerable trailing killed a black bear. Half an hour later, when he returned to the "dead" animal, after unsuccessfully stalking another, it spoke to him:

[424] [14]The above differs from the usual tales of this category in that the participants are well known. In consequence their descendants take a family pride in it and tend to add it to the ancestral myth of the first Smaoan, perhaps improperly. Probably it is a tale that members of a certain family have sought to ascribe to their own ancestors.

"Why do you hunt me?" it asked.

The hunter fled, not believing that he was sufficiently purified through the observance of ceremonial chastity to take advantage of what was being offered to him. As he hurried back to his gasoline launch he saw a large deer within easy range but refrained from shooting, for he knew it was the same creature which had first appeared to him as a bear. A seal was sleeping on the water beside his boat which he could have killed with a club, but again he refrained, believing it to be another manifestation of the same. If he had been brave enough he would have spoken to the bear and obtained from it power of some kind.

This differs somewhat from the usual type of story, probably because white influence had already affected the Bella Coola at the time of the event.

THE MAN WHO SLEW Ālquntäm'S SON

A Cape Mudge chief, armed with a good rifle, was hunting at Knight Inlet. He had climbed a mountain when, looking down, he saw coming up after him a strange, large beast with a big nose and black and white striped skin, in general characteristics something like a bear, yet obviously not one. It had been seen previously at Kingcome Inlet, so must have crossed the mountains. The chief, who had never seen anything like it, was amazed, and hesitated to fire. When the animal came near him it sniffed, then rushed at the man and seized his rifle, which it threw away down the mountain. The two wrestled and the man managed to shove the beast down the slope where his gun lay. He fell also, and, exerting his last ounce of strength, the hunter seized the rifle, pressed it against the animal and fired. It dropped dead. The hunter took the skin back to his village, where it caused much wonder and admiration.

Not long afterwards the man gave a potlatch at which each of his fellow chiefs hoped to be the recipient of the remarkable pelt. Before making his distribution of presents, the donor broke a valuable copper and placed a small piece of it on the fire, saying:

"The supreme god is above you all. I will make a present to him first."

This was the first time that the chiefs had seen this done, but they said nothing. The presents were distributed as usual, and someone was given the much coveted skin.

Some time afterwards, when this chief was hunting mallards with a shotgun, he saw a bear asleep with its head on a log, and fired at it from

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

*539 *787 point-blank range, apparently killing it. He had rolled the carcass over to the bank, preparatory to skinning it, when the second barrel accidentally exploded. The noise woke the "dead" bear, which grappled with the hunter and mauled him in spite of his cry: -

"I never hurt you."

The man finally escaped and made the best of his way back to the village in a badly wounded condition, dripping blood. Some boys saw him and rushed home, telling of the state in which the chief was returning. Suddenly a supernatural being appeared to him, saying:

"I am Ăłqunŭm's son whom you have twice slain while I was attending to my father's business. But he has been pleased at your gift of copper, so I will help you."

The supernatural stranger was none other than the cherished son of Ăłqunŭm, Sănollxmulelts Ăłqunŭm. It was he who had previously appeared, first as the strange creature, and then as a bear. He told the man to close his eyes, and, when he had done so, his wounds disappeared. Soon after the people, who had been summoned by the boys to help the hunter, met him returning and were amazed to find him unscarred.

THE MAN WHO WAS HELPED BY GRIZZLY BEAR

Once long ago, there was a poor man who had no friends. Nothing [262] that he attempted prospered, until finally he was reduced to drinking the water in which dog salmon had been steeped preparatory to boiling. One day when walking in the forest, he saw a man swimming in a lake. It was really Grizzly Bear which had stripped off its skin on the bank and had entered the water as a man to wash and amuse itself by throwing heavy stones back and forth.

"Please come in," said the swimmer to the poor man. "Take off your clothes and wash with me."

The man did so, and when he was in the lake the bear said to him:

"You have been doing wrong in drinking that foul dog salmon water. None of us supernatural ones like you to do so."

The bear massaged the stomach of the man and pressed his fingers into his mouth until he vomited. This he did four times, until the man was purged of all the salmon water. The bear strongly urged him never [262] to drink any more of it, and since that time men have obeyed the injunction, realizing that the supernatural ones do not like it. The poor man was then scrubbed with devil's club, brambles, spruce branches, and other thorny boughs which lacerated his flesh. Next, the bear threw one of the heavy stones across the lake, and told the man to toss it back. He tried and failed. Again the supernatural one washed him with the thorny branches, and again threw the stone. This time the man was able to hurl it back the full distance. 539* 787*

The washing had made him strong as a grizzly bear, lithe and handsome, and had also given him the ability to see supernatural beings when concealed from the eyes of ordinary mortals. This last accomplishment was due to his having been made so clean by the expulsion of all the filth from his body that the supernatural ones had no aversion to being seen by him. After the cleansing, the man returned to his village, where he soon entered into an argument with two of the people who had been unkind to him. They quarrelled and the man seized his enemies and pulled their arms from their bodies. The parents of the injured men were angry and wished to take revenge on the assailant, but were prevented by friends who pointed out that the punishment given to their sons was well warranted.

THE LAD WHO VISITED THE HOME OF THE FISH

Long, long ago, there lived a lad who was so poor that all he had for clothing was a rough goat-skin blanket. He was so miserable and friendless that he made up his mind to commit suicide. The ice was breaking in the Bella Coola River at the time, and large cakes were floating down to the sea. The lad leaped out upon one block, then sprang to another, and finally into a clear patch of water. Associates seeking to dissuade him had followed him from one cake of ice to another, but they drew back when he plunged into the cold water.

The youth was not drowned. He found a road under the water which led him to the land of the herring; then, still following the path, he passed in succession the countries of the olachen, the steel-head salmon, the spring salmon, the sockeye salmon, the hump-back salmon, the dog salmon, and lastly the cohoe. Each kind of fish dwelt in its own country, the cohoe salmon, being the last to reach the Bella Coola River, living at the greatest distance from it. Not long after his arrival in the land of the fish, the salmon boat, Nooḱynum, left for Bella Coola and on it the youth returned home. Owing to this experience he became in time both wealthy and famous.

THE SUCCESSFUL SEALER

Long, long ago, a man living at Sinxl failed to display the generosity expected of him as a chief. He showed no initiative or pride, accepting what was given him without demur, and doing nothing to uphold the dignity of his ancestral home. Whenever a feast was given, this man's share was thrown down so clumsily before him that he was spattered with the food, but he was too lethargic even to show resentment. His four 539* 787* 556

*539 sons, of whom the eldest was about sixteen, though old enough to appre-
*787 ciate the slights put upon their father, could do nothing to defend him.

On a winter day one of these lads felt impelled to follow a trail down [556] the north side of the Bella Coola valley along the edge of salt water. The weather had been cold for some time, but on this day it was so warm that he lay down to doze on the warm rocks. Near his head was a small opening which connected with a long passage to the ocean, and through this he presently heard the hoarse breathing of sleeping seals. His hunting desires aroused, he went to the edge of the steep crag overlooking the sea and dived in. He bravely penetrated into a narrow passage which led him under the rocks, until with his last gasp he emerged into a cave where there were countless seals. Waiting only a moment, and without disturbing the animals, he dived back through the passage safely.

When he reached home the lad said nothing about what he had seen, [411] but that evening he began to make a seal-spear of the usual type with a wooden handle and a bone point. He asked his father to help him with this carpentry task, and his mother to make a rope for the harpoon-head. Though surprised at their son's energy, the parents did as he requested, but the fellow-villagers mocked at his efforts, for the lad was no hunter.

Next morning he asked his father to accompany him, and the two set off in a canoe, carrying the spear which had been made the previous evening. Before starting, the lad requested one of his brothers to have a fire ready for cooking the spoil that night. Father and son paddled to the entrance of the subterranean passage, though the old man was, of course, ignorant of its existence. The son told him to wait, and dived overboard, armed only with a club, for the seal-spear had really been unnecessary. He penetrated through the passage and at once killed a seal pup, born that year, with which he returned to the canoe. The lad explained nothing to his father, so that it seemed to the latter as if his son had dived down into the depths and there slain a seal, after remaining below for an amazingly long time.

When the two returned to the village they were greeted with a shriek of laughter at the small size of their quarry. In derision, the villagers took the pup from them and threw it from hand to hand, as if it had been a ball.

As already described, it is customary whenever a man kills a deer, a [224] mountain goat, several seals, or any other large game, for him to invite [225] his fellows to a feast. The number of guests depends on the size of the [574] quarry, but in all cases the chiefs are the first to be invited and anyone [556] who fails to do so is laughed at for his stinginess. On this occasion the seal-pup was obviously so small that any general invitation to partake of it was ludicrous. Nevertheless, the lad sent a herald to invite not only

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

the people of his own village but those of two neighbouring towns. All accepted, as is customary, irrespective of the amount of food. The carcass was cut up and the guests received such minute portions that they became wildly hilarious over the meagre fare provided and flung many insulting remarks at their host. This was what the lad had planned. Confident of his ability to establish his good name, he desired to make his resurgence more striking by first emphasizing his degradation. 539* 787* 556

Next day the father and son again went hunting, and this time the lad killed a seal of slightly larger size. Once more he called in his neighbours and again they made sarcastic remarks about his poverty. The succeeding day he killed one large seal, and summoned the people. Next day he slew two seals; the next, four; then eight, sixteen, and thirty-two on successive days. Each evening a feast was held and the booty distributed. By this time contempt and scorn had been replaced by respectful wonder, and when the hunter returned with his canoe filled with seals everyone was able to eat to repletion. There was a surfeit of the highly esteemed flesh.

The next day the lad brought back his canoe filled with seals, and the same night the people gathered for the usual feast. Now was the time for which the youth had been waiting. When the carcasses had been cut up and cooked, ready for distribution, he made a speech, reminding those present of the manner in which his parents had been "dirtied," by food thrown at them during feasts, and how they had never actively resented it. Then he intimated that he was about to retaliate. Starting with the chiefs at the upper end of the house, he threw pieces of cooked seal at his guests, nor did he desist until the faces and chests of all had been well spattered with the grease. The people, realizing that it was their own rudeness which was being returned to them, could not defend themselves.

The successful sealer had had a second quantity of seal meat cooked in readiness, which he now distributed to his ruffled guests in a gracious manner. In this way he was able to refurbish the prestige of his family. By his lavish donations of seal meat on many occasions, he gained a reputation for generosity which was envied by all.[16]

Stories Illustrating Supernatural Good Luck 539* 787* 777

THE Mätsqus

Not many years ago two men were canoeing up the Kimsquit River. As one of them pressed down with his pole he saw that it had grazed a [16] It is not clear whether or not this story should, strictly speaking, be included in this category. Such a sudden stroke of fortune is termed a nuq̓ˈanuikim. It seemed as if the seals themselves had given their lives to this lad in his misfortune.

mätsqus lying on the stones at the bottom of the river. Realizing his danger, he swiftly hurled the pole on to the shore beneath a huge cedar where no rain could penetrate. Here it remained for twenty or thirty years until it had become covered with moss.

One day two sisters chanced to pass that way and the younger wished to gather some of the moss, but the elder, who apparently surmised with what the pole had been in contact, was afraid and tried to dissuade her. The heedless girl picked some of the moss, and threw it towards her elder sister, saying:

"Pshaw! It is nothing."

The moss struck her, and the older girl, now thoroughly frightened, was determined that if any ill results were to follow, her younger sister should likewise suffer from them. So she, too, gathered some of the moss and threw it on the first picker. Nothing happened until they had gone home and drawn near to the fire when both began to swell. They told what had befallen them, but it was too late to apply any remedy and both continued to expand until their stomachs burst and they died.[17]

THE Mätsqus THAT WAS CAUGHT IN A NET

Between 1860 and 1870, a young man, related to the Bella Coola from whom this account was obtained, was netting salmon near Tcimotl. He had caught all that he needed but decided to make one more haul. As he did so, he saw in the water a giant toad with enormous shining eyes and white feet. It was a mätsqus. The beast entered the net which sank under its weight. The terrified fisherman plucked up enough courage to haul in his net, and found that the toad had turned to a stone, the surface of which was smeared with grease. He placed it on top of his salmon and went home to summon the people of his own and neighbouring villages to view the wonder. There were ancient traditions about such beasts having been caught in nets, but this was the first time that such a marvel had ever been seen by any of the eager crowd that thronged the bank. A very old man, well-informed in such matters, now appeared and warned the people to keep away from the space between the stone and the river. No sooner had they obeyed than the whole bank caved in, carrying into the water, canoes, the pile of freshly landed salmon, and the mysterious stone. The old man had heard of a similar occurrence, and his knowledge saved the lives of the onlookers.

[753] [755]

[17]The usual explanation given for the bursting of the stomach is that some of the fire from the monster has entered the victim's body, and there increased on coming close to a blaze. A remedy in the early stages of swelling is said to be the eating of an uncooked mallard duck.

The fisherman did not obtain supernatural good fortune as a result of his capture, because he neither retained the object nor kept silent about what he had seen.

THE MAN WHO ACCIDENTALLY KILLED A Mätsqus

In the village of Ṭsulkt there lived an old man and an old woman with four grown-up sons. Early one morning the eldest of these saw a merganser below the dam at the village and decided to spear it. Armed with a new, sharp-pointed canoe pole he had crept out on the fish-trap, when, not far from it, he saw a toad about the size of a beaver sitting upon the water. He had heard of the power of such beasts, but was ignorant of the proper procedure for obtaining it, so thought he would try the effect of rubbing the end of his pole across its back. But when he thrust it out with this intention, the staff jumped from his hand and pierced the toad's body, so that it died. This power of attracting objects to itself was one of the animal's attributes of which the man was not aware. He pulled it ashore with a stick and roused his household, crying:

"Get up! Get up! See what I have slain. I did not intend to kill it but the pole sprang away from me."

Everyone rushed to the bank, and when they saw what was there they exclaimed:

"Why did you do such a thing when there was no one near to advise you?"

One man recommended him to go to an old man named Sla· who lived at the village of Sno'oniqwly. It was said that this man understood how to deal with such matters.

This seemed good advice, so the four brothers went off to conult Sla·, saying to him:

"We have come on very important business."

Sla· cut short their speech by replying:

"I know all about it. You have had power come to you. Have you four wolves?"

"No," replied the brothers, and Sla· continued:

"I have two on this side of the river, and two on the opposite shore. Unless we can fix this up satisfactorily you will die, but if we succeed in doing it correctly you will become wealthy."

The brothers accompanied Sla· up the slope of a mountain where he had two wolf heads concealed in a box. They took these and went with him to another box concealed on a mountain on the other side of the river where there were two more. Sla· took the four heads and escorted the brothers back to their village, stopping only to gather some wild gooseberry branches. On these he laid the mätsqus, for, of course, it was no toad, with its head to the east, and told all the spectators to stand in front of it, while he seated himself to the westward. Apparently, Sla· intended to dismember the creature, and the people wondered how he would do it, because they saw no cutting tool. However, when ready he reached behind him and took a leaf with sharp edges. It was a salal leaf which seemed to have come there for his purpose. With this he cut the mätsqus into four longitudinal sections, starting each from the mouth. He measured these pieces and instructed a carpenter to make immediately four boxes to fit the sections, with a small hole in one of the lower corners of each. When these were ready, he placed in each one of the strips of flesh and one of the wolf heads. He then told the brothers to put two of the boxes on a mountain to the right of the river, the other two on one to the left, placing each so that the corner with the hole in it should be at the south-west, where no water could enter. Then Sla· went home.

This treatment brought wealth to the brothers. First the eldest began to prosper, and within a year gave four potlatches. After that he began to have pains in his side; his skin wore away and he died. This was because water had penetrated the box designated as his.

Then wealth began to flow in upon the second brother without effort on his part. He too gave four potlatches within a single year, but the water penetrated his box and he also died, after suffering similar pains in his side. The third and the fourth brothers experienced precisely the same fate; each became wealthy after his senior's death, and each died when, after giving four potlatches, the water entered his box.

THE MAN WHO HOOKED A Mätsqus

Within the lifetime of an old Bella Coola, Stsots, a Tăl·io man, and Pipotla, a Bella Coola who had a reputation for making evil medicines, were out fishing together for halibut. Pipotla hooked something which he tried to haul in, but it was so heavy that he was making slow progress when suddenly a mass of water rushed from his body, by which sign he knew that it was a mätsqus. He continued to haul in his line until the creature came in sight. It resembled a toad, but was large as a bear and had in its throat a burning fire. Such beasts had been found before on several occasions, and in their stomachs had always been valuable stones.

As the mätsqus came near the surface the canoe began to spin round as if caught in a whirlpool. Pipotla, terrified, let out his line, not daring to try to haul in the animal, but presently the hooked mätsqus rose voluntarily to the surface and Stsots said to his companion:

"Don't drop your line; it has come for me."

"All right, take it," Pipotla replied.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

He passed his line to the speaker without ever glancing behind him. The two men paddled slowly to the shore, towing the mätsqus astern, its goggle eyes blinking, but when they reached the beach it jumped violently above the water and fell back with a splash that drenched Staots. The hook pulled out and the animal escaped. 539* 787* 777

Piqotla understood what must be done under the circumstances. He went home but without pausing there walked on into the forest, taking care not to look back. When he came to a rotten log he dug under it until he had collected and eaten four white slugs with black and white faces. He covered up the hole he had made, then continued his journey till he came to another log from which he likewise dug four and devoured them. He concealed the traces of his digging and went on to a third, thence to a fourth, in each case eating four slugs and covering the hole. Had he not thus concealed his work, his anus would have rotted away.

Piqotla remained for four days in the woods, constantly using his magical brews, and in that way escaped evil effects. But the unfortunate Staots went to his home, told all his neighbours about what he had seen, and sat down beside the fire. Presently his stomach burst and he fell dead. When four days had elapsed, Piqotla returned to the village, carefully avoiding the road, for if he had travelled on that he would have died. Everybody told him of the death of his companion, which he explained by saying that Staots must have been ignorant of the proper method of dealing with a mätsqus. If he had known that, he, Piqotla, would never have passed the line to his friend, whom he imagined would not have asked for it had he been unaware of how to deal with the beast.

THE TRAPPING OF A Mätsqus

About 1880 a celebrated chief named Sunnälotla set his traps for beaver in Lake Kisik. He had barely left them when, to his surprise, because it was daylight, he heard a splash and a struggle and turned back to find a beaver caught in his trap. He clubbed the animal, skinned it, and again set out for home. He had gone scarcely twenty yards when he again heard a tumult, and returned to find another beaver in his trap. This one he also clubbed and skinned, and again left the place. A third time a beaver entered his trap as soon as he left it, and he dealt with this in the same fashion, as well as with a fourth which appeared. By this time he realized that there was something uncanny about the occurrences, and, therefore, declined to turn back for a fifth which he heard splashing in his trap as soon as he had moved away after skinning the fourth. That night Sunnälotla and his children ate the game.

Next morning when he returned to the lake wherein his traps were set he found it in a turmoil. Waves were raging on it as if it were the ocean, although there was no wind. He was thirsty and bent down to scoop up a little water in his hands, which he drank. Then he made a small raft on which to go out to the trap where he had caught the four beaver the preceding day. In it he saw a mätqus, like a toad but big as a bear, and with a throat that glowed with fire. Sinxälotla made all speed back to the bank, but fell in a faint as he reached it, with his head barely out of the water. He lay there all day, but towards dusk recovered sufficiently to stagger away. He rocked and reeled as if he were drunk, but kept in mind what he had been told by the old people about avoiding the trail. Near home he shouted for Nulesdaxw', an old man well versed in such matters, and when the latter came to him Sinxälotla said:

"I have seen what you told me about."

Nulesdaxw' took hammer and wedges and led the way to a pine sapling which he split vertically, so that Sinxälotla could pass through it. The sufferer followed the old man to three other trees which he wedged apart in like fashion, and through which Sinxälotla passed. Then Nulesdaxw' bade him build a small shelter with a platform where Sinxälotla stayed for four days, while Nulesdaxw' fumigated him in the smoke of a fire made of four thorny medicinal plants.

For two whole years Sinxälotla remained in this rude shelter, unable to move more than a few steps on account of the sickness which had entered his body with the water he had drunk. At the end of that time he was able to move around with a stick, and ultimately he recovered.

Sinxälotla failed to derive any benefit from the sight of a mätqus, because he had been afraid to take advantage of it. A brave man, strengthened by the observance of ceremonial chastity, would have touched the creature's back with the end of his pole, would have hidden this carefully, and in one year he would have begun to show remarkable success as a hunter. Sinxälotla escaped from death because he had avoided walking along a road traversed by unclean women; if he had done so while he had within him some of the mysterious power of the great toad, imbibed in drinking from the lake, he would have perished. The cure practised in this case was peculiar, since usually the approach of a patient to a fire causes his stomach to burst.

THE MAN WHO ATE A Sisiutl

Four brothers were hunting mountain goats when they came to a place, Niniläuk, where the animals congregated for mating. At one edge of a level stretch the ground fell away, sheer as a precipice, and the oldest brother conceived the brilliant idea of spreading near the brink of this drop a number of slippery, outside planks of cedar. These they laid with the rounded side on the ground, so that they would tip when a goat stepped on them and throw the animal to the ground far below. They covered the planks with moss, to disguise the trap, and then awaited results. It was mating time and when a she-goat slipped and fell over, all the males, thinking she had jumped down to elude them, leapt off in pursuit and were killed also. This method of hunting proved so successful that with the valuable wool obtained the four brothers were able to give many potlatches and became chiefs. During the summer they carefully concealed the slippery boards, fearing that someone might see them and copy the ruse.

Not long after they had thus become wealthy the four brothers chanced to be hunting on the distant side of the mountain, where there were a number of small streams flowing into a lake with no outlet to the sea. The eldest was some distance from the others when they saw some spring salmon in one of the rivulets. The second brother touched one of these fish on the neck with his hunting stick, and at once it jumped on the land and flopped about, shedding its scales. In spite of the unusual behaviour of the salmon, combined with its presence in an inland stream, the three hunters were not suspicious, so they killed and cooked it. As the fish was roasting before the fire the eldest brother returned and, noticing that its flesh was still quivering, burst out in wrath:

"What do you mean by killing a salmon in a place like this? Where could the fish have come from? Don't you remember what our father has told us so often? It must be a naiaf which you have killed and soon you will die."

"You are always afraid of something," said the second brother, laughing. "It is just an ordinary spring salmon, and as I am hungry I am going to eat it."

The third brother agreed with the second and the two devoured the fish, but the youngest heeded the advice of the eldest and would not touch it. Soon after eating, the stomachs of the two rash men split. As they lay dying the eldest said to them:

"It is your own fault. I warned you, but you have always been too hot-headed."

The erring ones agreed before they died. The eldest and youngest brothers went home, where their father was grief-stricken when they told him of the deaths of his other two sons.

Such deaths resulting from the eating of a naiaf are not uncommon. A man will sometimes find in the forest dried slices of sockeye salmon, or the heads of spring salmon, which are in reality naiaf that have assumed this form, and if the finder eats them he will die. A few years ago a

Bella Bella man was fishing when a salmon jumped into his canoe and died at once, without the usual flopping and struggling. The fisherman took it home and ate it, though his wife refused to touch it, as being uncanny. Presently the man's lower jaw became diseased and he lost his teeth. The salmon must have been a sutaif.[14]

The mere sight of a sutaif does not bring the misfortune which follows the killing of one by fruitless means. On the other hand, if slain in the proper manner great good fortune will result. One method is to put a stick near it in the water, whereupon the fish will jump ashore and flop around, shedding its scales. The hunter should then kill it and, crouching down, say:

"I wish I had a salalberry leaf, or a piece of dead alder."[15]

Both of these have sharp-cutting edges. If he then puts his right hand behind him, whichever he has asked for will be there, though no one knows how it comes. Then he must cut the fish lengthwise into two parts, throw away the right half and the head, wrap the left in his cape, and run from the spot, taking care to go neither up nor down hill. Behind a landslide will take place, sweeping away the ground on which he has stood, even though it be level. He must hide the half sutaif in a hole in a cedar tree for one year without saying anything about his treasure. During this period he must not hunt or embark on any other important enterprise.

When the year has elapsed he may tell the people of his experience and sell tiny fragments of the sutaif for large sums. The purchasers wrap these fragments in cedar-bark and with them dead fish-weirs and traps, thus attracting animals and fish. A man obtaining a sutaif in this way can show his children where it is concealed, and so transmit his power to them.

THE CATCHING OF A SUTAIF

Not many years ago, a certain Ooladz-i constructed an ocean salmon-trap below Kimsquit. One moonlight night he saw in it a white, gleaming salmon and at once jumped to the conclusion that it was a sutaif. Being a wild, reckless fellow, he determined to try to obtain supernatural good fortune from his prey, though he was ignorant of the proper procedure. Waiting until the receding tide had almost laid bare the floor of his pen, he leapt down from the weir and clubbed the salmon to death, heedless of the scales which it was shedding in all directions. Then Ooladz-i cut it [14] It appears that the fisherman was a victim of pyorrhea, in consequence of which his teeth were extracted by a dentist, but the patient is convinced that his misfortunes are due to the salmon which entered his canoe.

[164

[15] The left of anything is said to be more valuable than the right because when a man dresses it is the left side which is nearer the sun.

into strips, using his ordinary knife, and returned home, where he sat down near some women and close to the fire. Before long he began to feel ill; his stomach grew larger and larger, and finally split in various places so that the raw flesh could be seen. No shaman could help him and within a year he was dead. 539* 787* 777

Stories Illustrating Shamanism

THE FORTUNES OF Xnw-a

Xnw-a was a blind man about thirty years old who lived with his wife at the head of Rivers Inlet. Before he had lost his sight he had been a successful hunter, but now he could no longer provide for her and they were often on the verge of starvation. One autumn the two had gone some little distance from the village to a small creek in which the woman was fishing with a gaff for the dying salmon that had spawned and were too listless to escape. As Xnw-a sat beside her, his wife saw a large black bear on the other side of the creek, coming down to the water to fish. She told her husband, who bade her fetch his bow and arrow. When she had brought them, wondering what he intended to do, he told her to point the arrow at the bear; he was going to shoot. She obeyed; as Xnw-a felt the taut bow-string beneath his fingers he almost forgot that he was blind; the zest of the hunter had returned to him. He loosed the arrow; it struck the bear, killing it instantly, without a sound, but his wife lied, telling him that he had missed it, and mocking him for his failure, with the intention of securing all the meat for herself. As soon as an opportunity presented itself she slipped away, skinned the animal, and soon had the flesh sizzling before the fire. 539* 787* 756*

Xnw-a smelt the cooking.

"I smell fresh killed meat," he said.

"You doit," his wife replied. "What are you talking about? You can't shoot."

When the woman again moved away to superintend her cooking, a supernatural being, who had seen Xnw-a's misfortunes, took pity on him and rubbed his hands over his eyes, restoring their sight. As he gazed around, amazed at his good fortune, he saw his wife bending over a box in which bear meat was boiling, greedily eating the grease which she skimmed from the surface of the water. He was so angry at her meanness that he crept up behind her, noiselessly, and thrust her head down into the boiling liquid where he held her until she ceased to struggle. She was dead. Then Xnw-a tore her clothing, her flesh, even her bones, into small fragments which he scattered to the winds in all directions.

"From this time forth," he said, "you will appear to humans only as Lynx."

Owing to the power which Ḵwaw-a had obtained his words came true; each fragment became a lynx, and the animals so created were the progenitors of all lynxes.

After killing his wife, Ḵwaw-a went to live in a village near the mouth of Rivers Inlet where he promptly married a very beautiful woman. She had three brothers with whom Ḵwaw-a used to go hunting with great success. One day one of them suggested that they go to Ḵwakuir Island for sea-lions which were plentiful there. The four set out together but, although all hunted, Ḵwaw-a alone was fortunate. This continued success aroused both the shame and the jealousy of his brothers-in-law so that they determined to maroon him on the island in hope that he would soon perish. They waited until Ḵwaw-a had killed so many sea-lions that the canoe was filled with their meat; then they pushed off suddenly when he was some distance away inland. The youngest of the three brothers, a mere lad, took no part in this scheme, in fact he was bitterly opposed to it, and could only show his sympathy by knotting his cedar-bark cape into a bundle and throwing it ashore so that Ḵwaw-a would have at least that much protection.

When Ḵwaw-a saw the canoe drawing away from the land he came hurrying up, but the paddlers did not stop in answer to his calls. Then he realized that he was abandoned by his false comrades and sat down to weep, wrapped in the cape which his youngest brother-in-law had thrown him. For a long time he sat crying on the beach. Then he walked a little distance inland to a place where there were some large flat stones, against one of which he rested his head and cried again. He was very disconsolate. All night he wept, so miserable that he could not sleep. The next night as he lay sobbing with eyes closed he felt someone kick his foot, and heard a woman's voice.

"Come, get up," it said. "Come to our chief's house, he wants to see you."

When Ḵwaw-a opened his eyes there was no one in sight. He lay awake for a long time, greatly puzzled, but at last began to cry once more and finally fell into a broken slumber. Again he was aroused by the kick against his leg, again he heard the same voice, repeating the same message, but as before no one was in sight when he moved. Determined to solve the mystery, he made a small hole in his cape and once more lay down, pretending to be asleep. Presently he saw a pretty girl approaching. He had deceived her by peeking through the aperture. Ḵwaw-a did not move to frighten her.

"I see you," he called out from beneath his cape, "don't run away." 534*

The girl did not vanish, but repeated her invitation. Ewe-o got up 787* and followed his strange guide, who pushed against the stone which he 756* had been using as a support for his back and head. It reversed, revealing a house, with a chief sitting behind the fire. It was the home of the sea-lions.
The chief gave Ewe-o a seat and invited him to sit down. He did so, with his legs bent at the knees so that they almost reached his chin.
Ewe-o could see no one except the chief and his guide, but he could feel people passing and repassing beneath and over his folded legs, as if they did not need the support of the ground to walk on. He could hear the comments of those who were moving around:

"How very strange! He is full of holes."

This referred to the space between the lower side of his knees and the floor.

The sea-lion chief, whose name was Akokiw, planned to send Ewe-o home. He suggested borrowing gull's canoe, by which was meant the frame and personality of a gull, for this purpose.

"Don't do that," cried the sea-lion women, "it is so good, for its bow, the bird's beak, is always dipping down.* Lend him yours."

Akokiw then lent Ewe-o his own canoe, a sea-lion's stomach. When Ewe-o had crawled within, Akokiw inflated the craft by blowing into it, and then tied it securely so that no water could enter.

"If you strike a stone," he told Ewe-o, "just wriggle a little so that the canoe can clear the obstruction, then it will go on. When you reach the mainland you will be able to tell that you are there by the immense bumping; your wriggling will be able to send the craft only a few inches at a time, and you will feel that you are against a solid, but shelving beach.
Then it will be time to get out."

With these instructions Ewe-o set off, the canoe travelling without visible motive power. Once he struck a stone on the bottom, but when he wriggled slightly the craft cleared off and moved on once more. Finally, he came to a place where he felt immense bumping and concluded it was the shore. Cautiously carrying the rock of his canoe he saw the sun, then opened it further and found that he was near the beach of his wife's village. He went ashore and slew his two brothers-in-law who had tried to murder him.

Ewe-o was able to make this strange voyage because Sea-Lion had made him a shaman.

THE LAD WHO WAS MADE A SHAMAN BY THE SALMON

Once upon a time a lad named Awalaklim suggested to a number of his friends that they come and play with him on the river where the spring freshets were carrying away the ice. The youths played happily, jumping from block to block, but Awalaklim excelled them all, as he had made for himself a basket stick with which he was able to leap easily from one distant cake to another. All went well until he leaps to a large chunk of ice from which he could not return to shore, and on this he was carried out to sea. He sat down, pondering on his fate, until he was transported across the ocean to the land of salmon. There he found himself before a large village in which a number of people were living and working; these were salmon. Awalaklim landed, and, being hungry, made his way to the house of the chief who told him to take a young boy and a young girl and throw into the water, first the boy and then the girl. This Awalaklim did. As soon as the boy touched the water he changed to a salmon, jumped above the surface four times, and swam back as a fish to the shore so that the thrower could lift him from the water with his hands. When he threw in the little girl exactly the same thing happened. Following the instructions of the salmon chief, Awalaklim cooked the male salmon without cutting off either the head or the tail. After eating the fish he threw all the bones back into the water, where they at once assembled to form a live salmon which jumped four times, then became a boy once more and swam back to the beach. In like manner he cooked the female salmon, ate as much as he desired and threw the bones into the water, where they formed a salmon which jumped four times and swam back to the shore as a girl; but when she landed Awalaklim discovered that she was blind in one eye. He searched where he had been eating and found a morsel of the white of the salmon's eye which had fallen to the ground and been overlooked with the other debris. He took this and threw it back with the girl into the water. Then she returned to the shore with both eyes normal.

The salmon chief told Awalaklim that he desired to visit the Bella Coola River, since only coarse-haired salmon frequented it at that time, and they were bad because they shed their scales in the ocean. Awalaklim approved strongly of the project. They prepared canoes, one for each kind of fish, and set off in order of their proper arrival in the spring. The spring salmon led, carrying in his canoe Awalaklim, who had become a fish for the occasion. In due course they reached the Bella Coola River where Awalaklim's father, Xwaylima, was on guard on his rain. He saw a very large, fine salmon dart near his bank and wished that he could catch it; in fact he told his neighbors how beautiful and peculiar it was, not knowing of course, that it was his own son. Then day Awalaklim did sun over his father's fish-trap, but he did so the next and allowed himself to be caught, much to the fisherman's delight. Swaladlim used some of his power to guide his father's thoughts; in consequence, instead of cutting off the head, he carried the whole fish gently to shore by a loop, and then took it home. Xaqalmat, on entering the house, called out to his eldest son:

"I have caught the salmon I spoke about yesterday, it is a beauty."

His son went out to see the wonderful catch and cried out in wonder: "Why, it is my younger brother."

Swaladlim had again assumed human form. All the people of the village came rushing up to see the returned youth and were amazed on learning that he had come back as a salmon. Swaladlim directed them to make clean the house and he was carried in where this was done. He walked four times around the fire and thereby regained his strength.

Swaladlim had now become a shaman. He carried a stick with which he had only to go through the motions of casting at anything, and the creature at which it was pointed fell dead. Accompanied by his brother, the shaman set out to have vengeance. He killed so many by means of his supernatural power that the shelter in which they were staying was soon filled with feathers. Then Swaladlim, saying that he desired to go aloft, told his brother to lean with a stick on the feathers and continue doing so until he, the shaman, had disappeared from sight. As the lad started leaning, Swaladlim became lighter and lighter until finally he drifted up above. He had told his brother not to be frightened because he would return in a day, but he did not do so; in fact it was a year before he came back to earth, a single day in the land of the supernatural. When the year had elapsed, there was a thud on the roof and in came the shaman who took a bear's robe and disrobed. During his absence he had obtained help from the supernatural beings which made him even more powerful than he had been before. When he sang a song telling of his experiences, Xaqalmat stood up and asked a chief to give Swaladlim one of his daughters as wife.* The one thus requested told the shaman to choose whichever of his three daughters he desired. He chose one of them and they were married. Soon after this, he took a number of young men with him to the mountains to have mountain goats. Through his magical power, the shaman soon killed six, which the young men carried to the village as a present to his wife's parents and a little later he gave them a goat-skin blanket. Starving was so easy for Swaladlim that he killed and gave meat to anyone who asked him to do so; in due course he became a wealthy chief.

THE LAD WHO WAS HELPED BY A SALMON

Long ago there lived in a place called Ne-mu, twelve miles below Snuc, a poor orphan boy who was cared for by some charitable people. One day several sons of chiefs were playing near a waterfall in a neighboring creek and cruelly threw their playmate over the brink so that he was swept down into the rapids of the main river. The youths made no effort to conceal what they had done, and their parents did not even upbraid them, since their victim was of no importance.

Instead of being drowned, the boy fell down through the falls under the whirl of the rapids as if he had passed through a tunnel into a new land. A coho salmon had taken pity on him and so preserved him. The fish told the boy to gather splinters from firewood and touch with one of them the big toe of each of the youths who had thrown him in. He further told his guest to take his own name, Wai-i, Coho Salmon, and wish in the perspective of a hunter down.

After four days the salmon took the boy back to his home, and in spite of his long immersion he was not even wet.

Eager to try his shaman's power, for that was what he had received from the salmon, the lad gathered splinters unnoticed; the people saw him but did not understand his purpose. That night he went to one house, and with a sliver touched the big toe of each of those who had tried to murder him, and of those who had condemned the offender; each touched a splinter and died. The next night he dealt with those living in the next house, and so on, until all his enemies had been killed. Obeying the salmon, he was careful only to slay those who had taken part in the action against him. In later years he received visions and became a noted shaman.

THE MAN WHO WAS HELPED BY A RAVEN

Some two hundred years ago there was a sickness that attacked only the chiefs; no one knows what it was, but the old people said it resembled the smallpox, which later visited Bella Coola.

At that time a certain man was very sick and ready to die. Weary of life he went off and lay down in the forest on the south side of North Bentinck Arm, not far from its head.

A raven came to him and picked out one of his eyes, saying as he did so:

"Get up! Get up! You are all right now, take the name Qwaqwa-dzemas."

This means, "Restored to Life through the Raven."

The man returned to his village a successful shaman, and gave a shaman's dance in the usual manner, but thereafterwards he had only one eye.

A BELLA BELLA SHAMAN

539
756

A certain Bella Bella man frequently had visions and other unusual experiences, as a result of which it was assumed, both by himself and by his friends, that in time he would become a shaman. Once, when on a visit to Victoria, this young man got drunk and, with three companions who were brothers, took a short cut across a bridge to the house where he was staying. His comrades, jealous of his growing power, had decided to kill him; they threw him off the bridge, but he fell through the water and lay on the mud at the bottom, realizing his position but unable to rise. He heard a humming that seemed to descend in a spiral course until it struck the water. This sound, made by a supernatural being, drew him to the surface and then to the bank whence he had come. The man continued his way alone, feeling that he had now become a shaman. He went to the house of a married friend and asked his wife for a new blanket, giving her no explanation. The request was because he had been raised from the dead.* Telling his host that he would be absent for several days, the man took the blanket and went to the outskirts of the town, where he made a rude bed for himself in a thicket among the refuse heaps. For three days and three nights he lay there without eating. The supernatural being with whom he had been in contact caused his stomach to swell until it became so enlarged that he gasped from the weight of it, and finally, as he lent forward, he vomited a prodigious number of snakes, toads, and sea-eggs. This happened on the fourth day. Then he returned to his friend's house and gave back the borrowed blanket.

The man to whom these experiences had come was very angry at his attempted murderers, and decided to show his power by killing their father instead of themselves. Next day he left for Bella Bella on the steamer. At the time there was no wharf, so he was able to land secretly in a canoe and go by night to the house of his intended victim, the unsuspecting father. Climbing to the roof, the shaman was able to look down through the smoke-vent at the man whose doom he was plotting. He threw his stick, wherein lay his power, and struck the old man dead. His work accomplished, the stick jumped back to its owner, leaving no trace of a wound on the body. The shaman threw it away to prove that the power which had been in it had returned to himself, and that consequently the object was of no value. He demonstrated his power on many occasions, and for years was the most famous shaman in Bella Bella.

*The informant could add nothing more to this bare statement.

When this shaman reached middle age he was eclipsed for a time by a brilliant young practitioner. The latter made a striking exhibition of his power by giving a dance during which he rushed from the house and walked out on the water. Standing at some distance from the shore, he made motions with his feet as if he were scraping a hole in soft earth, and slowly sank under the surface as he "dug" downwards until he disappeared from sight. The people continued to watch, and after several hours his head appeared at the spot where it had vanished. He lifted himself from beneath the water, as if he were elbowing his way up through soft earth, until he stood on the surface where he shook himself, scattering immense quantities of dry eagle down until it lay thick over the whole vicinity. He had worn some when he went below the water, but that quantity was negligible in comparison with the amount, all dry, which he brought with him from below. Then the new shaman returned to the house and continued his dance, while the older, who had been thrown off the bridge in Victoria, admitted that he was outdone by this upstart.

Not long afterwards a steamer arrived at Bella Bella carrying a man sick with smallpox, the first case known there. Large presents were offered to the young shaman if he would cure the sufferer. He undertook the task, and treated the patient during the night, but the man died before dawn. This was a terrible blow to the shaman's prestige, so he called in the people and made a speech.

"You have seen my powers," he said. "Why do you doubt me even after this failure?"

Then he committed suicide by shooting himself with a musket.*

THE YOUTH WHOM Sā·lma BEFRIENDED

A long time ago, a poor orphan was living in a village where there dwelt a man who had a great affection for him, and who used to help him in every possible way. The man was a shaman, and the boy secretly practised earnestly in hope of obtaining the same power. This necessitated long absences from the village, but though these greatly puzzled his bosom companion, the son of a chief, the would-be shaman never told him of his ambition.

At this time the son of an important chief in a neighbouring village died, and all prepared to go to the funeral. The poor boy now confided to his friend what he had been doing, saying, moreover, that he had acquired power and might be able to restore the dead. The two went to the dead man's house, where the coffin was lying near the hole in the floor, ready for removal to the grave. The lad had happened to meet the supernatural being Sä·lma in the forest, and from him had obtained shaman's power. Sä·lma usually is malevolent, but even this was not the only occasion on which he showed kindness. The shaman alone could see this supernatural being seated, as is his wont, upon the coffin. He bade his friend enter the house and ask the people to make an aisle for him. This he did, explaining the reason. He added that though he had known the poor boy for years there were periods for which he could not account, and that his friend now claimed to have gained power to restore the dead. The people listened eagerly and made an aisle up which he walked to the box. He thrust his shaman's stick, decorated with dangling shells, through Sä·lma's nose-ring, lifted him from the coffin, and carried him to the hole destined for its passage. As he threw out the supernatural being, groans were heard from the coffin. It was opened and the dead boy was found to be alive.

Sä·lma himself had instructed the youth to remove him in this way at the time he had given him shaman's power. Even when he was carrying away the supernatural being, none of the other people in the house could see his burden.

After this auspicious proof of his power, the shaman was frequently called upon, until he became wealthy, and was able to reach a position of eminence equal to that of his father at the time of his murder by jealous rivals.

THE FOUR BROTHERS

Long ago, though long after the earth had first been peopled, four brothers, whose home was in the lower Bella Coola valley, went for an excursion upstream, planning to call on their friends in the various villages. After travelling a considerable distance they came to a solitary house, which they entered. Its occupant, an old woman, gave them food and help.

"There is great danger where you are going," she said, "but if you are brave you will come to no harm." Turning to the youngest brother she continued: "Take these two mountain goat bladders.* One will give you heat when you need it; the other cold. You are now a shaman."

The woman was a supernatural being.

Continuing their journey after leaving her house, the four presently saw Great Blue Heron, who, in the form of an old man, was spearing salmon. His face had the design of the rainbow, consisting of diagonal paintings from his right eye to his left jaw-bone. Great Blue Heron had the ability to assume this face at will.

The shaman now said to his brothers: "I will rob Great Blue Heron."

Accordingly, he changed himself into a fine salmon and swam close beneath the spot where the fisherman was standing. The latter cast his single spear and transfixed the lad, who merely drew his knife, severed the string which held the harpoon-head to the shaft, and swam back to his brothers with the trophy, as if it were in his pouch. One of the brothers placed the head, a very fine one, in his carrying-box; then they continued their journey.

After this loss, Great Blue Heron hurried home to weep. He supported his wife and children on the fish which he speared, hence the loss of his only harpoon-head was a crippling blow. He and his children were all crying together when the four brothers entered.

"Woe is me!" he moaned out to them. "I have lost my harpoon-head, and without it I cannot get food for my children. They will starve. Oh, how disconsolate and miserable I am!"

The four brothers said nothing. Presently Great Blue Heron continued:

"I don't suppose, by any chance, you happen to have such a harpoon-head."

"Perhaps," answered the shaman. "There is one in my carrying-box resembling what you describe. Please look at it."

When Great Blue Heron had done so he burst out, "Good gracious! It is exactly like mine. The two must have been made on the same day."

Great Blue Heron tried to buy the harpoon-head from the four brothers, but they would accept nothing for it except his rainbow-face, which gave him the power of extraordinary vision. It was hanging on the wall of the house, a much-valued possession, with which the fisherman hated to part. As the shaman would take nothing else, he at last sadly consented to exchange it for the essential harpoon-head. The four brothers laughed at the old man's grief and continued their journey.

Presently, on the sandy beach of the river, they met the son of ulerwaw-i, a boy so fat that as he waddled along his stomach almost reached the ground. He was on his way to Nadiapsh to catch salmon. Filled with mischievous amusement at sight of the corpulent one, the four brothers determined to bury him. They dug a hole in the sand in which they left him, with only his face showing, unhurt but unable to move. They did not know that his mother, the supernatural ulerwaw-i, had been able to see the deed, thanks to her wonderful eyesight.

In a short time the four brothers reached her house.

"Have you seen my son?" she inquired, after the usual greeting.

"No," they all replied.

ulerwaw-i insisted that they must have seen him, and when they again said that they had not, she accused them of having ill-treated him.

This brought forth another denial. Then, becoming still more angry, she used her supernatural power to chill the house. It became colder and colder until everything was coated with ice, while a whirlwind carried the brothers up into the four corners of the house. At this the shaman used his heat-giving bladder to drive away the cold and the four dropped to earth, none the worse for their experience. Then they told the truth to the angry mother. 539* 756* 787*

"Yes," said the shaman, "we did meet your son. But do not be alarmed. We did not hurt him, only buried him in the sand up to his neck, as a prank."

The four brothers went back and unearthed their victim, with whom they returned to his mother. uxlamaw-i forgot her anger in the joy of having her son restored and they all had a pleasant time together.

The brothers now continued their journey until they came to a house with a man sitting inside. They did not realize that they had been ascending and that this was Ałqunstw's abode. He invited them to enter and gave them his daughter as a joint wife. Soon the house began to grow unbearably hot. Ałqunstw was conspiring to roast the mortals, and would have succeeded had not the shaman used the cold-producing bladder to lower the temperature. That night the four stayed with their father-in-law, sleeping in turn with their joint wife.

Ałqunstw did not realize that his guests were too strong for him. In the morning he set them what he considered impossible tasks, such as hunting large numbers of goats on the mountains; thanks to the shaman's power, however, the four young men were able to accomplish them all. Their wife tried to injure her husbands by transforming herself into a ferocious bear, which attacked them, but before the arrows of the youngest brother, it fell dead. Again she changed herself into a goat and succeeded in butting the shaman over the edge of a precipice, but he merely assumed the form of eagle down and floated up again. They brought back to Ałqunstw's house a vast amount of goat flesh. The shaman announced that he was proof against all Ałqunstw's wiles, but the latter, not convinced, tried once more to roast the brothers by building a fire beneath the house; this time, as before, the heat was powerless against the cold-giving power of the bladder.

Next day Ałqunstw asked the shaman, whom he rightly judged to be the cause of his failure to slay the four, to accompany him to cut firewood. The two went off in a canoe, while the three other brothers stayed in the house with their wife. Ałqunstw guided the canoe to the very centre of the ocean, where he asked the shaman to drive in a post he had brought with him. He did this easily with a sledge hammer such as is used for [412] driving stakes for olachen-nets, but at almost the last stroke it slipped from his grasp to the bottom of the sea. Then Älquntäm burst out angrily:

"I have had that hammer for a very long time. It is a favourite of mine. I hate to lose it."

"I am very sorry, but it was an accident," replied his son-in-law.

"Can you not recover it?" asked Älquntäm.

"I will try," answered the young man.

Accordingly, he dived into the sea. Älquntäm, who had been hoping for this, caused a thick coating of ice to form over the whole surface of the ocean, and went home, thinking he had seen the last of the troublesome young man. Such was not the case, for the shaman merely changed himself into a salmon, picked up the hammer in his mouth, and swam away, looking for a crack in the ice. Finding one at last he crawled up on top, where he became human again and returned to his father-in-law's house, very angry. Älquntäm was sitting warming himself before the fire, but when the shaman threw the hammer on the ground before him he disintegrated into dust, dead. Then the four brothers returned home, leaving their evil wife behind them.

THE FOUR BROTHERS
(Second Version)

Ka'laätnts, the youngest of four brothers, lived on the Kimsquit River. He was a very powerful man, able, through his supernatural talents, to change at will into any animal or bird. In his box he kept the necessary appurtenances for his transformations. One day, when travelling upstream with his three brothers he saw an old man spearing salmon from a river canoe. This was really Great Blue Heron in human form, and he was using a wonderful glass-like thing in his eye with the aid of which he was able to follow without difficulty the course of a fish beneath the water. Ka'laätnts desired to gain possession of this potent eye, so turned back, and in the guise of a magnificent salmon, swam upstream close to Great Blue Heron. The latter thrust at him with his spear, but missed. Ka'laätnts turned and swam down near the farther bank, then again went up near the canoe, this time allowing the fisherman to spear him. Great Blue Heron tried in vain to haul in his catch, but succeeded only in being drenched with water; at last Ka'laätnts cut the cord with his knife and swam upstream, where he re-assumed human form, still carrying the harpoon-head. Great Blue Heron went home weeping bitterly, and bade his wife and children dolikewise, because his means of support had vanished.

An hour or so later the four brothers arrived at Great Blue Heron's house. Following the universal custom he offered them food, and, as they ate, he told them how he was ruined for life, having lost his only harpoon-head. He asked them whether by any chance they happened to possess an old one. One of the brothers answered:

"I think I have seen one in Ko'laiānts's box."

They brought the box and opened it. There lay Great Blue Heron's harpoon-head though, of course, he thought it was only one just like it, especially when Ko'laiānts mentioned having had it for a long time. The host offered to buy it in exchange for dried salmon, which he said was all he had. Ko'laiānts refused, saying that he had plenty of smoked fish, and finally after further discussion, said he would accept nothing but Great Blue Heron's eye. The fisherman was very unwilling to part with this, though at last he agreed to do so, and sadly handed this treasured possession to Ko'laiānts.

The four brothers continued their journey up the bank of the river and presently saw a boy playing alone on a fine beach. In a spirit of mischief Ko'laiānts decided to work evil on him. No house was in sight.

"Have you a mother?" he asked the boy.

"Yes," was the reply.

"Where is she?" inquired Ko'laiānts.

"In the house," said the lad, indicating the direction in which his home lay.

Ko'laiānts used his supernatural power to make a hole in the sand, and in this he buried the boy, leaving his head alone above ground. Then the four brothers went on to the mother's house. She gave them food, according to custom, and asked if they had seen her son. They answered:

"No."

"That is strange," she said. "He was playing on the beach along which you must have passed."

"We did not see him," they replied.

She jumped to the conclusion that they had killed her son and in turn prepared to murder them. Her house differed from most in having a door which worked up and down, like the mouth of an animal, instead of sideways. It opened of its own accord when anyone approached, closing as soon as he had entered. The woman threw back this portal and exerted her power to cause cold winds. The cold grew more and more intense, and the wind increased in strength until the four brothers were blown into the four upper corners of the house against the roof. All but Ko'laiānts were frozen and swathed in ice; he alone escaped through his supernatural power which enabled him to scatter eagle down. He returned to the floor and said to the woman:

"I am too strong for you. Stop, or I shall kill you."

She realized that he was speaking the truth, so she ceased the cold

*539 winds to cease. The three frozen brothers fell back to the floor where *756 Ko'laiānts revived them. Then he sent out two of them to bring in the *787 boy they had buried. When they returned, the mother overwhelmed them with her gratitude and gave them many presents, even offering to become the wife of Ko'laiānts, who, however, declined to accept her.

THE FOUR BROTHERS
(Third Version)

[845] Once upon a time four brothers, one of whom was a twin and could accordingly change to a salmon, had friction with their family, and decided to go away from home. As they followed the trail along the bank of the river they saw a man spearing salmon on the opposite bank. He wore what appeared to be a transparent object, like an eyeglass, in front of one eye. The brothers watched him for some time and were amazed at his dexterity; with every thrust of his spear he impaled a salmon.

"I can transform myself into a salmon," said the twin.

The others did not believe him and replied:

"If you can, go and get the head of that wonderful spear."

"All right," answered the twin, and went down the river bank, out of sight. Presently the three brothers saw a large, beautifully marked salmon jumping in the river as it made its way upstream.

"Perhaps it is he after all," they said.

The salmon darted past the fisherman, who made a thrust at it and missed. He pulled in his harpoon and as he refitted the head he said, ruefully:

"I don't know what can be the matter. I have never missed before."

Meanwhile the salmon-man had unobtrusively gone downstream, keeping close to the bank where his brothers were watching. Then he went up, jumping as before, and again the fisherman struck and missed. Once more he slipped downstream, and on his third ascent he repassed close to the fisherman, who failed as before, and was, therefore, much troubled. Once again the twin went below but he allowed himself to be struck when he passed upwards the fourth time. Instantly a commotion arose. The water gurgled and boiled as the fish struggled; the fisherman could barely hold his grip, and was unable to land what he had caught. After a few minutes the salmon-boy drew his knife and severed the line, causing the fisherman to fall into the river. He clambered ashore and pulled in his rope as he watched the water for another sight of the strong fish, but it had disappeared. When, instead of the harpoon-head on which he depended for sustenance, he found only a cut line, the loss was so severe that, weeping bitterly, he went home and told his wife and daughter of his misfortune. They, too, cried bitterly. All were puzzled to know what kind of a salmon it could have been which had secured the spear-head, for the rope had been cut.

Meanwhile the twin had swum downstream again, and there transformed himself back to a human being before he rejoined his brothers, bringing with him the harpoon-head. He gave it to his eldest brother who concealed it under his cloak. The four continued their journey and presently saw a house on the other shore. They crossed the river and entered, finding within the weeping fisherman with his wife and daughter. He told the wife to ask the strangers if they had not a harpoon-head.

"Perhaps, I don't know," said the twin. "I will ask my brothers."

He applied to the eldest who took the spear-head from under his cloak. The fisherman, dumbfounded at seeing a duplicate, related how he had lost his own and asked if they would not sell theirs.

"Maybe," they replied. "What will you give for it?"

"The four of you can marry my daughter, simultaneously," he said.

"No, that is not enough," the brothers answered. "It is a very valuable harpoon-head."

Then he offered them everything in the house, but they declined all until, finally, he told them sadly that he had nothing more. They had been waiting for this moment, and now said:

"We will give you the spear-head in exchange for your eye."

They meant the transparent, eye-like object which he had taken off and hung on the wall where they saw it. The request greatly troubled him.

"That eye," he said, "enables me to see salmon at any depth beneath the surface of the water, no matter how turbid it is. Please take something else."

"No," the brothers replied. "You have nothing else that we want."

Finally the unhappy fisherman went slowly to the place where hung his eye, took it down, and sorrowfully exchanged it for the spear-head, telling the brothers what a valuable possession they were acquiring.

The fisherman was Great Blue Heron, and the "eye" his bill.

These three versions are some of the forms in which this popular story is related; a fourth, obtained from another informant, states that the theft of the harpoon-head occurred soon after the beginning of time. The supernaturally endowed twin is called Ka'leitsen, and Great Blue Heron, Sanpelqs, which is said to be his dzapaif name. Following the loss of his harpoon-head, the fisherman happens to visit Ka'leitsen's house, where he sees his treasured possession on the wall; he ultimately retrieves it in exchange for his rainbow-eye.

WHY WINTER COMES

* 539
* 756
* 787
[103]

In the beginning, five people came to earth as golden eagles at a point above the present site of Firvale.* Their names were *Mâsong*ʷ, *Kâmâlsong*ʷ, Senxwakhs, Senxwaw-a, and their sister, ułxwaw-i. This woman had enormous power which she used malignly, attracting storms, and doing other evil things. So her four brothers threw her two miles down the valley into the narrow ravine where the old foot-trail used by the Carriers leaves the Bella Coola valley and goes up the mountains to reach the rolling interior country. This barren gorge is known to this day as ułxwaw-i, and it is subject to the most severe winds in the whole district. Here the woman lived and bore a son, whose name has been forgotten.

At this time four brothers living in Qumqo-ts, depressed by a serious dispute with their father, decided to leave home, never to return. They set off up the valley, following the only trail. It so happened that ułxwaw-i had sent her son down to collect ocean food, and the four brothers met the youth on the way. After he had answered their questions as to where he was going and why, one of the brothers suggested that they bury him in a large, dry hole. They did so, covered him with branches and earth, and then continued their journey eastward. Presently they saw the house of ułxwaw-i, into which they peered through a crack in the wall. The woman did not see them, but at once became aware of their presence, and bade them enter through the door. In reply to her questions, they told her whence they had come, and then she asked them if they had seen her son.

"No," answered the four.

"That is strange," said ułxwaw-i. "There is only one trail up and down the valley."

The brothers still denied having met the boy, but she became suspicious and accused them of having killed him. She felt under her clothing for a small pump which she always carried concealed near her groin, and worked it until the house began to grow cold. As she continued, it grew colder and colder, until an icy wind swept the brothers into a corner, where they fell to the floor, numb and helpless. One retained sufficient consciousness to gasp out a confession, when she asked again what they had done with her son, adding that he was still alive, though they had hidden him in the ground. ułxwaw-i then stopped the cold and built up her fire, so that the brothers gradually recovered their strength. As soon as they were able she sent them back to exhume her son and bring him back to her.

In her delight at his safe return she said:

*Kâmâlsong*ʷ Firvale [illegible] miles up the Bella Coola valley, a short distance below Ilsuk.

"I am very glad. I bear you no ill-will, because I understand that you buried my son merely as a thoughtless prank. The place to which you are bound is very bad. No ordinary traveller ever returns from it, but I am going to make you shamans."

756*
787*

So saying, she took her pump and put it in a sack, which she gave to the four brothers, who continued their journey. Soon they came to a house, Nxmăi-a, though they knew it not. Peering through the cracks they saw within a man, Alqumtăm, who invited them to enter, saying that he knew they had come because they did not get on well with their father. As uăxmaw-i had warned them, he invited them to sit down in a certain place in the house, while he went out. He came back attired in his dance regalia, and as he performed, the house began to warm up. He again withdrew, to return with other dance clothing, and as he danced in it the heat increased. Alqumtăm repeated this procedure four times; the heat was so stifling that the brothers could hardly breathe, until one of them worked the pump given to them by uăxmaw-i. Almost immediately they felt relief. Alqumtăm continued his dance, and a great combat went on between the cold and the heat until finally the latter was vanquished. Alqumtăm was driven by the cold into a corner where he admitted his defeat, adding:

"You are the first that ever overcame me. Take whatever you desire of my goods or of my power."

Awed by their experience, the four brothers returned to Bella Coola. Owing to the successful conflict with Alqumtăm, the frost and cold of winter annually return to vanquish the heat of summer, which otherwise would destroy all life. [821]

THE MAN WHO RECEIVED POWER FROM THE MOON*

Long, long ago a certain man, Xăwmtsaw-a ate black hawthorn berries for four days, knowing it would render him susceptible to visitations from the supernatural. He returned every night to his father's house to sleep, and on the fourth night he made a small hole in his blanket, so that when he pulled it over his head he was able to see, though he appeared to be asleep. As he watched he saw a mouse approaching, and said to it:

"Don't hide. I see you."

The mouse then became a woman and carried Xăwmtsaw-a in a canoe to the house of the Moon, whence she had come. The Moon rubbed his hands over the face of Xăwmtsaw-a, thus making him a shaman; he also gave his guest a small salmon, which had the power of killing the highest *539 seas. At the Moon's invitation, Xekwotsan-a built his own fire in the house and settled there, never returning to earth.

*756 On one occasion Xekwotsan-a attacked Kāmai-ti, the supernatural woman to whom all mortals are as slaves. She lived in some distant, uncertain part of the upper regions, or perhaps on this earth. He defeated her and pulled off her ears, but when he threw them into the water they caused it to boil and seethe so that his canoe was almost swamped. He threw out his supernatural salmon to quiet the waves and thus escaped. At that time the dead lived in Kāmai-ti's house, and Xekwotsan-a rescued his deceased mother from near Kāmai-ti's gigantic hat. Then he set fire to the woman's house and sent her down to this earth, where she was turned into stone.

THE WOMAN WHO MARRIED A BEAR[27]

Long, long ago, but after the first people had come to this earth, a woman who was out gathering berries lay down and slept on the ground. When she awoke she found that she had been lying on bear droppings and in her annoyance she cursed the one responsible for them. But bears have extraordinary powers of hearing, and the offender heard her remark and was angry. He assumed the form of a man and went to her, asking, with many profane expressions:

"What do you mean by swearing at my droppings? Defecate and I am certain you will find mine the better."

The woman did as she was bidden, while the bear-man watched her. Determined to outdo him, she managed to substitute some goat's grease for her own excrement without his observing her. When he saw it he admitted that he was out-matched and said:

"Come home with me."

[823] This she agreed to do. As mountains are really hollow, he lead the woman inside one, where she realized for the first time what her lover was, for he introduced her to his bear-wife. The two received the woman in a kindly fashion and prepared what they said was spring salmon, though in reality it was skunk cabbage. To the chagrin of her host, the guest refused it, whereupon he inquired what she would like. Looking around she saw some coho salmon which, at her request, was toasted for her; on this she made a hearty meal. That night she slept with the bear-man.

Meanwhile the woman's family was greatly alarmed at her long absence and scoured the woods in vain for her. Her four brothers in particular sought diligently, but at length even they gave up in despair, concluding that she was dead. The morning following her introduction to the bear-man's home she awoke, thinking she had slept but a single night, for she did not realize that a night to the supernatural ones is a year to mortals. Her bear-host asked which of her brothers she would prefer to see.

"The eldest," she replied.

"No," responded the bear. "He is a shameless man who is wont to sleep with his wife at all periods."

"Then I should like to see my second brother," she said.

But again the bear refused, saying: "He spends all his time combing his wife's hair to make her appear beautiful. Choose your youngest brother; he is the best of the family."

To this she agreed, so the bear threw out his power and compelled the youngest brother to pass near the hiding-place. While they were still at a distance, the bear saw the man and his dog, whereat he pointed them out to the woman, who threw a snowball down the hillside for the dog to chase. After a fruitless pursuit it returned to its master. Another snowball was thrown, which again the dog failed to retrieve. When this was repeated four times the man concluded that a bear must be near.[*] He crawled up until he saw his sister, in the guise of a bear; he had even fixed an arrow on the string ready to shoot when she assumed human form and greeted him. He was delighted at finding his long-lost sister, and she was amazed at hearing that she had been absent for a year. She took her brother into the mountain to get her basket and pack her goods, but he was unable to see the town of the bears until she rubbed her hands over his eyes. Then it became visible to him also. They returned home together, where she recounted her marvellous adventures.

At that early period there was less distinction between men and animals than now exists; each understood the language of the other, but though bears have retained their original supernatural powers men have degenerated to such an extent that they can no longer communicate with animals.[] It was true, men shot animals, but that was because Spawtsw had allotted them to men as food. The bear had chosen the woman as his mate because she was still a virgin, and therefore not contaminated by too much of the essence of humanity. Through intercourse with this supernatural being she became a shaman, with a knowledge of the wishes of bears, even then not properly understood. Her association, followed by intercourse with the bear, gave her insight into the mentality of the animal. Following her mate's instructions, she taught her youngest brother the proper methods of hunting, and how to find bears when strengthened by chastity, without which no hunter can have success. He alone of her brothers was worthy to learn this, because he was still celibate. Among other things she taught him never to hunt bears with arrows feathered with owl feathers, because she had been told by her husband that one of his fellows shot with such a missile would remain dead, whereas one slain with an arrow tipped with feathers from any other bird would be reborn.

The woman and her youngest brother hunted constantly, and always returned with skins which they shared with everyone. The other three brothers were very jealous, though their own lack of success was due to their laziness, and failure to observe ceremonial chastity. At intervals the bear used to visit his human mate, and after a year or more she went away with him, never to return.

THE WOMAN WHO MARRIED A BEAR

(Second Version)

Long, long ago, a Carrier Indian girl was walking along a path at the back of the village when she saw some black bear's dung. She kicked it to one side saying aloud:

"Who is as dirty as to defecate here?"

Then she wiped her feet on the grass and went on. Presently, she met a handsome, well-dressed man, a stranger, who asked her if she had recently met anyone.

"No," she replied.

He invited the girl to come and visit him in his house, and she agreed to do so. The trail was long, but to her it seemed short, owing to his power. Arrived at his house, the stranger asked her to marry him and she consented. When it was bed-time the girl collected soft hemlock boughs to sleep upon.

"I never see such stuff," said her mate angrily, so she went out again and brought back devil's club, and gooseberry bushes, saying to him:

"I cannot lie on these."

"I always do," he replied.

Next, the man bade her collect fire wood, and she brought some dry windfalls from a slide, but he said:

"That does not hold the heat," and he sent her out again.

This time she brought back stones and he was pleased.

"That is good," he said, "I always use them. Now let us have a meal."

"I don't see anything to eat," she replied, but her husband pulled out some skunk cabbage, which he roasted at the fire and ate. He was a bear, and it was salmon to him. Then the two lay down to sleep.

In midwinter, when they turned over, as bears are wont to do, the woman said:

"I should like my oldest brother to see where I am."

"He is no good," her bear-husband replied. "He has the characteristics of a woman in the skin of a man."

Then she asked to see her second brother, but to him also the husband objected, showering vile epithets upon him. The same followed her suggestion of the third brother, but to the fourth and youngest he agreed. So she willed that this one should come to where she lay. To him it seemed mere chance that led him to the spot, but when he saw his sister beside the bear he hastily killed the animal. All the villagers were summoned, and they soon cut up the meat, while wondering at what had happened to the girl. When they had finished she said to them:

"Go ahead with the flesh; I will follow with the skin."

Then she draped over herself and began to imitate a bear so successfully that the dogs barked at her, startling the people who had gone ahead. At the village she told them to dry and stretch the pelt carefully; when these instructions had been carried out, the girl took the teeth and leg-bones, clothed herself in the skin and forthwith became a bear. In this shape she slew all the villagers except a younger sister and the youngest of her brothers, who was out hunting at the time. Through her marriage to the bear she had obtained such power that all were helpless before her except the younger sister, who was immune owing to being included in reaching puberty; her menstrual blood was her protection. The terrified child could only impotently watch the slaughter from her corner of the house.

When the brother came back, his shaman-sister was in human form, but quickly changed to a bear, and asked how he had obtained the grease which he was carrying.

"I shot them with my arrows," he answered.

"I don't believe you," the bear-woman replied. "Hit that knot-hole with an arrow, or you are a liar and I will kill you."

The boy's arrow pierced the knot-hole. In some unexplained manner, he knew that his sister must be vulnerable in the part of the body where her power was located if he could only learn where that was. After finding an opportunity to ask the assistance of his youngest sister, he left the house. The little girl said to her powerful sister:

"I know you are immune except in one spot. Please show me where it is, so that I may guard you from harm."

The foolish shaman was deluded into pointing out her weak spot, the palm of one hand. The conspirators had been hoping for such an indication, since it gave the information to the brother who was peering through a crack. The younger sister persuaded the older one to hold up her palms to the fire to warm them, thus giving the brother an opportunity to shoot through a knot-hole in the wall of the house. His arrow transfixed his sister's hand and she fell, helpless, whereupon he entered and slew her.

The surviving brother and sister abandoned their home and travelled for a very long time without seeing anyone. Finally, they settled on a mountain top and married. Since that time Carriers have married their sisters.[a]

[186]

THE MARRIAGE OF Thlitcăplilăn-a'S DAUGHTER

Long ago, when the world was still sparsely populated, there were two poor orphans, a brother and sister, quite alone, without relatives. The boy, who was about eighteen years old, took great care of the girl. In summer, when the people scattered over the country in search of food, the two went together to catch and dry salmon for the winter. The brother had great success. He caught many fish which he suspended on a frame to dry, in charge of his sister, while he went away for four or five days. On his return all the drying salmon had disappeared.

"That is unkind of my sister," he said to himself, "to have eaten all these fish so greedily."

He went to bed without saying anything, but next morning asked her:

"Is it you who have eaten all our food?"

The girl replied in a frightened whisper:

"Don't speak to me about it. I am terrified. A supernatural woman stole it. I think it was Thlitcăplilăn-a. I heard something approaching and hid myself. A huge woman came to the drying rack, her snout-like mouth ranged among the fish and sucked them down like lightning, while her teeth rattled as if they were loose in her jaws. She went away as soon as she had finished our salmon."

Next morning the boy hade his sister hide, as he was going to attack the robber of his food. He prepared a bow with a strong arrow and took up his position in ambush overlooking the rack on which hung the salmon he had recently caught. Soon he heard a voice and presently Thlitcăplilăn-a appeared, wearing a shaman's collar of dyed and undyed cedar-bark in alternate bands, plentifully sprinkled with eagle down. Her teeth rattled loosely in their sockets. When near the rack, her mouth formed itself into a snout with which she began to suck in the salmon with a horrible gurgling sound. The boy shot, the arrow pierced her left breast and she ran off with a shriek of pain.

Calling to his sister not to be afraid, the boy set off in pursuit of the wounded Ttlcetplitte·a. As he followed, he found tufts of dyed cedar-bark and eagle down which she had dropped, and these he carefully picked up and fastened to his own bear-skin blanket, as if he were a shaman. Ignorant of the path which his quarry was taking, the boy followed blindly until she entered a huge house. Then he realized that she must have led him to Nazmtt·a. He sat down outside, by a spring, and watched all the supernatural ones assembling inside the house to cure their wounded comrade. They did not walk into the house, merely materialized instantaneously there. All tried to help Ttlcetplitte·a, but not one of them could do so because the arrow, having been made by an inhabitant of this earth, was invisible to them, as theirs are to mortals. After some time one of Ttlcetplitte·a's four daughters went out to draw water from the spring, beside which she saw the stranger, dressed as a shaman. She asked him:

"Are you a real shaman?"

"Yes," lied the boy, "if it is not too serious a case."

The girl returned to the house and told the other supernatural ones there was a man outside who claimed to be a shaman.

"Let us try him," they cried. "Some mortals are very clever shamans."

So they invited the boy to come in. He entered, but immediately fell senseless from the flashing light in Thunder's eye, as the latter passed near the wounded woman. After a time he recovered, only to fall senseless once more, this time from the gaze of Sxaxp, who likewise flashed fire from his eye. When the effects of this too had passed, the lad began his work, watched all the time by the supernatural ones as a strange curiosity about which they were ignorant. The arrow was, of course, visible to him all the time; he merely felt it, however, then drew his hand back and began to dance in time to the beating of the supernatural ones. They joined him, he leading the way and dancing in the manner of human beings on this earth, while they all imitated what he did; it was a remarkable performance. A second time he drew near Ttlcetplitte·a, and this time broke off the point of his arrow, that was projecting from her back. He pulled out the shaft also, which he concealed under his cloak. The patient cried out that she felt as if a stick were being drawn from her back, but no one could tell what it was. The lad threw the broken arrow into the fire, and then rubbed his hands over her wound. She was cured forthwith, because he had the same power in dealing with supernatural beings as they have with men.

Previous to her sons, Dindpiliko-o had promised that whoever made her well should marry one of her four beautiful daughters. She now bade them stand up and told the boy to choose whichever he liked. The four were identical in appearance, and the youth was in a quandary, but a young supernatural being standing near advised him to select the third in age, saying she was by far the most capable. All had wonderful powers but she excelled her sisters, since, if she closed her eyes and wished to be in a certain place, she straightway arrived there. So the lad had the girl set from among her sisters and in a flash all the supernatural men vanished, except Dindpiliko-o and her four children. The mother said to her new son-in-law:

"I suppose you will spend the night with us but will want to go back to your own home tomorrow morning."

"Yes," answered the boy. "I am afraid to be so long absent on account of my sister down below."

"Don't worry on her account," said his mother-in-law. "If she should be dead I will restore her, or rather your wife, my daughter, will do so. She has the necessary power."

That night the young man spent in the home of Dindpiliko-o. Next morning he put his hands out for the earth, standing on the same mat, there came to which he had reached Dzanai-o. He thought he had been absent for one night only, but one night among supernatural men being equivalent to a year among mortals, he seemed had died of exposure. He with rubbed her hands over the dead girl's face and she was at once restored to life, greatly to the delight of the bridegroom and all his human friends.

Dindpiliko-o's daughter had brought with her from Dzanai-o a dog which she instructed to watch her husband and report if he so much as flirted with any other girl. She warned him that if he did so, or if he ever ceased to pay the proper respect to herself, she would leave him and return to her home above. For three years the husband obeyed her instructions, but one night he met a pretty girl and was faithless to his wife. The ever-watchful dog reported this to his mistress, who went back above and never returned to her husband.

THE MARRIAGE OF Dindpiliko-o's DAUGHTER
(Second Version)

Long ago three brothers went off into the mountains to hunt game. They had valuable furs and hung up their quarry to dry, leaving Lachum, the youngest brother, in charge. While the others were absent, Dindpiliko-o visited the camp and carried off the drying furs, the guardian, verified as the supernatural woman, not being to person. When the other brothers returned with more game he told them what had happened, and they decided to keep up the guard as before and watch. Presently, Pinaqibin-a returned and further shot at her, he arrow piercing and remaining in one of her huge breasts. The wounded supernatural ran off, whimpering with pain, while the three brothers followed. Soon the two other turned back, unknowned to her speed.

Sactum continued to follow Pinaqibin-a guided by numerous small pieces of the dyed color-bark which she was wearing being plucked from her robe by the brother during her rapid flight. The youth kept picking them up and finally located them into a cabin for himself. After a long time he came to a river, went up it until he was opposite a tree in which he saw the wounded Pinaqibin-a surrounded by a number of supernatural beings, who were trying to cure her, though they could not see the cause of her pain. He reported to what he had done, and began to plan how he could use it to his own advantage. Presently the supernatural woman died, and thought he must be a member of the better society from the color of dyed color-bark which he was wearing. They sent a messenger to him, who asked:

"Are you a doctor?"

"Yes," but Sactum, and the envoy continued:

"Pinaqibin-a has suffered an injury, he want you to help her. Please come home with me."

The boy refused and the messenger returned to the village. Then the youngest daughter of Pinaqibin-a came over and begged him to come to the aid of her mother, but still he refused. Then the elder daughter came with the same request and he consented to go with her.

In the village all were trying to cure Pinaqibin-a. One after another, the different supernatural shamans danced in the hope of curing her pain, but were had any effect. Whenever anyone touched the arrow Pinaqibin-a groaned, but no one of them could see it. Sactum listened to the various rhythms and decided that of the midwives to be the best. When the supernatural beings asked his aid and offered to lend his own time if he would tell them what it was, he had, saying that his was exactly the same as that of the midwives. They lent that he lent to be danced to and he, going to the wounded woman at intervals to draw the arrow slightly further through her breast until the head of it emerged. He broke this off, drew back the portion of shaft remaining in the wound, and finally rubbed his hands over the flesh to cover the patient. Then he drew the broken arrow into the fire, but to them nothing is apparent as if he merely went through the motion of throwing something, for the object was invisible to them, as are all things made by manitu.

[illegible] THE BELLA COOLA INDIANS

The supernatural beings were profuse in their thanks to Gaetsa, and Pinnipédée gave him his daughter as wife. He slept that night with her and this made him a shaman, with the power of knowing where animals were hidden, since, like his wife, they are supernatural. Pinnipédée said to him:

"Take care of your uncle with other women."

This means that he must not talk of what had happened to him, and further must be very careful in his relations with other women.

The next morning, though it was really a year later on earth, Gaetsa and his bride were back in his camp. One of his brothers had returned home, but the other had waited patiently for his younger brother until he had died of starvation and only his bones were left. Gaetsa was much distressed, but his wife assured him that she had a remedy. She collected the bones and restored the dead brother to life, much to her husband's gratification. She had killed in that one of the bones and consequently he had a limp to one leg. After further search the two unchanged was found, the boy killed again, the missing bone restored, and the lad brought back to life by the women, uninjured. Then the three set out for Gaetsa's home. In that early period the houses were built on the ground with a door in front and a window (the one entrance reached by a ladder). The three prepared to go into opening and sat, as well as board, Gaetsa's mother weeping. They knocked. The women saw her young daughter-in-law but not who was on the door, but when she observed crying to see a strange woman with her two brothers, who had been missing for a year and were considered dead, the mother did not believe her, and thought it was merely a malicious trick to add to her grief. Then she saw not her son, the one who had returned from the hunting expedition, and when he told her the same story she believed it and rushed to welcome her two long-absent boys. They entered the house, but instead of sitting down with the other people, they went to a small raised enclosure behind the fire where they waited, while food and tea put on the fire. The inhabitants of the village gathered quickly, hoping to hear their adventures, but Gaetsa remembered the warning of his mother-in-law and told them nothing, so was either hyster or with more communicative.

For a long time Gaetsa lived happily with his wife, so he refrained even from joking with other women, while, to avoid difficulties, he kept her almost entirely hidden in his house. Whenever he went hunting, as he often did, she accompanied him. They had good success, because his supernatural power enabled him to see the shelters where the animals were lying, while she could kill them. This good fortune continued for a long time until one day, when Gaetsa was drawing water, he forgot the morning of Pinnipiliu-a, and joined with a young girl engaged on the same task. When he returned home his wife had vanished. The judgment was so given that she had gone back to the land of the supernatural.

THE DEATH OF Nanuvaqtuk[1]

One May day, sometime about 1870, a certain Nanuvaqtuk was hunting at Ooiaqik, below Kinnaqut. He had climbed far up a mountain when he saw a black bear in an open space. Coming within range, the man fired at the animal with his Hudson's Bay Company musket, and apparently struck it, for it rolled around wildly before slowly moving away. The hunter followed, hoping for a second shot. When the hunter had almost reached the further end of a big which spanned a chasm in normal round, and Nanuvaqtuk saw, to his utter astonishment, that in face was identical with his own. Staggering to this, the hunter stood, swollen motionless with wonder, his musket in his hand. His young second slowly off, then passed to both back, and again Nanuvaqtuk saw that in face was the image of his own. He stood not this, nor did he dare follow the animal. One of his successors had received power from a bear, so he should not have been surprised at this situation, and, if he had been brave, he would have followed the animal to its home where he would have been made a shaman. In any appearance of the supernatural, whether or not the beholder with advantage of it, he should not mention what he has seen, and he was one who should remain close to his group. Nanuvaqtuk shared with the rest of their importance.

Next March Nanuvaqtuk, with a companion whose name was Aiyaqtiu, set out for the same hunting-ground. As they neared that mountain Nanuvaqtuk, who was searching for game with his friend carefully, saw a gun lie up the slope of a mountain. It had long fallen hanging from its thong, with a gun on the sight of old and had the power to kill man. He suggested that they land and have the animal the following day. The two camped on the very spot used by Nanuvaqtuk the previous year, and that night he told his friend about his earlier experience, saying that he had just remembered it. Aiyaqtiu, foolishly, did not dissuade him from his hunting venture.

Next morning Nanuvaqtuk set off with his dog and his sled, leaving Aiyaqtiu in camp. After some time the latter heard a shot, and idly wondered how his companion was faring. Towards dusk the dog returned alone, and Aiyaqtiu so concluded that his friend had met with misfortune.

Although this story does not describe the shooting of supernatural game, nor the exploits of a person so endowed, it is material to illustrate a man's belief in the presence of the supernatural, from which ability might have been gained.

[illegible] cave, remembering what the latter had told him the previous evening. He tried to follow his friend's track, and, as night came on, closed the cave of west to sleep, with the dog beside him. When it was quite dark he awakened by the sound of footsteps and the tapping of a stick, and concluded that his partner was returning. The cave-flap was closed, so [illegible] person entering, but Ayimlaic could see nothing, so he kicked the dog awaken it and the animal began to bark furiously. At length he heard steps withdrew and gave faintly as they climbed the mountain. Then Ayimlaic realized that his friend was dead, and that it was his life, [illegible] round to warn his companions, which had come to him. Terrified, he [illegible] all night with a blazing fire, and fled the next morning.

Ayimlaic chanced to meet several canoes soon after he had quitted his cave, and when he had told his story, their occupants turned back to hut for Nanaxwanukl. Almost eighteen men searched all that day unsuccessfully, but a few days later another party found the corpse of the man horror. Presumably he had fired at the goat, though whether he caught or not was not known, and the animal had charged. A wound in Nanaxwanukl's groin showed where one of the horns had pierced him, and a two had rolled together to death over a precipice, the bodies having slightly separated in the fall.

Even if Nanaxwanukl had struck the goat it would not have availed him, for he was doomed to death. Not only had he taken great risks in [illegible] within one year of his previous experiences, but his wife had been [illegible] during his absence. He had long practised continence, and there was in a clean condition such as is approved by animals, and other supernatural beings, but this very condition rendered him peculiarly susceptible to any breaking of taboos by his wife. She had so far forgotten herself as to indulge in swinging when he was on the mountain, so that his doom was inevitable. Nanaxwanukl's relatives were very angry and prophesied that she would soon die. They were right, though whether her death was caused by a sorcerer, or by the accumulative power of their thoughts, is a matter no one can determine.

THE Tlamqi-ix

In the beginning of time, when Alquntin sent down Kaiaiks to this earth he used his own initiative and travelled to the east for abalone shell and to the west for copper. On returning to his settlement, he determined to try to have to it a supernatural being, of whom existence he was aware from his previous life in the land above. Accordingly, he [illegible] some of the copper into jingling bangles, which he fastened to the [illegible] of his infant's cradle. Before the introduction of white men's [illegible] the Bella Coola were accustomed to tie a child in a cloth and suspend the bundle by ropes from a stick which projected horizontally from the wall. It was to these ropes that Kalakka tied the bangles, so that they jingled with every movement of the child.

Alpentsin heard this peculiar noise from his house in the land above and sent a Sisqut-ts, a diminutive supernatural being of human form, which lives on air, to investigate. The creature perched on the cradle rope where Kalakka saw it. Owing to his former life in the land above he knew what it was, and how to deal with it, so he quickly threw over it a blanket which he had frequently used.* This brought him supernatural good fortune. He concealed the Sisqut-ts for safety in an old chamber-work canoe such, and left it lying on the floor.

Wealth flowed in upon him so that he was able to give a potlatch every year. At one of these he gave his infant daughter, the occupant of the cradle, the name Tlqaut-ts, which has been handed down from generation to generation, and has recently been given to a Bella Bella child. Kalakka's prosperity roused the jealousy of his fellows so that they murdered him, but his children still had the Sisqut-ts and they continued to prosper. At last their enemies slew them too, sparing only one small boy.

This orphan had a precarious existence. He was refused admission to what had been his father's house and was forced to live in the space between the floor and the ground below, while his food was taken from the refuse heaps. In time he grew to young manhood, frequently brooding on the loss of his relatives and hoping for revenge. One day he crossed the river, ascended a mountain, and found there a large cave, where he lay down to sleep, wrapped in a bear-skin. A supernatural being came to him.

"I have watched your woes," said the stranger, "and I will help you if you are brave. You must accompany me to my land. The road is dangerous, and if you should fear me it would be dangerous to you, as long ago."

They took a difficult path down through the earth to the land of the dead below.

"I will keep you here for a night and teach you," said the supernatural one as he gave the boy a stick in which was power.

"You must take this," he said, "and go at night to your father's house. Throw the stick at one of those who killed your father. It will rebound to you, after leaving your enemy dead without a mark on his body. Do this every night, killing only one man at a time, until you have slain all the murderers, but be careful not to harm anyone else."

Although he had not at first revealed himself, the being from whom the lad received this shaman power was Ts'ima. The boy spent one night in the land below, then returned to the village, carrying the stick with him. A whole year had, of course, elapsed since his departure, so the people suspected he had been trying to obtain power. When he did not display it at once, they jeered at him, but he said nothing. That night he killed one of his father's murderers in the manner which he had been taught, and did the same every night until all who had taken part in his parent's death had been disposed of. Thus he regained his father's house and became wealthy.

* At new one would have been useless.

The orphan had not only become a shaman through the assistance of Ts'ima, he had also acquired the name, Ts'ameste-i, carrying with it a special dance prerogative, which has but recently been forgotten. The name was last used by the father of a man now living, but he disliked it on account of its similarity to the word for "death," s'ima, and accordingly, altered it.* The repository (II, p. 8) of the dance was the cave wherein the name took place; it is still called, ownsai-ima, "The Place of Death."

Kaldilko was not the only man to whom a Sisqui-ts appeared in the beginning of time. One appeared likewise to Tsaskaude (I, p. 102), in consequence of which the name Tlaqmi-ts has also been preserved by the descendants of this first man. From that time until recently none of the creatures have been seen. Early in the century, however, a certain man saw one when undergoing treatment at the Hot Springs; and in 1930 a youth saw another at a cemetery, but failed in his efforts to catch it. As there is a tendency for such creatures to appear only to those whose ancestors have seen them, and there is no tradition of such an occurrence in this lad's family, he was possibly mistaken. Perhaps he saw only a mouse which demonstrated its supernatural power by appearing in a peculiar form.

THE GOAT HUNTERS

Four brothers, the youngest of whom was named Tlaqamaldin-i, used to hunt mountain goats in the upper valley of the river which enters North Bentinck Arm at Green Bay. In some unknown fashion Tlaqamaldin-i realized that supernatural power had been granted to him, and accordingly determined to stay behind when his brothers went hunting. Every day the three went out after goats, but without success. They did not realize that this was because the youngest brother was keeping the dogs in sway by singing to them and giving them choice morsels of food. This went on for several weeks.

Then Tlaqamaldin-i said, "You stay in sway today, I will try my luck."

* Such a change would have been unthinkable before white influence had broken down the ancient customs.

1:McDowell E-5 (922-1924)948

The unfortunate hunters were only too ready to agree. Nuqumalite i set out at once and returned at nightfall with a single goat which they ate for supper. The following day he brought back two goats; the next day, three; then four, five, and six on successive days. He had received shaman's power from Mulamala Gun, which enabled him to enter their houses, hidden from the eyes of mere mortals, and throw out the meat. The three older brothers spent their time packing back to the village the large stores of meat which Nuqumalite i brought to their camp.

But in time they became jealous of their brother's phenomenal success. One day they followed Nuqumalite i and watched him climb a tall tree, which was like a ladder to him, and vanish into a precipitous cliff, in reality the entrance to a goat's house. The malicious brothers cut down the tree so that Nuqumalite i could not return. He must have become immortal, because hunters passing the place in later years sometimes heard him weeping from within the cliff, but he was never able to escape back to the land of mortals.

THE WOMAN WHO REFRAINED A WOLF

Not many hundred years ago, Kwanamalmas, a woman of Nulkum, was picking blueberries. As she neared to climb a steep bank to a shelf where she saw that the fruit was plentiful, she heard out of the berries speaking to its companions.

"Let's hide," it said, "that bad-mouthed woman is coming."

The berry was speaking of Kwanamalmas and applied the epithet "bad-mouthed" because of her habit of munching berries as she picked, instead of putting all in her basket for future consumption.

Kwanamalmas turned up the bank as swiftly that many of the berries were unable to hide, and she saw them in their human form, a host of gaggle-eyed little boys sitting on the berry shoots. On that occasion she obtained more than one of her companions. Thanks to her sight of the berries in human form, she was thereafter able to see them in their hiding places and was accordingly always fortunate. She respected the wishes of the fruit, never eating as she picked, but chewing dried salmon instead.

On a later occasion the same woman happened to see a wolf giving birth to its cubs. In some way the delivery was being retarded so that the mother wolf was in agony. Kwanamalmas unhesitatingly went to her assistance, as evergreen bough in each hand. First she drew forth the four cubs, one after another, and finally the after-birth. The grateful wolf gave her majestic the power of a shaman.

This shiny helped Kwamamdmat to raise a wall on another occasion, when the animal was choking to death on the bone-cap of some animal it had slain. All around were other bones which it had crushed successfully, but this one had somehow become wedged in its throat, so witches not successors to undress. The women inserted her hand and drew forth the bone; from these two experiences she received shamanistic power from wolves.

CHAPTER XI

MEDICINE, MAGIC, TABOO[1]

Introductory — Curative Medicine — Preventive and Curative Medicines — Incantations — Taboos — Ritual Acts — Miscellaneous Beliefs

Introductory

THE beliefs described in the last chapter are essentially religious since they display an attitude of respect and 771 allow of propitiation to supernatural powers having greater 789 strength than human beings. This is self-evident in the earlier [756] sections and, though less noticeable, is present also in ideas concerning shamans since these men have themselves acquired ability placing them on a plane lightly removed from that of their fellows. Theoretically, it seems as if a clear division ought to be drawn between the concepts just recorded, and others of a magical nature in which, although the element of contact with the supernatural is present, or the end desired is obtained by the mere performance of exertion. In the Bella Coola there is a slight overlap between the two types. For example, [777] the acquisition of an object for which supernatural good fortune may be secured is religious, but its use is virtually magical since once obtained, other supplication nor further favours are necessary. Nevertheless, it is possible to separate most magical beliefs from more religious ones, though it must be emphasized that the cleavage is less distinct to the native than it appears to the white man.

If it is difficult to find a clearcut dividing line between religion 757 and magic, it is impossible to draw one between the latter and 789 [113]

[1] The late Charles I. Smith has dealt on certain aspects of the subjects treated in this chapter in two articles: "Sympathetic Magic and Witchcraft among the Bella Coola" (American Anthropologist, vol. [illegible], n. s., Jan.-March, 1925, pp. 116-121) and "Shamanistic Shades of the Bella Coola and Neighbouring Tribes of British Columbia" (National Museum of Canada, Annual Report for 1927, Bulletin 56, pp. 47-60).

757 the science of medicine. The Bella Coola are familiar with 789 many acts which cause definite results. To place a new-born girl in contact with the representation of a beautiful woman [856] so that she may grow up to be like her, seems false science, [762] magic, to the white man; whereas the application of splints and gum to a fractured limb is a medical treatment, crude perhaps, but definitely scientific. The two are identical to the Bella Coola. They do not ask why or how a result follows, they merely know that it does. Such lore has been handed down from time immemorial; it is steeped in the sanctity of antiquity and hallowed by the knowledge that their ancestors have done the same for generations. All such acts may be described as "medicines," for so they appear to those who practise them. To separate them into magical and scientific categories would misrepresent the native point of view; the only division that can be made is between those that cause, and those that prevent or cure. Even in this there is some overlap. A medicine that cures a child from crying likewise causes him to be placid and amiable; so, too, medicines of a preventive nature comprise elements of both types. The principle governing most of these is sympathetic magic, a concept which, if put in words to the Bella Coola, would be regarded as logical and scientific. The second important class of medi-[755] cines consists of objects, either herbal or derived from the human body, which are believed to have such abundant power that they are effective against ailments of supernatural origin, or against supernatural beings themselves. Some of these have already been mentioned in connection with the attitude of the Bella Coola towards these beings of the earth, sky, and water.

754 Most curative medicines are used by the practitioner on 755 himself; most causative, on someone else. The latter are either 789 social or anti-social, depending upon whether the result is benevolent or malevolent. Shamans frequently use magical means in curing the sick and are highly regarded by the community, but medicines of the same kind may be used to kill and those who have knowledge of them are sorcerers. Even a man of this kind is not outside the pale of society unless he practices indiscriminately; members of the Kwiat society, for example, frequently employ one to kill an individual who has offended against their regulations (I, p. 740). A man is regarded as a sorcerer not on account of his knowledge but on account of the ends to which he applies it.

Closely related to, if not identical with, the belief that certain consequences follow certain acts, is the conviction that the infraction of ritual prohibitions brings disaster. There are many such taboos, for so they may be called. Though most important at the critical periods of life, puberty, pregnancy, while observing ceremonial chastity, and so forth, there are many which must be obeyed at all times.

Restrictions pertaining to the river and regulations at birth and death have already been described. Like magical acts, these often verge on the religious owing to the belief that disregard offends supernatural beings. On the whole, however, it seems as if most infractions bring their own punishment without intervention of higher powers, a concept which throws taboos into the category of magic rather than of religion, with the ever-present proviso that the two cannot be separated entirely from one another. With them may be mentioned a number of ritual acts connected with fishing and hunting in which, though the element of propitiation is not absent, it is satisfied by the performance of definite rites. Finally, there have been included in this chapter a number of unimportant beliefs, the psychology of which cannot be analyzed.

What is the basis of these rites defined as Medicine, Magic, and Taboo? As already described, the Bella Coola either do not explain their origin and function, or merely state that Alpoxnim is responsible, as he is for every activity of life. This is unsatisfactory because many which, viewed scientifically, have neither curative nor causative power, produce the desired end. A child who has been "made" a carpenter during infancy, usually grows up to be proficient in that profession; the person who has been "cured" of an illness, recovers; the man whose death has been "caused" by magic, dies. An average white man would consider such statements to be erroneous, but they not only figure in stories and beliefs, but some of them have been actually observed by the writer. The explanation lies in the susceptibility of the Bella Coola to suggestion. The conviction that he is to die so weakens a man that death often results; belief that he is to recover, aids a sick person to throw off the malady. This sentiment, intelligible in case of disease, is equally applicable in other matters. The child who has been endowed with carpentry skill grows up with the conviction to assist his labours. Moreover, his relatives and friends are also aware of it, and he receives every opportunity to practise, so that the outcome desired is often the consequence of the act. Though the Bella Coola do not appreciate that psychological and sociological factors may be the real cause of the result, they realize the importance of the power of thought. For example, if a group of people is unanimous in wishing some end, or expects some event to happen, it is believed that their thoughts are strong enough to bring about its occurrence. The following example illustrates this point:

It is said that when the white men first came to British Columbia, a tribe of Indians was living in a secluded valley, far to the north. As more and more settlers arrived, the aborigines were driven from their homes and forced into the barren mountains. One night, Mysterious came in a vision to one of the natives, saying:

"I see what you desire; you want the white men to withdraw. You, yourself, are helpless. But if all your fellows wish the same, the white men will depart."

The man told all his friends and they agreed to concentrate the next night on their wish to expel the white men. A few failed to do so, and nothing happened. The second night there was the same lack of unanimity. The desire to drive away the intruders grew stronger in course of time, until one night this was the desire of the thoughts of all; next morning the white

1:McDowell R-5 (1922-1924)948

men had vanished. It is possible that in this particular case there was a belief that Alpowiza granted the wish when convinced that all had the same desire, but this element is often entirely lacking.

Belief in the power of thought is a concept which the investigator constantly meets in Bella Coola at the present day. For example, in 1921 a government official working in the valley, purchased a representation of a neqpenaw which had been used in a ceremonial.* Although this should have been destroyed after use, no difficulty would have been raised if the ceremonial had remained a secret. Unfortunately, the buyer allowed the object to be seen by several Bella Coola and by some Carriers. This caused indignation throughout the community and news of it reached the Bella Bella, who concluded that the vendor would suffer disaster for allowing a secret object to be seen by the despised Indians of the interior. Within a year, his wife died. The Bella Bella believed that his sin had brought its own punishment, but the Bella Coola, who knew the details of the sale and did not consider the exposure of the article to have been the fault of the seller, attributed it to the power of the thoughts of the Bella Bella. They all expected that he would be punished; therefore he was punished; the expectation was sufficient to effect its own fulfilment. This incident was no fresh in the minds of several men to allow them to sell ceremonial objects to the writer.

The most common form taken by this conviction is with regard to death. If it is believed that a man will die, it is almost certain to do so. In June, 1921, a woman died in Bella Coola and her father claimed that she had been murdered by a certain man either with material poison or by magical means. He took no direct steps in revenge but stated emphatically that the man whom he suspected would die within a year. The deceased man knew of this, and more than once said that he would probably fall a victim. He became ill in May, 1923, and, though treated by a white doctor, grew steadily worse until he died in the latter part of June, three weeks after the year had elapsed. All the Bella Coola firmly believe that this was due to the power of thought. The father of the woman was a powerful chief whose thoughts were astoundingly potent, and some consider that his unuttered desires and expectations were enough to kill the mound, while others believe that his expressed statements convinced others of the result, and that it was their combined thought that caused the death. It usually requires the thoughts of more than one individual to lead to this effect. The doctor who attended this man stated that his patient had shown symptoms of melancholy and resignation during his last sickness. It seems clear that the expectation of death must have lessened his chance of recovery.

A prominent theme in Bella Coola folklore is the belief that a person cannot long survive who has made himself unpopular. It is sometimes stated that a magical means was employed to remove him, and this was no doubt often the case; a person who knows that a "medicine" had been employed to kill him is in no fit mental condition to counteract the power of suggestion, particularly if he knows that others are aware of what has been done. His death is regarded as proof of the efficacy of the means employed and the belief of others grows stronger. As already stated, this conviction still survives. When the ethnological investigation was being conducted, a point under discussion was whether or not the Kimsquit people should be allowed to live in Bella Coola. The chief took the final responsibility and overcame opposition, having thus caused the lot of would-be immigrants, he would die. He did so soon afterwards, and it is universally believed that it was caused by the concentration of the hostile thoughts of the Kimsquit. Similarly, the potency of taboos is increased by the fact that since time immemorial the thoughts of everyone have been opposed to any infraction. Consequently, an offender is liable to punishment both for breaking an injunction and because he has gone contrary to something about which there has been universal agreement for generations.

To understand Bella Coola medicines it is, therefore, necessary to regard them as concepts deep rooted in tribal history, and made potent by the suggestibility of those who practise them. This can be most clearly illustrated with regard to those effecting death, but is equally true with regard to all medicines, whether curative or causative.

There remain for consideration the sociological aspects of medicines. Knowledge of most remedies has been handed down for generations as the property of ancestral families. Some are acquainted with one or two "cures," some with many, and some with none at all. The name of the discoverer of a particular medicine is usually lost in antiquity, though it is often attributed to someone described in the family's myth. Like other possessions based on mythology, a remedy of this type can be practised by any member of the group to which it belongs. If it is observed that a certain individual is using one of these successfully, others will ask him to apply it for them. Payment is always expected, but the sum varies enormously, depending upon the efficacy of the remedy, the difficulty of operation, the generosity of the person benefited, and so many diverse factors that no general conclusions can be made. A patient may observe the details of the treatment, but unless he is entitled to it, he would never dream of using it himself. This is due not only to honesty, but to the conviction that only a person with the inherited right to a certain cure can perform it successfully. Rarely, such knowledge is sold or given away outright, but, like other possessions of an ancestral family, this usually leads to friction and jealousy on the part of those overlooked. Some of the simple herbal remedies are common knowledge and are used by all, since remembrance of their ownership, if it ever existed, has been lost. At the present time it is difficult to learn details of proprietorship of some medicines, but these are indicated whenever possible.

Curative Medicines

MEDICINES OF INFANCY

789 To Cause Tallness

850 As soon as the umbilical cord is cut, blow upon it and pull it out; the infant will grow up to be tall and big.

The following medicines are applied four days after birth.

The infant is washed, formerly in a circular cedar or cottonwood basin, and the remedy pressed against its body while drying. Some families prefer to wait until the child is able to crawl.

To Cause Strength (three means)

[824] [825] (1) Collect four pieces of bark, each from a different tree where a grizzly bear has scratched. Place them in the infant's wash-bowl, then warm them at a fire and rub over his body. This ensures him the strength of a grizzly bear.

(2) Collect four water-smoothed, green stones from the river. Place them in the infant's wash-bowl, then warm them at a fire and rub over the body. After four days, return the stones to the river.

[823] (3) Warm the body of an octopus, beaver, or wolverine in the smoke of a fire and gently press the carcass against an infant's body, saying:

"Friend, may he be like you."

This provides the child with the strength of the animal used.

To Cause Long Life

[826] [824] Collect four pieces of wood which have been rolled hard and smooth in a landslide. Boil them in the infant's wash-bowl, cool, then re-warm them at a fire and rub them over the body. This makes him strong and healthy, able to endure all dangers and weaknesses even those caused by a sorcerer. The principle is that the child will be as hardy as the wood proved itself to be by withstanding the crushing weight of stone and earth. An old Kimsquit man expressed the firm conviction that his great age was the result of this treatment soon after birth.

To Cause Impressiveness in Child

Kill a water ouzel, warm it at a fire, then press it against every part of the infant's body. This makes him as hardiness of cold water as the bird. A mergenser may be used in the same way, or the foot of one be placed in the child's hand and pressed as his fingers clench it.

To Cause a Quarrelsome Disposition

Burn the root of wasps and rub the ashes on the infant's face. He will become as bellicose and quick to resent injury as the insects. One old man who habitually beats his wife explains that this is involuntary, since he was treated in this way when a child. Fighting is no longer allowed, so the only person on whom he can exercise his martial ardour is his wife. The woman regards this treatment as a matter of course and the reason is accepted as valid by her associates.

To Cause Success in Thieving

Kill a pack-rat, warm it at a fire, and rub the carcass lightly over the infant's body. This will make him as successful a thief as the animal. Other methods are to cut off a foot and put this on the infant clenches it in his fingers, or to rub its hands with the ashes of a burnt rat.

To Cause Success in Singing

Catch a live robin or omamamuch (probably one of the thrushes), warm it at a fire, and rub it lightly against the infant's throat, saying:

"May he be a singer like you."

Then release the bird, and the child will grow up a songster. The following story is told of the power of the omamamuch's song:

1:96:Swanton E-5 (1922-1924) 1948
NES Bellacoola NES

538 In the beginning of time it used to sing.

"I shall use a spoon and eat when the Bella Coola River has burst its bounds on account of the running salmon in it."

The people used to laugh as it repeated this song year after year, until the bird changed its song:

"I shall use a spoon and eat when all is cold and clear. Then there will be Death instead of salmon in Bella Coola."

The next year the streams were so clear that no fish could be caught and the starving people asked the bird to return to its first song. When it did so, the water became murky so that it was possible to catch salmon once more.

The Bella Bella, not the Bella Coola, use the body of a blue jay to cause an infant to grow up with the ability to master difficult tones in the same way that the bird has a variety of notes. The method of applying this medicine could not be learned.

Most of the above medicines are well known and can be applied by any parent. If, however, a man has employed one of them successfully on a number of occasions, he is often requested to use his ability for others. In such a case, the father of the benefited child is expected to reimburse his friend. The application or non-application of such medicines is purely the concern of the child's family; they can use as many as they like, or none at all, according to their discretion.

To Cause Beauty

Bandages of the softest undyed cedar-bark are prepared for infants of both sexes soon after birth. A woman who is a good artist is requested to draw with charcoal two pictures on one of the pieces of bark—of handsome men if the child is a boy, or of lovely women if a girl. An unmarked wrapping is fastened round the infant's head, then the painted one so arranged that one picture is over the forehead, the other over the occiput, and finally other plain bandages to cover the whole. These are left in place for about one year. They flatten the forehead and back of the head, preventing a bulging appearance which is considered ugly, while the paintings ensure beauty of countenance. Cranial deformation has no supernatural sanction, though it is believed to have been carried out for generations. 304 789 856 [532] [826]

To Cause Leanness

Place pieces of caribou skin on an infant's wrists and ankles and leave them in position for several months. He will grow up lean and wiry, like the animal. 789 856

To Cause Left-handedness

Shake the left hand of an infant while lying in the cradle and he will be left-handed throughout life. To do this is considered a malevolent action. [825]

To Cause the Hair to Grow (two means)

(1) Rub the infant's scalp with the eye of a Hakuslk (red cod?), freshly removed from the fish's head. [825]

(2) Boil stems of the swamp gooseberry in water and rub the mixture over the infant's scalp. [824]

Wise mothers always apply one or other of these remedies to their children.

To Cause Ability in Singing (two means)

(1) When an infant is a few months old, the parents frequently request a good singer to impart to him ability similar to his own. He takes his beating-stick, spits on it, and rubs it over the child's heart, saying: 533 789 856

"Please be a singer."

This is done only for male children. [858]

(2) Boil together herbs and a bear's bladder and smear the decoction on the infant's back. He must thenceforth wear around his neck for several months a small sack containing four blue grouse gall-bladders (possibly stones from the crop were meant). This gives the child the singing ability of the bird, but the significance of the bear bladder is unknown. [825]

NE6 Bellacoola NE6

856 789 868 To Cause Ability in Carpentry (two means)

(1) When an infant is a few months old, the parents frequently request a good carpenter to impart to him ability similar to his own. He spits on his tools and rubs these over the child's heart, saying:

"Please be a carpenter."

This is done only for male children.

(2) Cut splinters from the tools of an expert carpenter, burn them, and rub the ashes over the child's hands. This is most efficacious when performed by the carpenter himself who says as he rubs:

"Please be a carpenter."

008 To Cause Ability in Thieving

Indians from the vicinity of Sitka are said to fasten a live mouse in an infant's clothing or tie one in the cradle. This causes the child to amass riches easily, but when practised by a Sitka man and woman who were slaves of the Bella Coola it was so potent that their son grew up to be an inveterate thief.

825 856 789 To Cause Ability to See Beneath the Water

When the infant is in the cradle, kill a gull, cut out its tongue, and rub this around inside the child's mouth. Strip the feathers and lay them so that the infant sleeps upon them. This gives him the same ability as the bird to see beneath the ocean and tell where fish are to be found. This was done not many years ago to a Bella Bella child whose ability was consequently so great that it frightened his friends.

To Cause Ability in Hunting

The Kitlobe achieve this by making a child sleep upon dog hair. No instance is remembered of this having actually been practised by the Bella Coola, although, being well known, there is no reason why it should not be used.

To Cause Ability in Understanding the Speech of Ravens: 125

It is well known that when ravens croak, they are really speaking, but their language is unintelligible except to one who has learnt it by means of a medicine. One of these is the following:

Catch a raven alive and cut a small piece of flesh from its body, beneath the left wing, taking care not to kill the bird. Release it, after having fed the morsel to the child. An infant so treated will grow up able to learn from ravens of the approach of visiting parties, strangers, visitors, and all other news which they constantly circulate in their loud calling. It is said that the last person so endowed was the father of a Kitsumpis man about forty years of age in 1922. His ability lasted throughout childhood but he lost it through infraction of a taboo.

The following medicines are used between the ages of one and two:

To Cause Long Life

One year after birth, holes are pierced through the lobes of the ears and the nasal septum. In the beginning of time, Alpanéw told the forefathers of the Bella Coola that if this were not done, the boy or girl would die young.

To Cause Ability in Hunting

When the umbilical cord of a female infant falls, her father places it within the knot-hole of a tree, where it is preserved from rain but where it rots and is forgotten. A boy's is preserved with care. The parents wrap it in soft goat's wool and place it in the box where the father keeps his most cherished possessions; this causes the child to be careful, and to grow up with a tendency to treasure his acquisitions rather than to dispose heedlessly of them. As the first anniversary of his son's birth approaches, his father begins to observe ceremonial chastity, endeavouring to estimate the time so that its culmin-

[illegible] ceiling point shall be one year after the birth. Early on the [illegible] morning of this day, he takes the umbilical cord and goes far [illegible] into the mountains until he finds a place where the grass is [illegible] worn and the earth packed, showing that a mountain goat [illegible] has slept there. He digs a hole, inserts the cord in it, and covers it with stones, praying as he does so:

"Please, father! May my son be skilful, may he be successful in hunting mountain goats."

This has the effect of showing the child where these animals are to be found. The father then returns home.

Four days later he goes back to the same spot, digs up the umbilical cord, brings it home and hangs it in the doorway of the house. Should this be omitted, the child would have an inverse longing to hunt in the mountains and would have home as the first opportunity, but would be unable to return. The cord is left suspended for four days, then taken to the house and deposited under an overhanging rock where no water can penetrate. It dries in course of time but no further attention is paid to it.

A child so reared begins to hunt birds and squirrels when he is eight or ten years of age, and later follows mountain goats with obsidian-pointed arrows. This medicine has been handed down in certain families for generations. If a person, not possessing the prerogative, wishes to have it applied to his child, he requests one who is entitled to use it to perform with his son's umbilical cord in the manner just described. He is later paid for his assistance.

A similar, though simpler medicine is for the father to take the fallen umbilical cord to the mountains immediately and bury it beneath stones where a mountain goat has been lying. Four days later he returns to the spot, digs up the cord, and brings it home, thus ensuring that the child will have no fear of the mountains and will be a successful hunter of mountain goats. In such cases it is necessary for the mother to preserve her son's cord during his childhood so that he will not become careless.

To Cause Strength

Place pieces of octopus flesh in the infant's hand and wrap him with them. This causes him to grow up with the strength of the animal.

To Cause Understanding of the Speech of Women

When a child is able to totter, but has not learn to talk, place him in a box and wrap his upside down. Leave him alone for four days and four nights, passing in what food is necessary during the[illegible].

Knowledge of this medicine was learnt from Ibu, a female slave born near New Westminster who was owned by the maternal grandfather of the wife of the elderly Kitsilano man from whom the information was obtained. The slave's father had owned her in the way often as infant, while as confined she had not only learnt the language of women, but Coast[illegible], her own speech, as well. Ibu used to tell the Kitsilano people of her ability, but few believed her, though she asserted that this was a well-known Coast[illegible] method, and her owners had their own means of imparting the same ability to their children, as well as an ancient condition of the practice she described. One day she informed her master that the women had told her of the near approach of a visiting party. He summoned the chiefs, but they laughed at the warning and disregarded it. Ibu received the same intimation for four days, and on the fourth the visitors appeared and she was vindicated.

The invention of the box is due to the belief that women, when bringing news, turn over upon themselves like mallee pigeons. The Bella Coola do not know whether the box must be so tight as to hold the child upside down.

To Cause Commercial Intelligence

When a child is one or two years of age, point on to back the picture of a black bear's gall-bladder. Leave this in position for four days, then wash it off secretly in a mountain stream. A child so treated will grow up with ability to perform [illegible] ceremonial dances without making attention. The Belle Belle paint a representation of a wolf's bladder for the same purpose.

The basis of this medicine is the belief that it is the gall bladder which causes wildness and intelligent fear, and hence that anyone on whomsoever will be careful not to make attention. A bird with a large bladder is thought to be difficult to approach, whereas a deer, which has a small one, or none at all, is often singularly tame. This medicine is known only to the members of certain families and is used for the children of chiefs alone, since even on the part of others is a matter of little importance.

[illegible] of [illegible]

Some of the instruction given to boys and girls, and the acts which they are expected to perform, are virtually religious, and have accordingly been described in earlier chapters. For example, when a lad reaches to the river before daybreak, wraps himself with a smooth stone and prays to Alpamaiu, he is carrying out what might with justice be called a religious act. If, however, he believes that mere washing is enough to compel some desire or end, it is magical. Different Belle Chela have different sentiments concerning the exact means by which this method causes the desired effect. To some it is unquestionably a true prayer, but to other families it is necessary for a father to take his son, when he has reached about eight years of age, and wash him four times, to the accompaniment of the usual prayer. It is believed that this causes the lad to grow up powerful and active, constantly striving for success. This type of washing may be called magical.

In the following there is no element of uncertainty, they belong unquestionably to the category described in the preceding section.

To Cause Agility

The following medicine is frequently employed by fathers when their sons are first able to walk.

Get a squirrel, clean it, wash the entrails carefully and have one hanging in the sun to dry for four days, then on them round the child's stomach for four days more. It is important that the infant should not break the string. On the fourth day, remove them and hang them in the doorway of the hut. On the same day, another squirrel must be killed, treated as before, and its viscera allowed to dry for four days. The old ones done in the same way for four days, when they are hung in the doorway. A third squirrel, and finally a fourth, is killed and made use of in precisely the same manner. Then the final set of entrails has been hung up, the four are suspended for four days, till the twenty-eighth after the dying of the first animal, when the father takes them to the hut and deposits them beneath some projecting rock where water can penetrate and where they will dry and hang definitely.

To ensure the child to grow up endowed, like the squirrel, with glory so that he can scale over precipitous mountains. This ceremony is frequently used in conjunction with one for family ability.

To Cure Easy Delivery

[648]

Dip the horns of a porcupine against the back of a girl's neck or allow it to drop to the ground. Pick it up, replace it, and it is to fall again. This is repeated four times while the persuasive:

"Come, may she be like you and have no trouble in giving birth."

To medicine can be used at any time before puberty.

To Cure Bravery (four means)

(1) When a grizzly bear has been slain, a lad who wishes to test himself bravely approaches it and thrusts his arm down the dog animal's throat. This kills it by choking. Then he rubs a hand over his heart and the back of his neck, the arm

[774]

825 of the spirit, which imparts to himself the courage and strength 789 of the animal he has just slain.

826 (c) When a grizzly bear has been killed and skinned, the [794] bloody pelt is wrapped around a lad whose parents wish him to be brave. He is bedded in securely and the bundle, attached to a long rope, is thrown into the rapids. After a few minutes, it is drawn ashore, but immediately thrown in again. This is repeated four times. This medicine causes the child to have the courage of a grizzly bear. It is said that the first youth to whom this was applied rescued his mother from slavery among the Tsimshian.

This treatment is usually applied to boys of from three to five years of age.

(d) When a grizzly bear has been killed and skinned, two lads, whose parents wish them to be brave, are called. They are told to crouch on their hands and knees and while in this position the pelt is thrown over their backs. They crawl to and fro for a few minutes while dogs are encouraged to bark and growl at the "animal." The skin is then removed and the two men go to wash in the river. They are called back and the whole rite repeated a second time, followed by a third and a fourth application, with washing in every case. This gives them the bravery of grizzly bears.

This medicine can be used at any time before the holding of sexual intercourse.

(e) When an octopus has been killed, a lad is placed within the freshly removed skin. Then persons say:

"Person, may he be like you, afraid of nothing."

The skin is removed and the lad goes to wash in the river. The rite is repeated four times which gives him the bravery of an octopus. Like the bear, this medicine is not proper for one who has held sexual intercourse.

To Cause Ability to Know Wind

Fasten a bag in the freshly removed skin of a beaver and throw the bundle into the river. Life is not when it has gone beneath the surface, and throw it in a second time. Repeat this four times. If the wrapping has been carefully fastened, little water leaks in and the child suffers no discomfort. This causes him to grow up confident and brave with regard to canoeing and every kind of activity on the river. Like the last medicine, this is not potent for one who has held sexual intercourse. It cannot be applied to a girl since beaver are unfavorable to women who must observe many taboos concerning them.

To Cause Modesty and Respect for One's Elders

When a boy is about six or eight years of age, his father beats him lightly, four times, with a cypress-rod. This is done in the early morning, then he takes his son to wash immediately. Four days later the beating and washing are repeated. From this time on, a parent should whip his son four times every fourth morning until he is old enough to marry. The force of the chastisements increases as the lad grows older, so that when he is about fourteen years of age, he is beaten with the full force of his parent's arm. It is a point of honour for a lad to endure his whippings without whimpering; one who shows the pain he is suffering is laughed at by his fellows and not allowed to wash with them. This medicine makes a child strong, manly, respectful to his elders, and, generally, the type of individual to whom supernatural beings are likely to show favour.

This practice has long been discontinued and it was impossible to learn whether or not it had ever been carried out with full vigour. Several of the older men stated that in their childhood they had been beaten periodically by their fathers, but none had had this last over a period of years. It was claimed that such had been the case in earlier times, but it seems almost certain that this type of chastisement could never have been carried out regularly. During the winter, for example, when social dances were taking place, the whole community used to sleep late and it is impossible that a father can every fourth morning to whip his son. It is clear, however, that such was regarded as proper by anyone practising this medicine, even though few did so regularly.

[illegible]

To Cause Ability in Hunting

When a bear has been killed and the first incision made for skinning it, take a puppy, force its head inside the opening, and roll it to and fro. Throw the animal into the river and when it has swum ashore, repeat the rite. If this act is repeated four times, the dog will grow up to be a good hunter.

To Cause Ability in Hunting Bears

Wrap the puppy in the freshly removed skin of a bear and throw it into the river to the accompaniment of hatchet-chopping from as many as happen to be present. After submersion for a few moments, remove the bundle and throw it in again. Repeat this twice more. This makes the dog grow up unafraid of water and, accordingly, useful in hunting bears.

To Cause Disregard of Bloody Dens

Lay some black powder on the nose of a sleeping puppy and ignite it. The dog will grow up without fear of muddy dens.

To Cause Keen Scent

Hit any kind of animal so that the liver is exposed and hold the puppy with its nose immediately over this. Make an incision in the tip so that the blood flows freely on to the organ of the animal. Shift the animal until the bear gathered from all directions to feast upon the fat and fresh blood.

The dog will grow up with the ability to leave game in any direction, just as the gallon whenever there is blood. He will also have their ability to travel without requiring a path. One old man stated that this medicine was the property of an [illegible] family, and should be used when a puppy is one month old.

To Cause Ability in Hunting Mountain Game

Scrape the freshly removed head of a fakun, wolf, or wolverine to smoke for four days. Break a hole in the top of the skull and hold the puppy's head over this, then stir to cause so that the blood drips down into the interior of the cranium. Release the dog, take the head to the mountains and bury it in the ground beneath a spot where mountain goats have been sleeping. Dig it up four days later and conceal it under a shelving rock where it is protected from the rain.

This medicine causes the dog to grow up with knowledge of the haunts of mountain goats as well as with the bravery of whichever animal was used. This means can be practised only by members of the crescent families to which it belongs.

To Cause Ability in Hunting Bears or Seals

Obtain the head of whichever is desired, and proceed as described for mountain goats. Instead of burying, place the skull under shelter near a creek mouth frequented by land otters, or near the ocean where seals are plentiful. It need not be taken up after four days.

To Cause General Ability

This medicine can be applied only by a successful hunter, who expects compensation for his assistance. It is employed when a puppy is about one month old.

Early in the morning the hunter seats himself on a log within the house of the dog's owners, his legs stretched out before him. He seizes the puppy firmly and passes it, sunwise, around and under his legs four times, frequently spitting on it to cure and brushing it with his hands to make it superabundant. This causes the animal to grow up with good tracking ability, while the passing under is fatalistic to its owners. Then the hunter seizes the dog by the hind legs and swings it four times, sunwise, over and through the smoke of the fire. This prevents it from being dizzy and afraid of precipitous mountains, but if it pulls on it towards through the air, it will be a poor dog. Finally, the hunter carries it to the door and throws [illegible] it in. He arises as swims ashore and throws it back once more. This is repeated four times and causes the animal to have no fear of man.

In former times great attention was paid to the training of young dogs.

MEDICINES CONNECTED WITH LOVE, MARRIAGE, AND CHILDBIRTH

[illegible] To Cause Love

This medicine is used by women to men, and by men to women.

Obtain a hair of a person whose love is sought, place with it one of the wearer and tie the two in a strip of birch-bark together with a scale of octopus skin. This causes intense desire between the two. This medicine is usually personally applied by amorous males.

A similar usage is to wear the two hairs near the stomach, hidden by a belt. Men, especially, do this to cause love on the part of girls who they admire. An old Bella Coola mentioned that he had on had occasion to investigate the box of a Kitamaat man with which he found the tip of a land otter's tail, quill, and containing two small tufts of hair, one the owner's, the other, a wife's. This ensured lasting devotion between the two.

To Cause Love for Itself

A few years ago certain Kalief of Kitamaat used the following medicine to cement two sisters:

He made two forms, one representing a male, and the other a female. Touch he tied birch-bark, octopus-skin, a lock of his own hair and some obtained from the girls. Each figure was provided with sexual organs, and he placed them in position for sexual intercourse. This caused the two girls to desire Kalief so ardently that they almost became demented in their infatuation. Their mother, Kwa-ooa, suspected that Kalief had been using something of the kind and searched his her during his absence. As soon as she had found the figure, she called in all the people, showed them her discovery, and suggested throwing them into the fire. Some objected, pointing out that if Kilisi had been using them, their destruction would cause his death. It was decided to test him, so no one told the lover that he had been found out, and he suspected nothing on his return. When he went into another house, Ewe-ewe placed the figures near the fire; immediately, Kilisi tried to lie down at the edge of the one near him, and was restrained only by some of the bystanders. This proved his guilt conclusively. Ewe-ewe washed the figures to destroy their power, which caused Kilisi to lose his desire to enter a fire, and at the same time destroyed the love of the two girls for him.

This medicine can be made only by a skilful carpenter; its real potency lies in the ingredients though the figures cause it to work more speedily.

To Strengthen Virility

This medicine is used by old men.

Catch a porcupine alive and cut out a quill from near its tail so that the blood flows freely. Prick the penis with the quill until the human blood mingles with the animal's. Potency follows at once.

To Cause Conception

A medicine was formerly known to cause a free conception, but it has been forgotten. A mother, however, who has just lost an infant, can ensure the birth of another by bringing a stone from the cemetery four days after her bereavement. If she leaves this beneath her bed for four nights, and then throws it away carelessly, anywhere, she will soon be pregnant.

To Prevent Conception

A medicine with this effect was formerly known but has been forgotten.

To Cause Birth of a Child of the Desired Sex

If a boy is desired: The pregnant woman must have prepared for her a miniature bow and arrows on which she sleeps for four nights and then throws into the fire.

If a girl is desired: The pregnant woman must have prepared for her miniature tools used for beating cedar-bark on which she sleeps for four nights and then throws into the fire.

To Cause Easy Delivery (two means)

(a) The pregnant woman must boil stalks of stonecrop in water and drink freely of the decoction.

(b) A variant of the medicine already described can be applied during pregnancy. Strike the back of the woman with one or more porcupine embryos. The drowsy must remain in concealment and the woman to be benefited must be unaware of what is about to be done.

To Cause Increased Flow of Milk

Wear pads of Sedum lineatum(Hook) and apply them as a poultice to the breasts of the nursing mother.

MISCELLANEOUS MEDICINES USED BY ADULTS

To Cause Energy

Take the paw of a freshly killed beaver in one hand and pat it with the other, saying:

"Paws, may I be like you."

This ensures that the man or woman will always work hard, like a beaver.

To Cause Long Life

Pick up a stick, spit on it four times, saying:

"May I be strong like you," and put it down carefully.

The basis of this medicine is the belief that trees are capable of enduring greater pressure than other animals. For example, if one is caught in an alachan net, it survives the crushing weight of fish and water and is alive when the net is emptied, though all other living animals so measured are killed.

It is said that one man accidentally swallowed when spitting on a nail, and swallowed the contents. It lived within his stomach for fifty years, causing no discomfort though he never could feel it moving, and its singing could be heard at intervals. This brought him no supernatural power, although he was enabled by it to live to a great age. When at last he died, the nail came hopping out of his throat and was carried respectfully to the river by his friends who covered the container with eagle down and dried and unfolded cedar-bark.

Some of the uses already described with regard to animals and fish are similar in nature to this medicine.

To Cause Obesity

A medicine was formerly used by chiefs to make them fat and impressive-looking, but details of it have been forgotten.

To Cause Ability to Singing

Catch an amphibious (?aerial dwelling?) alive and put it four times against the throat of the woman to whom it is desired to impart the art, saying:

"Why do be a singer like you."

Release the bird and the woman will become a good singer.

This bird is considered by the Bella Coola to be the best songster among British Columbia birds, and they say that many animals and fish, including even the halibut, gather to hear its singing.

To Cause Ability to Dancing

There is a poisonous plant which, when eaten, almost kills the eater. If he recovers, he is henceforth endowed with great ability as a dancer. The species could not be ascertained.

To Cause Change in Weather

If a cold wind is desired: Place the penis of a mountain goat or beaver on a fire.

If rain is desired: Wash the penis of a large bear, and throw it into the water or a river, saying:

"Flame, may it be as it was when you held [illegible]."

The basis of these medicines is their numerous gums and leaves; more in November when it is cold, and less in October when it is rainy.

An old Kimaqui man mentioned that one wings he had been driven ashore by continuous cold winds and ship on the coast of morning. He drew a bark and by using the medicine just described was able to bring rain with consequent lessening of wind so that he could continue his journey.

[illegible]

To Destroy the Benefits of Another's Ceremonial Chastity

Place pieces of flesh from any recently skinned animal within a mile from which the absence of an enemy has been removed, covering at the same time the name of the person to be injured. This destroys the "charisma" acquired by the observance of ceremonial chastity.[1]

To Cause Insanity in a Woman

Catch a squirrel alive and tie one of the woman's hairs around its stomach; then release the animal. He is now violently thrown the forest, sometimes head upwards, sometimes head downwards, so will the brain of the person whose hair is in carrying begin to shake violently all madness ensues.

To Cause Poverty in Grizzly Bears

Throw the body of a recently killed woodbear against a man's back. The man grizzly bear he encounters will be fearless, and may kill him. Knowledge of this medicine was learnt by noticing that a number of men who had been struck in play with woodbears, were killed by grizzly bears. The potency of the act has since been recognized.

To Cause Disease in a Midphase

A number of years ago, when three Bella Coola were killed

[1] This medicine has been from a white missionary informant and was not available to others.

to a skirmish by the Caribou, one of their women enlisted a 754 body by poking out the eyes. The corpses were raised and [727] a Bella Coola with secret knowledge dropped in the eye sockets some potent medicine. As the corpses rose, the murderers began to suffer pains, and the woman who had poked out the eyes lost her sight. As a blind, old woman, she had been seen by several men with whom she never was discussed.

To Cause the Death of a Murderer (three means)

(a) Two women were murdered at Kitsegukla in 1913. 754
Before they were buried, an elderly Bella Coola put a secret 682 medicine on the back of the neck of each so that the murderer [766] would die from a disease beyond them. Within eight months, a Kitsegukla man accumulated in a deep sore on the back of the neck, and it was assumed that he must have killed Kitsegukla women and perpetrated the double murder.

Medicines like this and the preceding are widely known, but it is sorcerers who specialize in using them.

(b) When a man dies suddenly and murder suspected, [766]
although the perpetrator is unknown, place the eyes within an old, hollow spruce log. As it rots, maggots enter the flesh and as the years time the body of the murderer becomes hollowed and full of worm. This method unemployed [675] during the lifetime of an informant and caused the death of the suspected murderer, whose guilt was thereby proved as proved.

(c) Bury the victim's body with a road to its mouth and [766]
the murderer will soon die.[1]

To Kill 754

Lift a corpse from the ground and place it on or over individuals. This causes their death in the near future.

[1] This information was obtained from one informant only. Most men would die, not unknown, but when such are to succeed.

Preventive and Curative Measures

MEMBERS OF INFANCY AND CHILDHOOD

189 To Counteract Dangers Incurred During Pregnancy (two means)

174 (1) As already described (I, p. 96), there is always danger of 843 a person losing his spirit through a sudden start, causing involun-825 tary contraction of the muscles, but pregnant women are especially liable to peril of this kind. Moreover, the unexpected appearance of a toad, rat, or mouse, though insufficient to harm an expectant mother, may suffice to startle the unborn child, or even to destroy his spirit. A woman carefully remembers all experiences of this kind and treats the injury while her infant is crying immediately after birth. If a toad has caused it, she catches one, decorates it with dyed cedar-bark, and places it on the child's stomach, then guides it so that it jumps up the chest to the neck. This is repeated four times. She then sets it down, unharmed on the ground, saying:

"You are the cause of the trouble, please go."

The same rite is carried out for all small mammals, reptiles, and even with birds which have startled a mother by their peculiar behaviour. In some families it is customary to post-[840] pone the application of this medicine until four days after birth. There is considerable difference of opinion concerning the specific injury; some allege that the spirit of the creature enters the body and, if not counteracted, causes the child to be born sick and feeble.

843 (2) During his wife's pregnancy, a husband must preserve
825 a small portion of the skin of every animal killed. Four days 189 after birth, as the infant lies in its cradle, a small fire is built [840] beneath and the pieces thrown thereon so that the child is [961] enveloped in the smoke. If this is neglected, the boy or girl will [774] die during infancy, though the means by which the skin animals accomplish this is not fully understood. Possibly, as in the last instance, their spirits have entered the body. Some hunters preserve an eye from every carcass instead of a piece

5:56:Dorsetts E-5 (1912-1914)944

of fur. Even at the present time, the death of a new-born child is usually attributed to omission of this precaution. 845

A Kimsquit man mentioned that he had once shot a marten during his wife's pregnancy, and had failed to preserve a piece of the skin. The bullet had passed through the head, making a hole in the cheek bone beneath the eye. He thought no more of the incident until after the birth of a daughter with a blemish on her cheek in the same place as the wound on the marten's. The spot grew bigger, and the flesh began to mortify until the infant died a few weeks later. Her face resembled that of the animal and he is convinced that his loss was caused, in some way, by the marten. 825 784 [761]

To Cure Indigestion

Kill a raven, cut out a morsel of flesh from beneath its left wing, and then remove the lower. Place both in the infant's mouth and leave them there until wet with saliva. Replace them in the bird's body and tie a strip of dyed cedar-bark around its neck. Carry the carcass to some lonely spot in the mountains and hide it beneath a jutting rock where no water can penetrate. This cures the child. If, however, anyone should find the raven's body before the flesh has decayed, the patient would die. 755 [761]

This remedy, widely employed for small children, was used with success by an informant for his young daughter. It is not sufficiently potent for adults.

To Cure Crying

The Bella Coola consider that crying is not only unpleasant, but actively displeasing to the supernatural beings who permit it at death alone. Consequently, the persistent wailing of a child is likely to cause the death of a relative in order that the tears shed may have justification. Many stories illustrate this theme; in fact, to cry for no real reason is practically taboo. A mother quiets a fretting child by saying: 827 865 761 [784] [861]

"Do you want your father and me to die?"

Libb:Dorsey B-1 (1922-1924) 1948
NES Bellacoola NES

861
827 865
[861]

If the father dies, she beats her son or daughter, adding: "Cry now. See what you did."

Henceforth the child receives himself, but usually drastic steps are taken to reform an infant before his weeping causes any such misfortune. The parents of a petulant child request aid from a man of even temperament to cure him. The person undertaking the task prepares a large basket, watches until he notices the youngster crying and displaying bad temper, then seizes the offender, thrusts him into the basket and hangs it in the doorway, free to move with every stir of the child shut within.

"Cry as much as you like now," he says. "If you become fretful like a heron you will turn into one of those birds."

This threat is based on an ancient story describing how a child to whom this was done changed into a heron and flapped away in bird form. Sometimes the man says that the same will happen to the child, or simply that he will be able to fly like a heron. All day he is left suspended, no one heeding his sobbing and howling; but in the evening he is taken down, petted, and told not to be naughty again. This medicine always cures a petulant child who can thereafter be held to ridicule by being reminded that he is "A Basket Boy." The same remedy is often employed for a quarrelsome brother and sister who are shut up together.

865 To Cure Disobedience and Rudeness

861 If a child is persistently rude and disobedient to his parents, they request the assistance of a man of even temperament to cure him. The person selected must be one who is never angry, and who attends to his own business in a placid, quiet manner. The mother and father discuss who is best fitted by character to help their erring child and then ask his aid, promising a suitable recompense. If the man accepts the task, he waits till he notices the child crying peevishly. Running to him, he holds the youngster firmly and, in spite of this strug-

b McDowell E-5 (1922-1924)948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

gles, bites him between the eyes or at the back of the neck so that a little blood flows. 865 861

"If you don't keep quiet," he says to the screaming child, "I shall bite you all over your head."

This medicine acts in two ways: (1) The offender is so frightened that he is likely to reform; (2) Contact with a man of good disposition imparts the same to him. A tuft of mountain goat wool is inserted into the wound to make it heal properly.

To Cure Disobedience and Laziness 461

Parents whose child exhibits these bad qualities also ask help of a man of good character. If he accepts the task, he provides himself with a bone needle and waits until he hears the child refuse to perform some simple task. Then, with a rush, he throws the offender on his stomach and supposits the needle until the blood flows freely. He then releases the frightened child who usually slinks away to bed for the rest of the day. When the bleeding has ceased, the quiet person cuts chips from the canoe of an energetic man and rubs them on the wound, saying: 865 861

"There, may you be like the canoe, always active and doing whatever is expected of you."

An old Kitsequit man recalled vividly the application of this medicine to him when he refused to fetch water for his mother. He was about eleven years of age at the time and asserted that it had greatly improved his behaviour.

MEDICINES FOR ORDINARY DISEASES

For Sprains and Bruises 752

Pound stalks of false hellebore, mix with hemlock gum, and bind on the injured spot as a poultice.

For Swollen Neck

Cut off small pieces of a thoroughly smoked bear's heart, pound in water, and drink the mixture. 757

757 For Head-ache

Tie around the forehead a piece of dyed cedar-bark, undyed cedar-bark, or other similar material. No herbal remedy is known.

For Eye Trouble

Moisten the finger with saliva and rub the eyes with it.

For Baldness (two means)

(1) Boil cottonwood buds in water, causing the gum to exude. Skim this from the surface, mix with fresh olachen grease or oil obtained from sockeye salmon, and rub on the scalp.

(2) Rub on the scalp oil from olachen, dog-fish, or any kind of salmon. The best is grease from the liver (?) of a dog-fish, obtained by hanging the organ before a fire and collecting the drops which exude.

For Skin Irritation

Rub dog-fish liver oil on the rash or itching part.

955 828 For Excessive Dreaming and Nightmares (two means)

(1) Burn dried salmon beneath the bed of the person afflicted.

(2) Lie in a canoe which has been chiselled out to the right thickness but has not been widened and hardened by smoke. A mat is laid across for this purpose and the smoke directed beneath, thoroughly fumigating anyone lying within. An informant was so treated as a young man when he was greatly troubled by nightmares in which he used to see a huge head which so terrified him that he would leave his bed to rush around the house shrieking and tearing his hair. This medicine cured his trouble.

757 For Canker

Pound up a snail and rub on the sore spot within the mouth.

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)1948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

For Cold 757

Snuff dried urine such as is found around the rims of unemptied chamber pots. Kāmai·ts taught the ancestors of the Bella Coola that this was good for colds. [773]

For Sore Throat

Boil cottonwood buds in dog-fish oil and drink about a teaspoonful of the decoction at intervals until cured. Dog-fish oil, being a necessary ingredient in many medicines, is always kept on hand for emergencies.

For Coughing

Boil roots of false hellebore in water and drink the decoction freely. It is so poisonous that the patient usually falls to the ground, spitting blood. Coughing is one of the many ailments cured by this plant.

Another remedy is used for a person whose cough causes him to spit frequently. A friend collects some of the fresh expectoration, mixes it with salmon roe, and places it where ravens are accustomed to feed. This is done four times and the patient is cured if the birds devour the mixture. 755

For Whooping-Cough

Boil cottonwood buds in water with the fat of any animal and drink frequently. 757

For Sores and Boils

Warm dried urine and rub on the part affected. Like the remedy for colds, it was Kāmai·ts who taught this to the ancestors of the Bella Coola. Gum or tobacco is sometimes added to the urine, and applied like a poultice. [773]

For Boils (two means)

(1) Heat human excrement thoroughly and apply to the boil, tying it in position with cloth. At intervals, add more, without removing the bottom layer and leave in position for

McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924) 1968
NEB Bellacoola NEB

757 about one week. This causes the skin to turn white and draws out the matter.

752 [177] (2) The usual remedy for boils and similar sores is cutting. There are no professional surgeons so that a patient merely requests a friend in whom he has confidence to perform the operation which is now carried out with a metal knife instead of an obsidian blade. A man frequently performs on himself and it is not uncommon to see a Bella Coola sitting nonchalantly with the blood streaming down his leg into a receptacle filled with water. Even when a boil is on the buttocks, it may be cut by sitting down on a knife, but in this case a friend is always present to state when the position is correct.

752 754 For Ulcers and Abscesses

A few individuals, at present two at Bella Coola and one at Kimsquit, have the necessary skill to locate and operate on ulcers of the stomach. They have no inherited prerogative, their ability is due solely to practice and good sense. If a person suffers from internal pains and believes them to be caused by an ulcer, he requests one of these men to help him. The practitioner kneads and handles the patient to locate the growth, and suggests operating if he thinks it necessary. He measures off on the blade of a knife the depth required for the incision and asks consent to make such a cut. If the sufferer considers it too deep, he may indicate a shorter distance on the knife, or he may desire a still deeper one. As soon as patient and surgeon have agreed upon the depth of the wound, the latter inserts the knife to the proper distance, twists it around, and draws it out. If he has diagnosed correctly, pus comes pouring out; the wound is drained by the insertion of an eagle quill, and in many cases the patient recovers. Several instances are remembered of too deep cutting, resulting in penetration of the intestines and death. A surgeon is always suitably rewarded for his work.

It is believed that such operations were performed before the introduction of metal knives. Whether or not this be true, it is certain that one of this type took place about 1870. No information could be obtained about other surgical practices. The Bella Coola are unacquainted with either tenpining or cupping, and it is most unlikely that they performed more than cutting and the setting of broken limbs. Though incisions are primarily for boils and abscesses, one may be made in case of any obstinate pain, in the belief that some foreign matter has entered the body and must be removed.

[illegible]

For Stomach-Ache (two means)

(1) Peel the outer surface of red elderberry roots and chew a section until all the juice has been squeezed forth and swallowed; then spit out the tasteless bark and take a second piece. This must be continued for some time. It is dangerous to allow the liquid to remain within the stomach, so warm water must be taken as an emetic.

(2) Take five roots of the plant ma'xwal-i, each about one-tenth of an inch in diameter and one inch in length, grind them to powder and pour on water. Warm the mixture to body heat and drink in large quantities. This acts as an emetic and the patient feels hungry after vomiting. If cooked for a longer time, the roots provide a valuable food.

This medicine is not sufficiently potent for serious attacks.

For Stomach-Ache, and also for Other Internal Pains (two means)

(1) Strip the bark from a kiek'nlp (birch?) branch a few inches in diameter and about three feet in length, and boil for an hour in a small amount of water. Care must be taken not to boil the decoction too long or it will become poisonous. Drink about four cupfuls of the mixture. It causes the stomach to heave violently, followed by vomiting. Then drink warm water, which also acts as an emetic. Take a further potion of the medicine, then more water, and continue with alternate doses until the vomit is clear. This medicine is so powerful that a patient usually recovers by the following day.

757 (c) Place on the surface of the skin nearest the pain hemlock gum and a human bone taken from that part of the skeleton adjacent to the seat of the discomfort.

[824] This medicine is the property of several ancestral families and can be used only by members of them.

For Stomach Trouble and Rheumatism

Scrape in the earth a hole about six inches deep and six feet in length. In the bottom deposit a large number of hot stones and cover them with a thin layer of clay and mixed with fine gravel. On these place as many herbal medicines as possible, such as nettles, devil's club bark, western dock, cottonwood leaves, green moss-like growths from water-covered stones, bark from spruce saplings, and the debris from cones eaten by squirrels. The actual ingredients vary according to season; in winter, for example, only one or two may be available. Mats are thrown over the plants for the patient to lie upon, covered by additional ones. A helper is always present to sprinkle him with water when the heat becomes too great and to rub away the sweat which pours off with a sponge of undyed cedar-bark. Instances are remembered of patients going to sleep in this type of sweat-house and being severely burnt.

For a person who is very ill, the hole is dug within the house, near the central fire, otherwise it is located at any convenient spot in the woods. This remedy is known to, and can be used by, everyone.

For Stomach Trouble and Water in the Blood

Dig a hole about three feet deep and with the same diameter. Throw hot stones in the bottom and place a rack of crossed and tied sticks across the excavation below the level of the ground. On this place medicinal herbs as described in the last remedy. The patient squats over the hole, enclosed in a tent-like shelter of mats or cedar-bark. Water is thrown on the stones and the enclosure prevents the resultant steam from escaping.

This type of smoke-house, which can be used by anyone, is usually built in the forest. The Bella Coola have great confidence in the use of one as a means of curing all types of internal ailments, especially from the bad effects of water which is believed to have entered the blood. In former years many patients were blinded by the water affecting their eyes, so that a recent improvement has been the construction of a door-like opening through which the head projects. Many stories are told of people being cured in this way after a white doctor had abandoned hope. [B57]

No Bella Coola had heard of a smoke-house large enough to contain more than a single individual, and a question whether they were ever used as meeting-places was regarded as highly humorous and absurd. [B45]

For Ailments of the Heart

The patient must eat some of his own excrement mixed with certain herbs, of which it was impossible to learn the species. This remedy can be used only by the members of certain ancestral families. [B24]

For the Blood

The following medicine is the property of certain families; consequently, anyone else who wishes to use it must obtain the services of an owner to apply it, and must recompense him for so doing. [B24]

The man who is to apply the remedy locates a pond where water-lilies are growing and then searches for four spruce saplings growing in line, approximately east to west. He cuts four branches from the east side of each tree and lays them beside the pond with a small space between each bunch. Then he pulls up some lily roots, lays them in the three gaps between the boughs, and wraps the whole into a bundle with a cord consisting of alternate strands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark which he winds around, clock-wise. On returning home, the practitioner must not carry his burden through the door but [757] throw it in through the smoke-vent. He cuts the roots into thin slices which are boiled in water for four days. The patient drinks several cupfuls of the decoction which never fail to benefit him.

[757] The basis of this medicine is the belief, already described, that when a sutsuf swims through a pond it frequently sheds some of its scales which become water-lilies. They are, therefore, potent in themselves and are of greatest benefit to one who has practised ceremonial chastity. The patient must observe several taboos for forty days after treatment: He must hold no sexual intercourse; must eat neither salmon nor meat that has not been smoked; must eat nothing cooked either by a menstruating woman or by one who has lost her husband within a year; and must not approach a girl during the year following puberty. The breaking of one of these taboos causes [761] his death, and the man who has administered the medicine watches the conduct of his patient with great care.

[755] For Debility (two means)

(1) Drink strong, stale urine, mixed with red rock-paint ground fine.

[764] Knowledge of this medicine has been handed down for generations in certain families. It is said to be most unpleasant to take.

(2) The following medicine, said to be the most potent known to the Bella Coola, is used for a person who has long been feeble, especially if he has been spitting blood. It is the [764] property of several ancestral families, and must be administered by an elderly male member of one of them.

The owner of the remedy obtains a dry, clean skull, places within it a little water which he brings to a boil with hot pebbles and adds a small quantity of mountain goat marrow. The patient is given a dry stick, about three feet in length, from which the pith has been extracted to make a tube. With this he sucks four times, swallowing a little of the decoction, while the practitioner says to the skull:

"Please remedy the invalid." 755

This is virtually a prayer, addressed to the deceased owner of the skull, and accordingly verges on appeal to the dead. Note the less, there is no concept of active supplication to any individual ghost, but rather of acquiring aid by the use of a supernatural object.

For one year after this treatment, sexual intercourse is forbidden to both practitioner and patient. The latter, though not the former, dies if either fails to observe this taboo. The use of an old man to apply the medicine is to lessen danger from this source. The owner of this remedy is always liberally rewarded and some old man carefully preserves a skull under a rock-ledge in order to be ready if called upon. [786] [761]

For Smallpox

Pick up a toad, and tear off its head with the teeth, swallowing some of the blood. 757

This is an ancient remedy for some other ailment which was tried as a last resort during the smallpox epidemic. One man who succeeded in practising it on four successive days was cured of the dread disease.

For Consumption

Boil leaves and stems of a certain fleshy plant (not identified) in water and drink the decoction. The potency of the medicine increases accordingly to the number of plants used.

This medicine was a Nootka Indian's hereditary cure for a cough which was found to be effective for consumption as well. The malady was so prevalent on the coast in the last century that it seemed as if the inhabitants were doomed; this remedy was allegedly discovered at that time and knowledge of it spread rapidly from tribe to tribe, saving the lives of hundreds. The Bella Coola recognize that this was a private medicine, but have ceased to regard it as such and have no hesitation in applying it whenever required. [177] [164]

755 For Insanity

177 The Bella Coola have no medicine for this disease, although they are familiar with one used by the Kwakiutl, which was applied not long ago to a Rivers Inlet youth by two old women, one from Newitti and the other from Djuldémas. They exhumed a recently buried corpse, took a small piece of skin from the left side of the base of the neck, left this for twenty-four hours in a small stream, and then allowed it to soap for another twenty-four hours in a cup filled with water. This liquid was drunk by the patient who immediately recovered his sanity. He was first given water in which had been boiled needles from the yellow cedar; this strengthened him and prevented a relapse. The patient, now cured, observed continence [765] [761] for a year; failure to obey this injunction would have caused his death.

The Bella Coola assume that this remedy is the property of Kwakiutl ancestral families who alone are entitled to use it. The practitioners are always suitably recompensed and do not undertake the treatment except at the request of one of the patient's relatives. Kwakiutl experts have been brought to Bella Coola several times within recent years to cure cases of insanity, but great secrecy is maintained concerning the methods employed. They are considered to be effective, in proof of which the attention of the writer was directed to two sane men who were said to have been raving lunatics before undergoing a Kwakiutl treatment. It is probable that the individuals had been subject to periodic fits of insanity and that a temporary improvement was regarded as a definite cure.

757 For Venereal Disease (four means)

(1) Boil scrapings of false hellebore roots in water for a long time and drink the decoction. If it is too strong, add more water.

(2) Pound sha'tcalx, a kind of fungus, in water and drink the brew.

(j) Pound bark and wood of the black hawthorn to water and drink the brew. 757

(k) The following medicine must be prepared by the patient himself. It is not generally known, but the woman from whom the information was obtained claimed that it had been used with success by her brother.

Obtain a human bone, or a piece of a coffin, and burn it secretly in the forest at some distance from the village. Mix the ashes with dog-fish oil. After preparing the medicine the patient must remain alone in the woods for four days. He can then return home and rub the mixture on his genital organs to reduce the swelling. The sufferer must remain continent for one year or the disease will return with increased malignancy.

It was impossible to learn which types of venereal disease are believed to be curable by these medicines. Nor could definite information be obtained concerning the length of time that the Bella Coola have suffered from these maladies. Most of the old people affirmed that they were unknown before the coming of the white man, although one elderly woman was emphatic in stating that they had experienced them for many generations. 164

For Difficult Delivery (three means) 757 845

(i) The usual remedy, which has been described already, is to apply hot ashes to the woman's feet as soon as the pangs of delivery are felt.

(ii) If delivery has been delayed beyond the usual time, it can be accelerated by giving the woman a morsel of the testicle of a beaver mixed with water. This causes the infant to be born at once.

(iii) In case of extremely protracted delivery, a husband can help his wife by urinating upon her head.

For Breast Trouble 757

The cure for a pain in a woman's breast is to make a deep incision so that the blood flows freely.

For Fractures

An effort is made to straighten the limb and to place the ends of the broken bone together in their proper position. If there is considerable swelling, an incision is made, to let blood escape. Hemlock gum is applied freely to the whole region to soften the wound and hold the splints in position. This prevents the cut, if one has been made, and is believed to facilitate the knitting process. Any small sticks are used for splints.

[illegible] FOR SUPPOSED CURES BY SUPERNATURAL OR HUMAN BEINGS

Persons suffering from diseases or accidents of the types described in the previous section are not the only ones whom the Bella Coola consider to be sick. A girl at puberty, a mother who has just given birth, a man or woman whose consort has just died, has been placed in a peculiar relation to the supernatural and is in a condition identical to that of one suffering from a disease. The ritual acts prescribed at these crises of life are medicines, just as truly as an herbal potion or a curative treatment. In fact, anyone who has been in close touch with the supernatural is in a critical condition and must act circumspectly, the reason for the taboos observed by shamans.

Hunters particularly, and others who are likely to come in contact with supernatural beings, employ a number of medicines to protect themselves or to alleviate the dangers to which they have been exposed. As already described, the most potent of these are articles which have been rendered essentially human by contact with the body. For example, an evil supernatural being such as the War-Party of the Tides can be kept at a distance by casting soiled clothing upon a fire. Even more powerful are stained cedar-bark sanitary napkins. It is remembered that when a Bella Bella lad was treated with a gull so that he could see beneath the ocean, his friends became so alarmed at his tremendous ability that they destroyed it by throwing pads of this kind on a fire built beneath the bed on which he was sleeping. The basis of this medicine is the belief that the proximity of such insensitive human articles is enough to counteract and render powerless anything of a superhuman nature. Likewise, when a certain woman came in contact with the Wise-Party of the Tsin and began to exhibit symptoms of insanity, she was cured by drinking water in which other women had squeezed out their menstrual pads. Another defence is the burning of dried almon, fumigation from which is particularly effective for one who suffers from nightmares. Other remedies already mentioned are to cut the right leg and smear a bullet with the resultant blood in order to kill a cmmq, and to bedewed the inside of the mouth and spit to withstand a capsizing mountain.

789 [756] [728]

The medicine most commonly taken is false hellebore, the use of which was learned by some ancient shaman. At dusk a hunter should eat a small twig of it, raw; it draws from his stomach everything injurious particularly women's hairs, which are abhorred by animals, and ensures him success on the morrow. If he takes too much of it, he becomes ill and must swallow the antidote, mountain goat grease or marrow. He should also carry twigs of the plant with him, ready either to swallow or throw in the direction of any dreaded supernatural being whom he may encounter. Eagle down and dried salmon roe are sometimes similarly used.

224 789 [752]

The powers of a person who has obtained supernatural ability, whether or not he is a shaman, can be destroyed by similar means. For example, a lad treated so that he understands the speech of ravens, will lose his ability if he eats food cooked or prepared by a menstruating woman, by one who has lost her husband within the last year, or if he passes through the hole in the floor used by an adolescent girl. The last Bella Coola with this skill was deadened to the meaning of the birds' croaking by lying near his sister one night for warmth, since her mere proximity was enough to nullify his power. This aspect of medicine merges with taboos. So, too, the power of an object can be destroyed by washing; an instance of this in

756 789 789

[illegible] (1922-1924) 1948
[illegible]

789 regard to two figurines prepared to cause love has been described.

755 In addition to these non-specialized medicines, the Bella Coola are acquainted with remedies for several specific ailments caused by supernatural beings. One of these, to cure a person in whose head a toad was formed, has already been described.

To Prevent Blindness

[759] Loss of sight is caused by a bat flying into a man's face, or [825] by a raven's dropping falling upon him as he looks upward. After either accident, rub a feather from any bird in a raven's liver and draw it across the eyes. The person practising this [785] cure must remain continent for one year or blindness will result.

To Prevent Paralysis of the Leg

If a man puts his foot in a hole so that he stumbles and falls, he will lose the use of that leg unless he counteracts the danger by placing a small stick upright in the cavity. In the summer of 1922 the writer noticed an old Bella Coola, with whom he was walking in the woods, break off a branch about two feet in length and place it in a hole where he had stumbled. He could give no explanation for his act, except that failure would cause him to lose the use of that leg.

To Prevent Paralysis of the Feet

If a person should happen to set his bare feet upon a dead wolf, he will lose the use of his lower limbs. The antidote to this has been forgotten within recent years, and patients are merely treated by shamans.

755. To Prevent the Revenge of a Ghost

775 The ghost of a murdered person usually tries to avenge himself on his killer, who can protect himself by obtaining a small piece from the body or clothing of his victim, a tuft of hair, a shred of cloth, or even a piece of earth from above his grave. When, presently, he feels sick and believes that the ghost has caused the malady, he throws the object he has obtained on a fire and allows the smoke to drift over his body. It is not known how this destroys the power of the dead victim. 755 776

At present (1922), in case of unexpected death in which murder is suspected, the relatives keep the body under lock and key and watch carefully to see whether anyone tries to gain access to it. To endeavour to do so would be considered proof of guilt. For the same reason, they may place boards over the grave and watch it for several weeks. As already described, a middle-aged woman died unexpectedly in 1922. Her father, believing that she had been murdered, expressed the opinion that a certain man was the criminal and that he would die within a year. He outlived this period by three weeks and it was generally agreed that the power of thought had been sufficient to cause the death. Apparently, the father shared this view and expected the ghost of the alleged murderer to be hostile, for he made two efforts to enter the shed where the body was lying, but the relatives of the deceased foiled him by locking all doors and windows. When he himself died a few weeks later, it was taken for granted that the ghost had exacted vengeance. [45]

To Cure a Malady Caused by a Sorcerer

The most complicated medicine about which information was obtained was one employed by an elderly Bella Coola who had incurred the enmity of a sorcerer. The latter had succeeded in breaking a triangular bone in the man's chest which would have caused his death if his mother had not consulted an old woman who knew the proper remedy for such an ailment. This knowledge had been handed down in her family for generations and she was rewarded lavishly for her services. It will be convenient to refer to the patient as X and the old woman who treated him as Y. 755 [424]

X's mother requested the services of Y who agreed to assist and called upon her husband to help her. They scoured the [illegible] forest until they found four spruce saplings growing fairly close to one another and forming a line from east to west. They split each of them, inserted a block to hold the two halves apart, and prevented the upper end of the cut from extending too far by wrapping around it branches of the tree itself, taking care only to bend, not to break them off. Then Y drew through each cleft stem as many of the prickly branches as possible, fastening them in position with their own twigs. Finally, she bound near the base of each sapling a long cord consisting of alternate strands of dyed and undyed cedar-bark. On the day that these preparations were completed, Y boiled in water a number of branches of devil's club, swamp gooseberry, and other prickly plants. Then she told X's mother that all was in readiness for the next day, but that her son must hold intercourse that night. X was unmarried at the time, but his mother obtained the services of a woman for him.

At dawn the next day, before any of his neighbours were awake, X went to the spot where the four saplings had been prepared. With him were his mother and Y, who first washed him with the water in which the thorny branches had been boiled, then gave him his instructions: He was to force his way through the westernmost spruce, turn around on himself, sunwise, four times, pass to the next tree and repeat the same procedure; after this, he was to do the same at the third, and finally at the eastern sapling. With much difficulty, X pushed through the cleft stem, where the tied branches tore his flesh like needles, and rotated himself as he had been directed to do. Without waiting for Y, he acted similarly at the three other trees. As soon as X had passed through the first trunk, Y carefully pulled out the branches from the hole, knocked away the block that held the two sections apart, and loosened the long bough which had been wrapped around the top of the opening. When the sapling had sprung back to normal, she wound the long cedar-bark cord around the trunk, clockwise, so that it would knit together. The old woman followed X to each tree so that there was little indication of anything unusual having taken place when she had finished. Then the three went home, Y telling X that he must remain convalescent until she told him to do otherwise.

Three days later, Y told X's mother that her son would have to sleep that night with another woman whose services were obtained as before. This intercourse was on the fourth night after the first one. Meanwhile, Y and her husband had located and prepared another set of spruce saplings to which X was taken the following dawn. The same ritual was carried out without variation. Four nights later, he slept with another woman and passed through a third line of trees; four nights after that, the same procedure was repeated. Being unmarried, X required the services of four different women although if he had had a wife, she would have sufficed.

During the four days after the fourth set of trees had been used, Y collected, drop by drop, hemlock gum which had exuded from holes made by a small woodpecker.* X's mother accompanied the practitioner and heard her say something to the gum but could not understand what it was; X does not know whether the words were in a strange language or merely mumbled. Y also rifled a coffin to obtain the same bone as the one of X's which had been broken. X's mother was again present and heard Y speaking unintelligibly for some time as she cautiously opened the box, taking care to raise the farther side of the lid. The bone was covered with the hemlock gum and Y bound it, like a poultice, on X's chest on the fourth day after he had passed through the fourth set of saplings. It was left in position for four days, then thrown away as useless; it had "become nothing" for the malady and was consequently valueless. With its removal, the pain vanished. Y told X that he would have a long life, since no evil could harm him henceforth, but added that he would never be wealthy. X mentioned that both predictions have come to pass.

If the application of the gum had not been successful, Y would have waited for four days more and then given X a drink

*Typed; the species could not be identified.

[955] of water in which had been boiled eight quinters from a coffin. He would have obtained two from each side, and two from each end, in each case inserting the point of a crooked knife to pry loose a fragment of the wood, and then pulling it off in the same direction as the sun travels. It would have been immaterial from which aspect the first hai been taken, but Y would have been careful to move around the coffin from east to south to west to north, corresponding o the course of the sun.

It is believed that no one has now the ability to use this cure.

Sorcerers

[954] Among the causative medicines of which knowledge has [424] been handed down in various families for generations are secret means of killing. Every sorcerer must have such a possession, but he is not so bounded unless he begins to exercise his powers for anti-social purposes. For example, if it be known that a
[975] certain individual is able to cause death, the members of the kwiat society are eager to admit him to their group, so that his ability will be at their disposal to punish anyone who breaks [222] their regulations. Likewise, if a chief decides that a certain man should die, the power of his thoughts may suffice to cause the death, but the desired end will be effected more certainly by requesting aid from the owner of a means of killing. Such [956] an individual is frequently a shaman who is only too glad of an opportunity to exhibit his powers. The following methods of execution are said to have been employed socially, that is, with the connivance or at the request of chiefs or the members of the kwiat society:

(1) The executioner scratches for four successive nights on the door of the victim's house. If the latter suspects what is to take place, he may endeavour to escape by remaining awake which renders the scratching powerless. It is said that no one has been able to remain sleepless for more than three nights which gives the killer his opportunity.

McDewolth E-5 (1922-1924)948
NEA Bellacoola NEA

(2) The executioner obtains the left, bottom rib from a man's skeleton, puts one end in the fire until it is alight, and keeps it smouldering by continuous puffing. When he knows that his victim is asleep, he knocks with the bone on the outside of his house and the sleeper dies immediately.

(3) The executioner holds a dried human hand before his victim's face, or knocks with it on his door, and he falls dead.

Individuals who have such knowledge are regarded with fear and a certain amount of respect, but it is recognized that they have every right to use their inherited abilities when requested to do so. A similar medicine was tried recently with fatal results:

A few years ago a number of Bella Coola, travelling to the interior along a trail over which some Carriers had just passed, noticed a place where one of the latter had been picking Indian rhubarb and had spit out the fibres after chewing. One of the party decided to test a medicine which had been handed down in his family for a long time. Catching a toad, he thrust some of the shreds down its throat, tied a loop of the fibre around its neck, and left the animal suspended to die of strangulation or starvation as the case might be. That night the Bella Coola overtook the carriers who had camped early owing to the illness of one of their party. He was lying on the ground, too sick to move, and complaining of a choking sensation in his throat. Realizing the seriousness of the case, the man who had fastened up the toad hurried back to release it, but found it dead. Before he regained his companions, the Carrier had likewise choked to death. The efficacy of the medicine was thus proved.

Another man stated that a similar means of killing was to use in the same way fibres left exposed from bark which had been stripped for eating. There are believed to be many secret means of killing which, since they have often been employed indiscriminately, are thought to have had an appreciable effect in reducing the numbers of the Bella Coola.

The most common method of execution is by obtaining something belonging to the victim, and subjecting it to the fate desired for its owner. A few years ago, for example, the members of the kusiut society wanted to frighten one of their 754 members, and delegated the task to a man who was known to be skilled in such matters. The latter stole some shreds of the offender's clothing, placed them in a human skull which he fastened to a long rope and threw into a swift stretch of the river. As the rapids tossed the skull to and fro, the person whose clothing was within began to feel uneasy; first he experienced a jumping pain in his head, but as the wild movements continued, he became light-headed and finally delirious. At this juncture, it was decided to pull back the skull, but the rope broke and it was carried away downstream. Nothing could save the man and he died within a few hours. This particular incident occurred among the Bella Bella, but it is agreed that it might have happened in Bella Coola.

[554] The mingled fear of, and aversion to, a person who knows some such secret method of killing, fades into insignificance compared to the extreme loathing of every Bella Coola for sorcerers. Their methods of killing may be similar to the ones just described, but they are evil creatures who practise secretly, working entirely to gratify their own personal desires. Not [683] only is the murder of a sorcerer a virtuous act, but the relatives of one should be put to death without mercy. There is no single factor which has caused so much hatred, bitterness, and suspicion as belief in the activities of sorcerers. Conversion to [797] Christianity has scarcely altered it, and men who have been members of the church for ten to twenty years remain fully convinced that some of their associates have loathsome abilities as sorcerers. In many parts of the world, belief in black magic and witchcraft is one of the last native convictions to pass away, and it seems probable that this will be the case in Bella Coola although, of course, it will become increasingly difficult to obtain information about the subject.

The actual methods used by different sorcerers vary, although most of them require an article which has been in contact with their intended victim. Consequently, they seek pieces of soiled clothing, nail parings, hair clippings, spittle, and other objects of the same type which are usually concealed by their owners for safety. Judas, an old Bella Coola believed to be a sorcerer, has been seen to scrape up the moist earth where a man has urinated; in former times anyone doing such a suspicious act would have been killed. The article obtained is hidden and kept for future use, and if the practitioner wishes to inflict pain or death, he places it in contact with some potent medicine. Human bones are frequently employed for this purpose, although the most powerful is said to be grease obtained by boiling flesh cut from the inner side of the thigh of a recently buried corpse. To obtain either of these, graves must be robbed, another reason for hating sorcerers. 754 [683]

Secrecy is essential, so a sorcerer is usually assisted by his children, and in this way he has a better chance of obtaining articles belonging to different people without arousing suspicion. The necessary knowledge can accordingly be transmitted from generation to generation, sometimes without the slightest inkling of it becoming known. Even if a man is found out, he may be able to bribe his discoverer to silence. [424]

Sometimes two from different tribes work in partnership to lessen the danger of practising their rites near the village of a victim. For example, a Bella Coola sorcerer may send an article to an accomplice in Bella Bella for placing in contact with strong medicine; this causes the victim to languish and die while the person responsible continues his usual routine of life around the village, suspected by no one. The commencement of such a partnership is a matter of great difficulty, since anyone who admits his crimes places himself in the power of his confidant. Sometimes, however, rumours that a certain individual is practising malevolent magic reach a foreign sorcerer who needs an accomplice. If he considers that the information is authentic, he may admit his own prowess and suggest that they work together. Such an arrangement is profitable to both parties, and a partnership so formed may continue for generations. 648 754

Sorcerers display considerable ingenuity in arranging that their skill shall bring them pecuniary benefits as well as the 754 756

NEA Bellacoola NEA

754 gratification of killing their enemies. To achieve this end, a 756 member of the family claims to be a shaman and his relatives loudly acclaim him. It is not difficult for a man with skill in conjuring to perform some simple dramatic act, probably one carried out by an ancient shaman, which he announces has been shown to him by a supernatural being who has given him power to cure the sick. Then the sorcerer selects a suitable victim and causes him to become ill by placing something taken from him in contact with his medicine. If the malefactor is fortunate, the victim will consult the "shaman" who will effect a cure and be paid for it, ignorant of the fact that his recovery has been due to the removal of the article by the practitioner's accomplice. This deception is especially difficult to expose if the sorcerer has a box containing grease boiled from human bodies, since the sickness increases or diminishes accordingly to the depth to which the article is sunk. This is one of the ways in which some shamans have built up great reputations as curers.

The psychology of sorcery is similar to that of other kinds of magic. It is not possible for the malefactor to tell his victim that he has stolen a nail paring, for example, and that he will die because it has been placed in a decoction of human grease. But if the attending shaman is an accomplice, he can inform the sufferer that his malady has been caused by a sorcerer and this belief profoundly affects him. He feels that he will die unless a remedy be found, and if the shaman assures him that he has rendered the evil influence impotent, his chances of recovery are increased accordingly. So, likewise, the members of families who possess remedies against the activities of sorcerers often work in conjunction with one. It is therefore not surprising that the Bella Coola should firmly believe in their machinations and affirm that they have killed many thousands of people in the course of generations. The belief in magic would itself be sufficient to explain this, but it is strengthened by the social and economic aspects of a sorcerer's 754 vocation. The container in which the potent mixture is kept 171

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)948

is spoken of in the Chinook jargon as a mesatche ikas, that is, a "dirty," "unclean," or "repulsive" box, and this term is one which is mentioned whenever an unexpected death takes place, or whenever a coastal Indian is accused of loitering around a deserted camp or of stealing into another's house. The belief is not limited to the Bella Coola, but has formed the basis for criminal cases all over the coast of British Columbia. It is difficult to find words sufficiently strong to express the disgust, loathing, and fear with which the Bella Coola regard a person suspected of sorcery.

754 171 [554]

Ability in this respect carries with it certain prohibitions. A sorcerer would lose his power if he should wash or blow his nose except when about to commit murder. The one old Bella Coola now thought to be a sorcerer never washes; he knows that if he did so, he would be immediately accused of plotting someone's death. This man is greatly feared, as he is said to have a collection of spittle from every member of the tribe; efforts have been made to break into his house and steal this, but it has never been found. He takes credit for the death of at least one white man in the valley. A peculiar impediment suffered by all sorcerers is a prohibition against turning around, although no one knows why doing so should deprive them of their strength. The explanation may be that their power would recoil upon themselves, a concept well illustrated by the following incident:

754 [515] [527]

When the first Christian Bella Coola left the old village to settle near the mission station, they were regarded with dislike and suspicion by their fellow-tribesmen. One day, one of them happened to follow a path through the woods which led her to a rude shelter in which was a bundle. Heartily commencing her fellows, they opened it and found an article of clothing belonging to each Christian. The man who told this incident described his fear at finding a dirty shirt of his own among the others. They felt that the garments had been collected by a young man who claimed to be a shaman, but whom they suspected to be merely the accomplice of a sorcerer, and this was soon proved to be the case. He was inefficiently trained; instead of touching the patient's body with his stick, he used to stick wherever the pain was located and then 754 drink water. This washed the sickness down into his own stomach, which rotted away so that he died. Recovery of their clothes saved the Christians from injury on this occasion.

Although the Bella Coola suspect that several of their tribesmen are sorcerers, their work is so carefully concealed that it is naturally difficult to obtain evidence against them. A few years ago, however, the two daughters of a Tâl ts man were searching for a calf lost by their father when they found a coal-oil can half hidden in a bush near the pasture fence. They peered into it, and were shocked to find a decayed human leg. They hurried home to their father, who investigated and found that it was the portion from knee to ankle, and that it was partly covered by a sock made for himself by his wife. This so terrified him that he took the find to the Indian Agent, who is believed still to have it. The finder was convinced that the deaths of several of his children must have been caused by earlier activities of the same, or another sorcerer. He suspected another Tâl ts man who had cleared a small farm in the vicinity, and who asked the two girls whether they had found a jam-tin near the place where the leg had been discovered.

The Bella Coola agree that sorcerers were more powerful in early times than at present, and recount a number of stories describing their activities. The following examples require no further explanation and clearly illustrate their beliefs.

A BELLA BELLA SORCERER

539 754 Not many years ago, as a Bella Bella lad lay dozing, he saw a man approaching him with a stick to one end of which was fastened a tuft of undyed cedar-bark. He quickly realized that it must be a sorcerer who had come to collect some of his exhaled breath as a personal possession, so he pretended to be asleep. The villain came nearer, held the sponge-like bark before the sleeper's face for a moment, and then stole away. He did not know that his intended victim was following him. The sorcerer entered his house, cautiously drew out a human leg bone and tied the tuft of bark to it; then, wearied by the strain, he went to sleep. This was the victim's opportunity. He crept into the house, took another piece of bark, held it before the sleeper's face, removed the one stained

1:McIlwraith E-5 (1922-1924)948
NE6 Bellacoola NE6

with his own breath, and replaced it with that containing the sorcerer's. 539
Before dawn the next morning, the sorcerer, ignorant of the substi- 754 tution, took the bone and left the house. The youth had been watching and followed him to the edge of the sea, where he laid his bundle in a hole in the rocks through which the rising tide was sending up a miniature water-spout. The sorcerer went away at once, giving the lad an opportunity to remove the bone and secrete it in another cavity. He knew that the wicked man would soon become ill and would suspect that someone had tampered with the bone. So it proved. As the water whirled the lock containing his exhaled breath, the sorcerer began to feel light-headed and rushed off to the hole in the rocks. Meanwhile the intended victim had summoned his neighbours to watch what might transpire. The man searched frantically, but of course could not find the bone, so, as the water rose and covered the lock, he was impelled to plunge repeatedly beneath the surge, until he was drowned.

THE OUTWITTING OF A SORCERER

Over one hundred years ago there was living in Xemqo·ts a powerful chief who owned a salmon-weir. Though an expert fisherman himself, he relied to a great extent on the assistance of a commoner who was still more efficient. One summer this man died suddenly. Immediately after the funeral, the chief examined his trap, removed the fish, and returned home, physically weary from his labour and more than ever regretting the loss of his assistant. For some reason he could not sleep, so, after tossing for an hour or more, he decided to gather firewood. There was a low-rising full moon, so he had no difficulty in seeing his road as he climbed the small mountain behind the village, carrying only an iron axe. He had cut a bundle and was ready to return when he heard a grunting sound as though someone with a heavy burden were climbing the slope. Putting down his load, he hid himself in such a position that clear moonlight shone upon the path. After waiting a few minutes, he saw a figure approaching; it was Ownwal, a local shaman, carrying a coffin upon his back. Now thoroughly suspicious, the chief decided to follow, trusting to his axe for protection.

Ownwal passed over the crest, descended the other side, and then ascended the slope of the mountain on the east, in long tangents to hide his course. The chief had no difficulty in following him unobserved, and finally watched his unsuspecting guide put down the coffin and clear away the brush-wood. He seemed to be lifting something, which was followed by a grating sound as if a large stone was being dragged across another; then he disappeared from sight and the chief realized that Ownwal had descended into an underground house of which the combination door and smoke-vent had been covered with stones and small sticks.

The chief crawled to the entrance and looked within. Round the walls were seated the corpses of all those who had died recently in the village, and Onqwak was removing the body of the expert fisherman from its coffin. He put it in line with the others and put on a dance-apron decorated with human finger and toe nails. Then he began to dance, at the same time pressing the lever of a mechanical contrivance which caused the corpses to beat time with sticks and even to leap into the air at intervals as do living singers. It was most weird and uncanny, but after watching for a few minutes, the chief was forced to cough. Although this was the first intimation to Onqwak that he was being observed, he betrayed no surprise and invited the cougher to come down the ladder into his house. The chief did so, and he was received in a courteous and hospitable manner by his host who frankly admitted that he was a sorcerer, and added that his corpses were just dancing to welcome the new arrival.[1] He showed his guest everything of interest in the dwelling, including a box containing potent medicine in which was laid the skin of a man's left hand. He explained that he frequently took this to the village and, if he desired to kill anyone, would place within the palm a tuft of cedar-bark on which his victim had breathed, then close the fingers upon it. This caused death almost instantly. The chief, though keenly interested, never relaxed his vigilance for a moment, knowing that the sorcerer would not have been so communicative unless he had felt confident of his ability to kill his hearer. Towards morning, Onqwak suggested that they return home, picked up the skinned hand, and was the first to climb the ladder, intending to stun the chief when his head appeared over the surface. His pursuer followed close at his heels and finally, at the top of the ladder, butted the sorcerer with his head so that he sprawled on the ground and the chief was able to emerge with safety. Unperturbed by this first failure, Onqwak covered the entrance to his house so carefully that a man might have passed over it without suspecting its presence. The sorcerer wanted the chief to precede him homewards, but the latter was too cautious for any such subterfuge and insisted upon following close at the heels of the malefactor. They did not separate until they reached the village, where each proceeded to his own house.

[1]Although this account is supposed to be a historical record of a comparatively recent incident, items of a supernatural type have obviously been added. The man who told the story did not seem to realize the difficulty of a mechanical contrivance to make corpses beat time, nor did it strike him that the dance of welcome must have been adopted from the similar ceremony performed by ghosts. The whole story was related as an unusual one but not of a supernatural nature.

The chief knew that his life was in serious danger although he had 539 won the first round. Consequently, instead of lying down to sleep, he 754 seated himself with his arms stretched out before him on a box and his head supported on them so that he could watch through his fingers. As he expected, Omqwak soon came stealing in, holding a tuft of undyed cedar-bark. He made no movement, even when the sorcerer held this before his face and stole away with it when it had been breathed upon. The brave man knew that his life would be in constant danger unless he could outwit his enemy and that this was his opportunity. He waited for about one hour, then quietly entered Omqwak's house where the sorcerer was sleeping peacefully, thinking that all danger was over, and the hand-skin was lying in plain sight on a box. The chief stealthily took a tuft of cedar-bark, held it before the sleeper's nose till it was impregnated with his breath, and then placed it within the skin from which he withdrew the piece already there. Having accomplished his purpose, he returned home without disturbing the sleeper.

The chief knew that Omqwak would wash the following morning if he intended to kill, so he remained awake and was watching the sorcerer's house before daybreak. As he expected, the malefactor presently appeared, carrying his chamber-vessel, and went to the river. First he smeared himself with urine and walked in up to his knees, remained for a few minutes, and came ashore again. The second time, he waded in until the water was up to his thighs; the third time, he went on till it was shoulder-deep. Sorcerers always wash in this way in order that the four parts of the body shall be covered successively, although no one knows why this should be done by them alone. The hidden chief knew that Omqwak would meet disaster when he bathed for the fourth time since the skin, carried beneath his arm-pit, would then be beneath the surface for a few moments. So it transpired. He dipped his head, but instead of being able to raise it, his feet floated above the surface, and he remained in that position, slowly drowning. This was the fate which he had destined for the chief whose breath he had placed within his skinned hand, but he was unaware of the substitution which, of course, re-acted upon himself.

The watcher hastily roused his neighbours who came running to the bank half-clad and rubbing their eyes. They brought ashore the corpse of the drowned man while the chief recounted all that he had seen and done during the night. As soon as it was sufficiently light a number of men accompanied him to the underground house in the mountains from which the bodies were brought back and reburied by their relatives. Previous to this time, no one had suspected Omqwak of sorcery, but as soon as the discovery was made, the angry people slew all his relatives 539 754 except an infant daughter. She grew up, married, and was the mother of the old Bella Coola, about seventy years of age in 1923, who is so loathed as a sorcerer. It is he who has the collection of spittle, and it is believed that, like his grandfather, he is the owner of a skinned and stuffed left hand with which he can kill a man as surely as with a rifle.

THE DISCOVERY OF TWO SORCERERS

Many years ago there lived at Stuu two young men who were constant companions; they always hunted and travelled together, and were determined to share each other's fortune, no matter what it might be. One day they agreed to go up the valley to visit some friends, but decided to postpone their departure until dusk. One of the two went out for a short walk and failed to return by the time appointed; his comrade sought him everywhere and finally hurried off up the trail, thinking that his friend must have started before him. He soon heard sounds of laboured breathing as if people were carrying a heavy burden, and could just distinguish two men carrying a coffin on poles between them. He realized that they must be sorcerers and that their inability to turn around would give him an advantage. Stealing up behind them, he pushed the rear man, not only causing him to stumble, but the one in front as well, since their burden was resting between them. Neither could turn around to see who had discovered them, and they became more and more terrified as the brave youth first pushed, and then pulled the one in the rear. [774] Suddenly he called out, wo·, so loudly in their ears that the sudden start expelled their spirits and they fell to earth as if dead. The lad watched their gradual recovery, feeling confident that his partner must be within ear-shot and would come hurrying back to his assistance if necessary. As soon as the sorcerers had revived, one of them said angrily to the boy:

"You will die presently."

"No," he answered. "It is you who are in grave peril."

At this point he called loudly for his companion who was so far ahead that he could barely hear the other's voice; he answered the shout and began to run back. The sorcerers, trying to make the best of a bad situation, mocked him by advising him to call again and to bring more helpers if he wanted to escape death. When his friend had come so close that he could see what was taking place, the youth called out to him:

"Partner! They say that I am in danger."

"No," the other answered. "It is they who will die."

When he joined the group the four began to discuss what was to be done. The sorcerers begged their discoverers not to expose their misdoings, and offered to make them members of the kaxlat society in return for their silence. Though uninitiated persons, even this tempting bribe was refused by the two youths. Next, each of the malefactors offered a daughter as wife to each of the partners, and they accepted this bargain. For their part, the sorcerers were glad to escape at any cost, since they had been caught red-handed; they knew that henceforth they would have to assist their captors, but this was preferable to exposure. 539 754

The two groups parted company; the boys continued their journey to the upper village and the sorcerers went on their way to some cave in the mountains. Within a few weeks, each youth married the daughter of one of the malefactors, with whose assistance they were able to give potlatches and become influential personages.

A FAMILY OF KWATNA SORCERERS

Near the village of Kwatna there used to be two cemeteries. One was on a small point of ground at the mouth of the river which became an island at high tide; here were interred the bodies of chiefs alone, a custom said to be without parallel on the coast. It is not known why there should have been this special burial-ground, but the place was always spoken of as "The Chiefs' Island." Instead of being buried, coffins containing commoners were laid on ledges of rock at the base of a cliff behind the village; this custom, though unusual, is known elsewhere on the coast, at Kimsquit and Port Simpson, for example. [764] [171]

Many generations ago, there was a time when the corpses of commoners frequently disappeared from the ledges on which they had been placed, and although it was believed that a sorcerer was responsible, no one knew whom to blame. One old woman had lost nearly all her numerous relatives when she realized that, though there had been many deaths in the village and some families had been almost wiped out, no members of one group had been taken. This roused her suspicions; she soon noticed that whenever anyone was sick, four brothers of the family in question always made some plausible excuse to leave the village and proceed up the other arm of the inlet. She concluded that this could be no mere coincidence, the four must be sorcerers. Within a short while, another of her relatives fell ill and died in spite of all that could be done; this reduced her family to herself and her infant. On the day after the funeral, the four brothers said that they wanted to gather hemlock boughs and set off in a canoe up the other arm of the inlet for the purpose. They did not come back at night and the villagers assumed that they had been delayed and had camped. The bereaved woman, however, who had hidden herself below the village, saw the brothers paddle back around the point and conceal their canoe beneath a bushy tree instead of landing at the village. More suspicious than ever, she followed the four and was able to keep in touch with them in spite of the necessity of carrying her baby. They went to the cemetery, placed the coffin on poles, and two of them carried it away with the others in close attendance.

The mother, still clutching her child, followed the brothers up the side of a steep mountain behind Kwatna. They avoided all trails and travelled in zigzags until they reached the base of a precipice where a tall tree was growing. The mother, who was not far behind, could see that its upper branches grew across to touch the cliff at a point where the mouth of a cave was visible. The coffin was placed on the ground, three of the brothers climbed the tree, and passed from it into the opening in the rock. From this they shoved out a plank to form a narrow bridge to the upper trunk, and dropped a long rope which the one below fastened around the coffin; then it was hauled up, the fourth brother climbed the tree and all disappeared from sight. The woman continued to remain in hiding, but before long her curiosity was piqued by seeing smoke drift out from the opening. She decided that she must see what was taking place, so she nursed her infant to keep it quiet, and then began the ascent. Without difficulty she reached a point from which she could peer within, and saw the four melting down the grease from the dismembered body of her kinsman. They were sorcerers without doubt, and she noted that they were preserving with care all the fat that exuded from the inside of the thighs. Each was wearing a mask, but she was able to recognize them by their figures.

When the poisonous decoction had been prepared, the sorcerers fell asleep, still wearing their masks. Made bold by her longing for revenge, the woman crept across the plank without disturbing the sleepers. Cautiously she picked up the spoon which they had used for stirring the mixture, lifted a few drops in it and held it to the mouth of the one whom she recognized as the eldest brother. He did not stir. With a quick, firm pressure she stamped upon his stomach, causing him to wake and swallow with a gasp; the poison was so potent that he died without making a sound. She took another spoonful of the brew and gave it to the second sorcerer in the same way and with the same result, and in this way killed all four. Stopping only to fill a receptacle with the brew, the woman climbed down the tree and hurried back to Kwatna.

Instead of describing what she had seen and done, the woman determined to wipe out the relatives of the sorcerers. So she invited the whole village to a feast, allotting the proper place to each family. This whole procedure was unusual because she had killed no large game, but there is always a good deal of latitude allowed in such matters, particularly as everyone sympathized with the hostess on account of her many bereavements. Her only assistant was a woman who, like herself, had lost all her kinsmen. The food provided was hemlock-bark dipped in fish-oil, but the hostess contrived that every relative of the sorcerers should receive a portion dipped in poison instead. They all started to eat at the same time, and all fell dead simultaneously without a word. 539 754

Instantly wild confusion broke out and the guests exclaimed that they were being served poison. Unperturbed, the woman explained everything; how she had first become suspicious, how she had followed the four brothers, and all that had resulted. A party set out at once under her guidance and found that everything she had said was true. In this way perished all the relatives of the sorcerers except one man who happened to be absent at the time. One of his descendants is now living in Bella Coola and is regarded wtih a certain amount of suspicion, although there is no evidence that he or any of his relatives have practised sorcery for generations.

A BELLA COOLA SORCERER

Since the introduction of muskets, there dwelt in the lower Bella Coola valley a shaman, Ānusaiksaixsaix·ālx by name; he was a regular practitioner, able both to heal the sick or to cause death. When using his power beneficially, he shook a rattle containing a rock-crystal, but when he was requested to kill, he used one that appeared to be identical but contained human teeth and wolf fangs. In some unknown manner these were lost, which prevented him from slaying a man as requested by the chiefs of his village. One April day he mentioned his difficulty casually to a certain Tcika who surprised him by replying: [756]

"I can supply you with teeth and you will have greater power than ever."

The two were alone at the time and Tcika, having admitted that he was a sorcerer, suggested that they form a partnership. He must have felt confident that Ānusaiksaixsaix·ālx would agree, as indeed he did gladly. Tcika explained that the necessary knowledge had been handed down in his family for generations, but that he had only recently begun to use it to avenge a slight at a feast of seals.

Next morning Tcika guided Ānusaiksaixsaix·ālx up the mountain on the north side of the extreme head of North Bentinck Arm, just west of the Necleetsconnay River. Hunters frequently ranged over this area, but no one had ever seen a sorcerer's box there. Tcika led the way to a small rock shelter beneath which was concealed a chest about eight feet long. He kicked it four times with his left foot, and called out four times:

"Wake up!"

Tcika then raised the cover, and his companion saw that it contained a number of separate compartments, formed by vertical strips criss-crossing within, and that the whole bottom was covered with a thick, black, oily liquid. On top of the cube-like divisions lay a badly decomposed corpse which Ănusaiksaixsaix·ăls recognized as that of a youth who had disappeared from the village the previous July and who was thought to have been drowned. Tcika explained the mechanism of the box: Each section was for a different disease, stomach trouble in one, heart failure in another, consumption in a third, sudden death in a fourth, and so on. Whenever he wanted to cause a specific disease, he would dip a personal possession of the victim's in the oil at the bottom of the proper compartment and leave it there. All that was then necessary to improve the patient's condition was to raise the article slightly in the liquid, whereas to lower it increased the force of the malady, and to leave it covered entirely caused death. It was generally known that such methods were used by sorcerers, but this was the first box that Ănusaiksaixsaix·ăls had ever seen and he was keenly interested. He inquired the purpose of the boy's body, and Tcika replied that he had killed him with the intention of taking his skin to use against the lad's relatives, but had been forced to carry away the whole body owing to the difficulty of removing the skin alone. Whenever he wanted to kill a person quietly and rapidly, it was only necessary to lay an article which had belonged to the victim on the back of the neck of the corpse. Death resulted immediately, since this was the spot where the spirit had resided during life. After answering his friend's questions, Tcika fumbled around in the bottom of the box and drew forth a number of wolf teeth which he gave to the grateful Ănusaiksaixsaix·ăls. Then the two went home to their respective villages, after promising each other mutual support and secrecy.

Although the two malefactors took every precaution not to be seen together too often, rumours began to circulate that they were partners, and that Tcika was a sorcerer. There was no proof of this, but the suspected man became so unpopular that he was virtually expelled from his village. More angry than perturbed at this, he moved three miles up the valley to the town in which Ănusaiksaixsaix·ăls was living. After waiting for a few weeks to allay suspicion, Tcika determined to murder the chief who had been the prime mover in his expulsion, and sent his son to steal the victim's chamber-pot. His wife discovered the theft the same night and promptly roused the whole village, realizing the danger to her husband if it should fall into the hands of a sorcerer; diligent search was made, but of course the article could not be found, since the thief had taken it away to his new home. Tcika placed the vessel in a compartment of his box containing a bear's bladder tied into sections; 539 this caused his enemy to suffer stricture and soon to die in agony.

Following the usual custom, the relatives of the dead man smeared 754 their faces with ashes which they left in position for a year. The widow, who had loved her husband very dearly, allowed this indication of mourning to remain even longer than the customary period. On several occasions Tciks made somewhat slighting remarks about her excessive grief, and when one of his sons also commented upon it, she became suspicious and told her relatives. One of them was a chief of the village where Tciks was then living and where he was already regarded with distrust. This man visited the home of his bereaved kinswoman and called the chiefs of her village together to discuss the matter, and to inform them of the suspicions which his conduct had aroused in his new home. Three days later, Tciks happened to come to the village and was at once summoned to the house where the chiefs had assembled to interrogate him. Tciks sat on a box in the centre of the group and denied, slowly and positively, that he had any knowledge of sorcery, adding that his poverty confirmed his statement. At this moment Anusaiksaixsaix-âls came rushing into the house, furiously brandishing a rifle, and exclaiming that it was scandalous the way in which unjust accusations were being levelled at Tciks. One of the chiefs quietly slipped behind the shaman, knocked his fire-arm upwards so that it exploded harmlessly in the air, and threw him to the ground where he threatened him with a large knife.

"I will not brook any interference from you in this matter," he said.

This so frightened Anusaiksaixsaix-âls that he blurted out that he knew Tciks was a sorcerer and that he had seen his box containing a decayed human body. Tciks was less excited than anyone else, and slipped out of the house in the confusion, merely pausing to ask:

"What are you going to do about it?"

He returned to his new village where, of course, the news soon fol- 539 lowed of what had been discovered. The chiefs decided that he must be 754 killed, and that the most convenient occasion would be at a feast of seals 683 which was to take place in the near future. Tciks accepted an invitation to this and was slain while he was busy handling his spoon. One of his sons was killed with him, another who escaped through a hole in the floor was slaughtered near the village. His two brothers were absent on a hunting expedition, but a party tracked them and slew them in their camp before they knew that their evil deeds had been found out. Tciks's two daughters were allowed to live, but were given to a famous warrior who kept them practically as prisoners. Anusaiksaixsaix-âls, who seems to have escaped all punishment for his share in the affair, guided a party to the sorcerer's box. It was found to be old and moss-covered, obviously 539

539 one used by some of Tcika's ancestors. It was brought to the ocean and 754 thrown in.

Taboos

784 The Bella Coola regard as taboos those injunctions that are observed in the belief that their neglect would cause automatic punishment. The mechanism of enforcement is frequently not understood; it is enough to know that an unpleasant result would follow disobedience. Some taboos are in force at all times, others only during certain seasons of the year, and still others at critical periods of life. Since the psychology of such [789] beliefs is essentially magical rather than religious, they could justifiably be grouped at this point. Unfortunately, to do so would destroy the continuity of accounts of birth, adolescence, death, ceremonial chastity, and many other aspects of Bella Coola life subject to taboo. The injunctions enforced by the River Guardian, the restrictions observed by a girl after puberty, the continence required after different medicines, all are taboos, disregard of which brings certain punishment. These and many others have already been described in connection with the activities to which they pertain. It is doubtful whether the Bella Coola have a single word to describe taboos [783] in general, though they are all regarded as sxaiāx, that is, as something which is ceremonially unclean.

Scarcely to be distinguished from taboos are ceremonial errors, yun·imut or kān·imut. Failure to give presents to heralds when a seat breaks beneath a chief or a dancer stumbles, or unnecessary activity during the year's waiting for the fruition of supernatural good fortune are ritual mistakes of this type. Neglect of such regulations brings punishment, though of a lesser kind than the breaking of taboos. If the [688] error has been in connection with a ceremony, the offence can [203] be wiped out by presents to heralds, and the terms yun·imut and kān·imut are likewise applied to some of their prerogatives such as the ability to claim clothing during the marriage of a chief's child.

Most taboos and errors can best be described with other phases of activity, leaving here only certain rules about diet and a number of prohibitions which hunters must observe. 784
